No. 1.

PARIS, 30*th Frimaire*, (December 10*th*, 1796.)

DEAR SIR:

We left Bordeaux on the 25th of November, having been detained there until that time: first by the badness of the weather, which prevented the unloading of the baggage, and afterwards by some necessary alterations being made to my carriage, to encounter the bad roads we were threatened with. The roads were even worse than the horrible description we had heard of them; and we broke down twice, and were obliged to get three new wheels, out of four, before we reached this city, which we at length did on the evening of the 5th of December. I here met Major Henry Rutledge, my secretary, and, on the morning of the next day, (December 6) I transmitted by him, to Mr. Monroe, his letters of recall, with my compliments, and that I would wait upon him at any hour he would appoint: I received for answer, that Mr. Monroe would see me whenever I pleased. I immediately waited on him, and we had a long conversation on the affairs of America; in which he, with a great deal of frankness, communicated all the late measures of this Government with respect to ours, and of which you must, long before this, have been apprised, both by Mr Adet and the despatches of Mr. Monroe. He also showed me a letter which he had received from M. De la Croix, the minister of foreign affairs, in the following words:

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to citizen Monroe, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

PARIS, 12*th Frimaire*, 5*th year of the French republic.*

CITIZEN MINISTER:

The arrival of Mr. Pinckney, at Paris, appearing to be near at hand, if it has not already taken place, I conceive that I should communicate to you certain formalities which you are to fulfil on the occasion. The usage is, that the minister recalled and his successor send to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, a copy of their letters of credence and recall. As I presume your letters of recall have already been sent to you, I request you to communicate them to me as soon as possible.

Greeting and fraternity.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

I told Mr. Monroe that I thought it would be more respectful to the minister to acquaint him with my arrival, and to inform him, that we would wait upon him at any hour he should appoint, with my letters of credence, and his letters of recall. Accordingly Mr. Monroe, in my presence, and with my approbation, sent him the following letter:

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic.

PARIS, December 6, 1796, (16*th Frimaire*,)
21*st year of the independence of the United States of America.*

CITIZEN MINISTER:

I have the honor to inform you, that my successor, Mr. Pinckney, is arrived, and is desirous of waiting upon you, for the purpose of presenting a copy of his letter of credence for the Directoire Exécutif of the French republic. By him I have also received my letter of recall. Permit me, therefore, to request that you will be so obliging as to appoint a time when Mr. Pinckney and myself shall have the honor to attend you, for the purpose of presenting you copies of those documents.

Accept the assurance of my respect.

JAMES MONROE.

On Friday morning, December 9, I received a letter from Mr. Monroe, informing me, that M. De la Croix had appointed that day, between one and four o'clock, P. M. to receive us. M. De la Croix's letter was conceived in the following terms:

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to citizen Monroe, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PARIS, 19*th Frimaire*, 5*th year*, (December 9, 1796.)

CITIZEN MINISTER:

I have received the letter which you did me the honor to write to me, in which you request an interview for citizen Pinckney, designated for your successor, for the purpose of delivering copies of his letters of credence, and your letters of recall. I shall be glad to receive you between the hours of one and four o'clock this afternoon, if convenient to you. I pray you to propose this to citizen Pinckney.

Greeting and fraternity.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

Mr. Monroe and myself, with my secretary, Major Rutledge, about two o'clock, waited upon M. De la Croix, and I was introduced by Mr. Monroe as the person appointed as his successor. The minister at first received us with great stiffness, but, afterwards, on our conversing on some general subjects, he unbent and behaved with civility; and, on receiving the official copies of our letters of credence and recall, said he would deliver them, without delay, to the Directory. He desired Major Rutledge to let him have our names of baptism, and our ages, that cards of hospitality might be made out: which he said were necessary to reside here unmolested. This requisition was immediately complied with, and he promised to send the cards the next morning. When this interview was known, the reports, which had been spread abroad before my arrival, of my not being received by the Directory, vanished, and the general idea seemed to be that there would be no objection to receive me as minister from America. At 11 o'clock, on Monday, December 12th, Mr. Prevost (Mr. Monroe's secretary) called upon me, and told me that Mr. Monroe had just received a letter from M. De la Croix, and desired to know if I had received one. I said no; he then showed me M. De la Croix's to Mr. Monroe, which was as follows:

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to Citizen Monroe, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

PARIS, 21*st Frimaire*, (December 11, 1796)
5*th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.*

CITIZEN MINISTER:

I hasten to lay before the Executive Directory the copies of your letters of recall, and of the letters of credence of Mr. Pinckney, whom the President of the United States has appointed to succeed you, in quality of minister plenipotentiary of the United States near the French republic. The Directory has charged me to notify to you "that it will not acknowledge nor receive another minister plenipotentiary from the United States, until after the redress of the grievances demanded of the American Government, and which the French republic has a right to expect from it."

I pray you to be persuaded, citizen minister, that this determination having become necessary, allows to subsist between the French republic and the American people the affection founded upon former benefits and reciprocal interests: an affection which you yourself have taken a pleasure in cultivating by every means in your power.

Accept, citizen minister, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

I waited until next morning, expecting to receive a notification from M. De la Croix, when, not hearing from him I wrote him the following letter:

PARIS, December the 13*th, in the* 21*st year of the independence of the United States of America.*

CITIZEN MINISTER:

Colonel Monroe has been so good as to communicate to me your letter to him of the 21st Frimaire, wherein you inform him that you had submitted to the Executive Directory his letters of recall, and my letters of credence as minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America, and that the Directory had instructed you to notify him 'qu'il ne reconnoitra et ne recevra plus de ministre plenipotentiaire des Etats Unis jusqu'après le redressement des griefs demandé au Gouvernement Americain, et que la république Françoise est en droit d'en attendre.' [That it will not acknowledge nor receive another minister plenipotentiary from the United States, until after the redress of the grievances demanded of the American Government, and which the French republic has a right to expect from it.] This communication has filled me with real sorrow, as I am thoroughly convinced that the sentiments of America and its Government—for they are one—are misunderstood, and that I am not permitted even to attempt to explain them, or, in the terms of my letters of credence, to endeavor "to efface unfavorable impressions, to banish suspicions, and to restore that cordiality which was at once the evidence and pledge of a friendly union." Devoted, as I am, to the liberty, prosperity, and independence of my own country, the freedom, happiness, and perfect establishment of the French republic have always been dear to me, and to have been instrumental in cementing the good understanding which, from the commencement of their alliance, has subsisted between the two nations, would have been the height of my ambition. I most fervently pray that there may be a speedy and candid investigation of those points in which you differ from us, that affection may banish distrust, and that the alliance of the two republics may be perpetual.

In your letter to Colonel Monroe you do not desire him to make any communication to me, and I am indebted to his politeness for the knowledge I have of the intentions of the Directory. I submit to you, citizen minister, that, as the letters of recall had been received by Mr. Monroe, and official copies of his letters of recall, and my letters of credence, had been delivered to you, that the sentiments of the Directory should be communicated by you immediately to me, that I may, without delay, transmit them as from the Executive of this republic to the Government of the United States; and that I may be informed, by you, whether it is the intention of the Directory that I should immediately quit the territories of the republic, or whether I and my family may remain until I hear from my Government. As I have not received the cards which, in your interview, you said I ought to possess in order to enable me to reside here, and that they should be transmitted to me the next morning, I am the more doubtful on this subject than I should otherwise be.

Accept my best respects.

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY.

Citizen De la Croix,
Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic.

This letter I sent by Major Rutledge, who delivered it to M. De la Croix, and made the following report of what passed between them, which he immediately reduced to writing:

Paris, 23*d Frimaire*, (13*th December.*)

I this day waited upon M. De la Croix, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, at two o'clock, as bearer of a letter from General Pinckney. I was admitted immediately on sending in my name, and delivered the letter. Having informed him from whom it came, and that there was a French translation annexed, he opened it and proceeded to read the letter in my presence, which, when he had finished, he desired me to return to General Pinckney as his answer: That the Executive Directory knew of no minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America, since the presentation of Mr. Monroe's letters of recall, and that the Executive Directory had charged him to notify to Mr. Monroe (here he read the quotation contained in the letter) qu'il ne reconnoitra et ne recevra plus de ministre plenipotentiaire des Etats Unis, jusqu'après le redressement des griefs demandé au Gouvernement Americain, et que la république Françoise est en droit d'en attendre. Which notification the Directory relied upon Mr. Monroe's imparting to his own Government, as well as communicating to General Pinckney. Upon my asking him if I understood him rightly, he stopped me, by repeating the substance of what I have mentioned, with the alteration, when he came to the notification of the word American into Federal. He then went on to say, that, with respect to the second subject of General Pinckney's letter, he could return no answer until it was laid before the Directory. I then suggested to him the inconveniences to which General Pinckney was exposed; he replied, that he would take an early opportunity of submitting his letter to the Directory, probably the next day. I asked if General Pinckney should expect an answer; he replied, that their intentions should be signified either to himself or to Mr. Monroe. I then took my leave, and withdrew.

HENRY M. RUTLEDGE.

On the 25th of Frimaire, (15th of December) about three o'clock in the afternoon, a Mr. Giraudet called on me, and said he was chief secretary in the Department of Foreign Affairs; that he came on the part of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, to signify to me that, with respect to my letter to him, (which he produced, together with the translation) he could not directly communicate with me on it, as such direct communication would be acknowledging me as minister, when the Directory had determined not to receive me; that, as to the other part of my letter, relative to remaining here, that he supposed I was acquainted with the laws of France, as they applied to strangers. I told him that I was not acquainted with the local laws of the republic; he said that there was a decree which prevented all foreigners from remaining at Paris without particular permission, which, as the Directory did not mean to grant to me, of course the general law would operate. I answered, that I could not conceive the having a direct communication with me would involve the consequences he stated; that if Mr. Monroe had died before my arrival, the information that they would not acknowledge me, must, of course, have been made to myself. Mr. Monroe having received his letter of recall from our Government, could not now act officially any more than if he had ceased to exist; that I was indebted to Mr. Monroe's politeness for the information I had received of the intention of the Directory not to acknowledge me, but that he had not intended it as an official communication. That, with regard to the laws of France relative to strangers, the law which he had cited did not apply to the requisition of my letter, which was to know whether it was the intention of the Directory that I should quit the territories of the republic, or whether I might remain here until I should hear from my Government. He said, he rather believed that it was the intention that I should quit the territories of the republic; but, as it admitted of a doubt, he would mention it to the minister, with whom he was to dine, and acquaint me with the result in the evening. I told him I should be obliged to him, should it be the intention of the Directory that I should quit the republic, to inform me in what time I was to set out, as my baggage was not arrived from Bordeaux; that I meant not to ask any personal favor, but to have the intention of the Directory clearly expressed, as it related to me, in the situation in which I came to France. He said he would, and expressed a regret at being the bearer of disagreeable information, and then departed. His behavior and manners were very polite.

In the evening, about eight o'clock, he returned, and informed me that, in answer to the doubt which had been entertained in the morning, (a doubt, he observed, which had proceeded from his own inattention to the words of M. De la Croix) the minister could only reply that he understood the Directory to mean the territory of the republic, and not Paris alone, which was to be quitted; that as to the time in which it was necessary to depart, the minister could not designate it, but that he would have another communication with the Directory, and that their intentions should be made known to me in a more explicit manner upon both points; that, at the same time, he must inform me that, in all probability, M. De la Croix would not be the organ through which they would be addressed, as the Minister of the Police Générale would be the officer under whose department my case would come. I replied that I apprehended M. De la Croix was the proper organ through which information should come to me, as he knew the capacity in which I had come to France: whereas, the minister of police might regard me as a mere stranger, and throw me into confinement; that it was in the power of the Directory to receive me, or not: but they could not divest themselves of the knowledge which they had of the public character in which I came to France; that, before I arrived, M. De la Croix had, on the 12th of Frimaire, written to Mr. Monroe, that, as my arrival at Paris might be soon expected, if it had not already taken place, that the custom was for the recalled minister and his successor to send, respectively, copies of their letters of credence and recall to the Minister of Foreign Affairs; that, in consequence of this notification, M. De la Croix was informed in writing, on the 16th Frimaire, the morning after my arrival, by Mr. Monroe, that I was arrived as his successor, and was desirous of waiting on him, for the purpose of presenting a copy of my letter of credence for the Executive Directory of the French republic; that, on the 19th of Frimaire, M. De la Croix informed Mr. Monroe, by letter, that he would receive us, with our letters of credence and recall, between the hours of one and four, if it suited us: agreeably to which notification, we waited on him, and I was introduced to him by Mr. Monroe as his successor; that we presented official copies of our letters of recall and credence; that he promised to lay them before the Directory, and also promised that cards of hospitality should be sent to me and Major Rutledge the next morning; that M. De la Croix, on the 21st Frimaire, wrote to Mr. Monroe, and informed him "that he had laid before the Directory the copy of his letters of recall, and of the letters of credence of Mr. Pinckney, whom the President of the United States had named to succeed him in quality of minister plenipotentiary of the said States near the French republic." From all which circumstances, the character with which I was invested must be apparent both to the Directory and to the Minister of Foreign Affairs; and that, in that character, I was entitled to the protection of the laws of nations, whether the Directory received me or not. If they permitted me to remain until I heard from my Government, I was under the protection of those laws: if they ordered me to quit the territories of the republic, I was still entitled to letters of safe conduct, and passports on my journey out; that this was the case even with ministers of belligerent Powers, much more ought it to apply between us, who were at peace. He said, supposing M. De la Croix had been mistaken in having desired my letters of credence, in seeing me, and in his laying those letters of credence before the Directory, such mistake of the minister could not be binding on the Directory. I replied that it was impossible for me to admit that the Minister of Foreign Affairs had committed a mistake in his official duty: he was held forth to the world as minister; all his acts must be accredited as performed within the line of his duty, and under a competent authority; and that his letter to Mr. Monroe showed he was desirous that the established usage should be complied with. He said he did not allege that there was a mistake: he had only, for argument's sake, urged a supposition, which might be unfounded; that he would communicate what I mentioned to M. De la Croix. I desired him, at the same time, to inform M. De la Croix that I requested whatever further passed might be in writing, that no mistakes might happen by verbal communication, and that I might know explicitly what were the intentions of the Directory. Since this conversation, I have not heard from the Directory, or any of the ministers or their agents. My situation, as you may easily conceive, is unpleasant; but if I can ultimately render any services to my country, I shall be fully compensated: at all events, it shall be my study to avoid increasing the discontent of this Government, without committing the honor, dignity, and respect due to our own. Should I fail in doing this, or should I err in the measures I pursue to accomplish it, the failing will not be in my zeal, but should be charged to my want of ability. At present, I think the ground I have taken has puzzled them: they wish me gone, but they apprehend that it would be too harsh a measure to send off, in a peremptory manner, the minister of my country; though there is no saying what their conduct will ultimately be, as I am informed that they have already sent off thirteen foreign ministers: and a late emigrant, now here, has assured them that America is not of greater consequence to them, nor ought to be treated with greater respect, than Geneva or Genoa. Those who regard us as being of some consequence, seem to have taken up an idea that our Government acts upon principles opposed to the real sentiments of a large majority of our people, and they are willing to temporize until the event of the election of President is known; thinking that, if one public character is chosen, he will be attached to the interest of Great Britain; and that, if another character is elected, he will be (to use the expression of Du Pont de Nemours, in the council of ancients) devoted to the interest of France; entertaining the humiliating idea that we are a people divided by party, the mere creatures of foreign influence, and regardless of our national character, honor, and interest. To eradicate this ill-conceived and unfounded opinion, will be a work of time and labor, so greatly have they been prejudiced by misrepresentation. The reasons that are alleged here for the conduct of the present Government of this country to us, you have already been apprised of from Mr. Adet and Mr. Monroe. The letter of the 21st Frimaire, from M. De la Croix to Mr. Monroe, above recited, shows the distinction which this Government attempts to make between the American people and their Government; at the same time, Major Mountflorence's report to me, which I enclose, shows that the property of the American citizens is not respected in the cases he mentions. I trust that America will show that her sentiments and those of her Government are one; and that she will never suffer any foreign nation to interfere in her concerns; and that an attempt to divide her citizens will be the "signe de ralliement,"* and render them the more united. As much as I am averse to a sea voyage, I should immediately have sailed for Philadelphia, on knowing the determination of the Directory not to acknowledge me, that I might receive personally the instructions of the administration of our Government, more particularly at a time when Congress was sitting; but, as I am informed, the orders to Mr. Adet were issued about the 19th of August, and that the vessel which carried them sailed from L'Orient about the 7th of September, I thought it probable that new instructions might be forwarded to me before I could arrive in America: and I have therefore determined, if the Directory will not suffer me to remain upon the territory of the republic, until I hear from you, to proceed to Amsterdam, and stay there, until I shall receive orders how to act, or whether to return home.

I have seen Mr. Monroe very often since my arrival: his conduct has been open and candid, and I believe he has made me every communication which he thought would be of service to our country. He undoubtedly felt himself hurt at his being superseded; but I am convinced he has not, on that account, left any thing undone which he thought would promote the objects of my mission. The Directory and ministers had, for some time before they were informed of his removal, treated him with great coolness; but, as soon as they heard of his recall, their attentions to him were renewed. Should this Government attempt to make any further communications to me, through him, he has promised me to inform them that he cannot comply with their desire, as his powers have ceased.

I remain, with great respect, &c.

No. 2.

Major Mountflorence's report, given in to General Pinckney, the 19th December, 1796.

CONSULAT AMERICAIN.

PARIS, December 18, 1796.

SIR:

In the absence of Mr. Skipwith I will endeavor, at your desire, to make you a succinct general report of the present situation of our commercial interests in this country, in the best manner that the shortness of the time will admit of.

Since several months, the Executive Directory has given evident symptoms of displeasure towards our Government; which has been generally attributed to the treaty of commerce with Great Britain. In consequence of which, orders have been given to their cruisers to visit every neutral vessel going in, or coming from, an English port, but these orders are common to the Danish and Swedish vessels as well as to our own. Numbers of our vessels have been brought into the ports of France by virtue of these orders, and, in a subsequent report, I shall have the honor of submitting to you a nominative list of all of them, informing you of the several proceedings respecting each of them; several of them have been already released; some of the cargoes temporarily sequestered; and others now libelled before the tribunals of commerce. During the government of the Convention, the committee of public safety had exclusively the cognizance of all matters respecting prizes or captures at sea; which committee gave judgments on the reports of the executive commission of marine; but since the organization of the present constitution, the legislature has passed a law on the 27th of April last, giving power to the tribunals of commerce in every port of France, to take cognizance, in the first instance, of every matter relative to captures at sea; from whose judgments appeals may be carried before the civil tribunals of the respective departments; and one of the articles of the aforesaid law enacts, that in cases of appeals before the departmental tribunals, should the interests of neutrals be concerned, the commissaries of the Executive Directory near the tribunals (whose duties are similar to those of our attorneys general) may, if they see cause, refer the whole proceedings to the minister of justice, to take the opinion of the Directory thereon, before judgment be given by the said tribunals. I deemed it necessary, sir, to enter into these particulars in order to elucidate the proceedings which have lately taken place in respect to some of our vessels, captured and libelled. The tribunals of commerce are chiefly composed of merchants, and most of them are directly or indirectly, more or less, interested in the fitting out of privateers, and therefore are often parties concerned in the controversies they are to determine upon. This happened in the case of Captain John Bryant, of Norfolk, in Virginia, which I beg leave to relate to you: Captain John Bryant, master of the Fanny, of Portsmouth, in Virginia, lost that vessel at sea, having a sea-letter, which he preserved, and was taken up by the brig Francis, of Salem, and carried to Spain; from whence he returned to Norfolk, where, having received the command of the Powhattan, of Richmond, he proceeded in her to London, where the said vessel was sold by the owners. He purchased in England, from our consul, Mr. Joshua Johnson, a prize vessel, the Royal Captain, and traded with her under the flag of the United States, and made several coasting voyages from one French port to another, his ship's papers having been found regular. But lately bound from Flushing to Bordeaux, with a cargo belonging to him, he was captured by a privateer from Boulogne, and brought into that port. The judges of the tribunal were most of them concerned in the privateer, and of course declared the Royal Captain a lawful prize, under pretence that she had no sea-letter. Appeal has been made from that judgment and the case referred to the minister of justice. Mr. Skipwith and myself waited on the minister and had a long conference with him on the proper construction to be made of the 25th article of the treaty of commerce between the United States and France. The minister having acknowledged the Royal Captain and her cargo to be American property; but insisting upon its being liable to condemnation, not being furnished with a sea-letter, we urged to him, that the very article of the treaty upon which he founded his opinion, did not specify seizure or confiscation of vessels which should not be provided with sea-letters; that every penal law was to be construed liberally; that the object of the treaty must have been reciprocal benefit to the merchants and commerce of both countries; that the interpretation given by him to that article would operate in a quite opposite manner, and place the merchants of the United States in a worse situation than if there had been no treaty, which most certainly could never have been the intention of either of the contracting parties; for if there existed no treaty, most undoubtedly an American vessel being brought into a French port would be immediately released, upon due proof being made of her being American property, and consequently neutral. Besides, we alleged that this doctrine had been sanctioned in France since the commencement of hostilities, several hundreds of our vessels having visited their ports, and no exception being taken to the want of sea-letters; indeed they have never been heretofore asked for; that the French Government had sold a very considerable number of prize vessels to our merchants in payment of supplies by them furnished, or otherwise; some of which had been chartered by the very agents of the Government, for sundry voyages in Europe, all of which had no sea-letters, nor could they ever obtain any before they made a voyage to the United States. All we could obtain from the minister, was his saying, that he would reconsider the matter and take the decision of the Directory. Nothing yet has transpired on this subject; but, two days ago, letters from Brest mentioned that the Diana, Captain Ingraham, from Savannah to Europe, sent into Brest by a French privateer, has been condemned by the tribunal of commerce of that port, and that the only motive for condemnation was the want of a sea-letter. I have wrote to Mr. Barnet, the consular agent at Brest, to instruct the counsellor on the appeal to apply to the commissary of the Directory near the tribunal of the department, to have the matter referred to the minister of justice. Should the Directory, sir, decide this important question upon the construction of the 25th article, in the same manner as the tribunals of commerce have done, it would be very alarming to our trade, as we have a vast number of vessels in that predicament, many of which are now in the several ports of France. As to the several claims of the American citizens against the French Government, for supplies furnished here and in the West Indies, spoliations, embargoes at Bordeaux, and at Brest, and other ports, indemnities for illegal captures and detention of our vessels, freights of vessels chartered by the French agents in the United States, drafts of the colonial administrations upon the national treasury, delegations of the said administrations on the ministers of France near the United States; nothing can be done with them for the moment: but this suspension is common to all the claimants of other neutral nations, as likewise to the French creditors; for indeed the embarrassment of their finances is such that many of the officers of Government cannot obtain the payment of the arrears due to them. I deem it also my duty, sir, to inform you that a foreign built sloop, the Nancy, Captain Berry, having been detained at Calais by the custom house officers of that port, the tribunal of commerce ordered her to be released, provided the minister of the United States near the French republic, would countersign her ship's papers. Having at this moment no minister acknowledged by the French republic, Captain Berry writing a very pressing letter to be able to comply with the orders of the aforesaid tribunal, which orders are conformable to a late regulation of the Directory, I have waited on the Minister of Foreign Relations, to submit the difficulty we labor under in that respect, and shall have the honor of communicating to you his answer when it shall be given.

* Signal for rallying.

With great respect, &c.

J. C. MOUNTFLORENCE.

Major General PINCKNEY,
Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, Paris.

A true copy. HENRY M. RUTLEDGE, Secretary.

No. 3.

Extract of a letter from General Pinckney to the Secretary of State.

PARIS, January 6, 1797.

DEAR SIR:

The cessation of Mr. Monroe's functions, and the dormancy of mine in this country, have been attended with many inconveniences to our fellow citizens; among others, the difficulty of obtaining passports to come from the out-ports to Paris, and to go from Paris out of the republic, were complained of; and I conceived it my duty, though not acknowledged by this Government, to endeavor to remedy this grievance: for to our countrymen, arriving here from the territories of a Power at war with the republic, it was really so, as they were put into confinement on their arrival at the port, unless they could give security for their good behavior until they could obtain passports from our minister at Paris—which passports were countersigned by the minister of foreign affairs; and present circumstances did not even admit of these dilatory passports. I, therefore, requested my Secretary, Major Henry Rutledge, to wait upon M. De la Croix on this subject, and desired him, at the same time, to obtain from him, unofficially, an account of what the Directory had resolved, with regard to the points concerning my residence, which Mr. Giraudet had informed me M. De la Croix would submit to their determination. Major Rutledge waited upon M. De la Croix, and made me the following report:

PARIS, December 26, 1796.

I this day, at twelve o'clock, called upon the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and being admitted, after waiting some little time, I informed him that I came on the part of General Pinckney, who had desired me to say that, although he had not the honor to address him in an official capacity, yet his feelings would not excuse him from communicating an article of intelligence, in which the humanity of both nations was interested—it was upon the subject of such of our citizens as had of late arrived in the different ports of France. That, in conformity to the regulations of the police, all foreigners, upon their arrival on the territories of the republic, were arrested and put into confinement until they had obtained from the ministers of their respective countries, near the republic, a passport countersigned by the minister of Foreign Affairs. That the circumstance of having no minister acknowledged by the French republic, had thrown the American citizens into a predicament which had rendered them incapable of complying with the accustomed forms. That the consequence was their having remained for some time past in prison, which, at the present season, was a situation from which they could not be too soon released; it was, therefore, to know in what manner to answer their various applications, and to be informed to what authority he should refer them for relief, that General Pinckney had, at this moment, taken the liberty to trouble him. The minister replied, that an arrêté had been made on the subject, and that, in future, all petitions for passports on behalf of the American citizens, should be addressed to the Minister of the Police Générale. That he would, however, charge himself with any which General Pinckney might have at that moment by him, if he preferred the channel of his department. I thanked him for his politeness, and made a motion to go, but stopped and asked him if he had heard any thing further from the Directory as to their intentions respecting General Pinckney's remaining where he was. He answered, with marks of great surprise, that he thought he had already explained himself with sufficient clearness on the subject; that he had signified to General Pinckney, long since, the impossibility of his staying; that he thought he had exercised much "condescendance," in having been so long silent; which he had been induced to do by General Pinckney's having complained of the delay of his baggage, which, he supposed, must, by this time, have arrived from Bordeaux; that, in short, he should be sorry if his further stay should compel him to give information to the Minister of the Police. To this I replied, that, if he would permit me, I would recall his recollection to the communication which he had been pleased to make to General Pinckney, through his Secretary, Mr. Giraudet; that that gentleman had called on General Pinckney, and had very clearly expressed the wishes of the Directory, in answer to a letter which he had written to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, requesting to know their will; which desire was, that General Pinckney should consider himself in the light of any common stranger, to whom a card of hospitality was refused, and who was compelled, by the laws respecting foreigners, to withdraw from the territories of the republic. That General Pinckney had refused to regard himself in any other light than the one in which he had entered France, which had not been in a private capacity, but in a public character; which circumstance had been officially announced to the Directory, by his having delivered to the Minister of Foreign Affairs a copy of his letters of credence and by other acts. That this precluded all laws relative to strangers from operating on him, and put him under the protection of the law of nations, which he claimed in his favor. That Mr. Giraudet had taken leave with a promise to communicate to the Minister of Foreign Affairs the ground which General Pinckney had taken. That he returned again in the evening, and then said, that the minister would again lay General Pinckney's letter before the Directory, and that their intentions should be made known to him as soon as possible, All this had, no doubt, been faithfully related to him by his secretary. He answered that General Pinckney must have mistaken Mr. Giraudet as to his intention of again laying his letter before the Directory. I told him that it was impossible: for that I had been present at both conversations, in which the material points had passed in English, and been repeated in French. He then said Mr. Giraudet had acted without his authority. I replied, that General Pinckney had, however, waited until this moment in expectation of hearing from him, agreeably to Mr. Giraudet's promise; that he was very far from intending to dispute the will of the Executive Directory; what he wanted was a communication of their wishes in writing. He said that it had already been given. I desired to know when; he answered in the notification which he had made, by their order, to Mr. Monroe; that it had contained their sentiments on Mr. Pinckney's staying, inasmuch as that his not being received, implied that he should depart. I denied that it was a fair deduction; he insisted that it was; I declared that it had not struck General Pinckney or any person with whom he had conversed; but that, however, if such was the construction which he had put upon it, I flattered myself that he could have no objection to throwing his idea upon paper, that General Pinckney might have something more substantial, than the authenticity of the word of his secretary to justify himself to his own Government, for quitting a spot to which he had come in obedience to their orders. The minister here turned from me with some warmth, and said that he should do no such thing; that General Pinckney might make his own deductions; he desired to have no more communications with him. I only replied by a bow, satisfied to end a conversation which had already lasted near half an hour; during which I had not been admitted to the honor of a seat.

HENRY M. RUTLEDGE.

This behavior of M. De la Croix's did not induce me to alter my conduct; I considered that I was at the post where my duty required me to remain until I received orders from my Government how to conduct myself, or till this Government should give me a written mandate to depart, or send me passports as a minister of my country whom they would not suffer to remain here; or would do some unequivocal act respecting me, as would justify me in going. M. De la Croix's conversation with Major Rutledge I did not deem such; I have therefore staid; though notwithstanding the inclemency of a journey for my family, at this season of the year, to Amsterdam, it would have been more agreeable to me to have gone away than to have remained here in this situation. This interview, however, prevented me, until three days ago, from changing my lodgings, which were very expensive and inconvenient; when, not receiving any further intimation to depart, I changed them, and have not yet heard from M. De la Croix. When I was sending away the triplicate and quadruplicate of No. 2, the speech of M. Barras, President of the Directory, to Mr. Monroe, appeared, I, therefore, transmitted it to you in those enclosures. I need not comment on so strange a composition; it, however, evinces the disposition of the directors of this country towards us, and the system which they have adopted, by endeavoring to persuade our countrymen that they can have a different interest from their fellow citizens, whom themselves have chosen to manage their joint concerns. One circumstance, however, attending this speech, you ought not to be unacquainted with. Mr. Monroe assures me that the Directory were not acquainted with a syllable contained in the valedictory address he delivered, till the moment he pronounced it; and that, as soon as he finished, President Barras read his own speech. Of course, the speech of M. Barras was not an answer to Mr. Monroe's specific harangue; but was an answer to every speech which, on that occasion, could possibly have been made. This anecdote does not make the present sentiments and views of the Directory respecting our country less evident.

Whatever the decision of this country may prove with regard to me be assured that I shall endeavor to behave in such a manner as shall neither injure nor compromit the respect due to our own; and that no personal slights can prevent me from most earnestly praying, that the independence and liberty of France may be firmly secured by a speedy and honorable peace.

Extract of a letter from General Pinckney to the Secretary of State, dated

AMSTERDAM, February 18, 1797.

DEAR SIR:

I arrived here last night, after an expensive and tedious journey, through some very bad roads, from Paris. My letters No. 6,* of which I forwarded to you quadruplicates from that city, will inform you that the day after accounts were received of Bonaparte's successes in Italy, Mr. De la Croix gave me, by direction of the Executive Directory, official notice in writing to quit the territories of the French republic: as this was complying with what I had declared to be a requisite preliminary to my departure. I did not think it proper to remain longer at Paris than was necessary to prepare for my journey; and, having received the customary passports for this city, I set out with my family and secretary on the fifth instant. I shall remain here, or in some part of the United Provinces, till I receive directions from you how to act. I regret that my mission to Europe, at the same time that it has been very unpleasant to myself, should be both expensive and unprofitable to my country. Could I be of any service, I should disregard personal inconvenience, and the idea of benefiting my country would soften the asperities of a situation rendered particularly disagreeable by the conduct of a Government with whom we wish to be on the most amicable terms, and yet who disregards and annihilates the usual mode of conciliatory explanation established between independent nations. Mr. Giraudet, the chief secretary in the Department of Foreign Affairs at Paris, mentioned to Major Rutledge, a few days before I left Paris that, as we were not going far, he hoped he should soon see us return. This I imagine was only the language of politeness; it certainly was not spoken officially, and I have not the least idea that I shall receive any invitation from France; though I ardently wish for a return of the good sense and good humor of that republic.

No. 5.

Extract of a letter from General C. C. Pinckney, to the Secretary of State, dated

AMSTERDAM, March 5, 1797.

Some time before I left Paris, I was informed that the Directory had requested the Dutch to join them in treating neutral vessels in the same manner as by their decree in Messidor they had determined to treat them. As I did not obtain this information from a source that I could depend on, I did not trouble you with it; but I have since had reason to believe that it was either true, or the Dutch were apprehensive such requisition would be made; for I have just received intelligence, which I am persuaded I may rely on, that the Dutch have informed the Directory, that it would be exceedingly prejudicial to them to join in so hostile a measure, for that they would thereby lose the friendship and trade of America, which (considering their commercial losses) were of extensive benefit to them, and they would be deprived of the means of affording the French those aids which their commerce enabled them to do. In these reasons, my information adds, the French have acquiesced, and there is now no apprehension that our commerce will be molested by the Dutch. If the French had not consented to this, there is little doubt but the Dutch would have been obliged to have treated us as the French do: for there are twenty-five thousand French troops in Batavia, and it is here no secret, that they can direct what measures they please.

I transmit you extracts of Major Mountflorence's letters to me of the 14th and 21st of February, relative to the infamous conduct of some of our countrymen, (I blush to call them so) in fitting out privateers under French colors, and plundering our fellow-citizens. Something energetic, I trust, will be done by our Government with respect to these unprincipled marauders.

No. 6.

Extract of a letter from Major Mountflorence to General Pinckney, dated

PARIS, February 14, 1797.

A letter from Mr. Barnet, our consular agent at Brest, under date of the 3d instant, informs me that a French privateer, owned by Captain Cowell, a citizen native of the United States, and formerly master of the Jane, has captured lately two of our vessels, and sent them to L'Orient; one of them is a ship of four hundred tons, belonging to Boston, and bound from New Orleans to London; the other is a brig from Baltimore to London, with a very rich cargo of sugar, cotton, &c. Another letter of the said agent of the 7th informs me, that though he is certain that these two vessels and their cargoes are American property, yet it is generally believed that, by the intrigues of the aforesaid Captain Cowell, and of a certain Captain Benjamin Lewis, of Marblehead, that the whole will be condemned. I blush when I think on the conduct of some of our countrymen in this country; not satisfied with violating the laws of the United States, respecting our neutrality, but arming vessels under French colors to plunder their co-citizens. Besides, sir, I have it from good authority, that those Americans, who are interested in fitting out privateers, are constantly teasing this Government with applications for more severe orders to cruise against our vessels, and it is really our own countrymen who endeavor to irritate matters between us. The same agent informs me that a large number of our sailors, found on board of English vessels, are now detained as prisoners of war at Brest. I had formerly recommended to that officer to use all his endeavors to procure the release of such as he should be satisfied were really Americans, and that he has done; but his last letter mentions that the Minister of the Marine has lately given orders not to release any more of the citizens of the United States, who may be taken on board British vessels. A new embargo was laid on the 7th instant at Brest, which is the third since General Hoche's expedition.

Extract of a letter from Major Mountflorence to General Pinckney, dated

PARIS, February 21, 1797.

Without any of your favors to answer, it is my duty to inform you that a letter from Mr. Vail, our consular agent at L'Orient, under date of the 12th instant, informs that the American ships Hope, Captain Rogers, and Antelope, of Boston, Captain Benjamin Hilton, captured by the privateer Hardy, Captain Cowell, (the man I mentioned in my last) and carried into L'Orient, are now libelled; and the only reason upon which this American captor grounds his claim, is that the seamen's articles are not countersigned by an American public officer; I cannot find that the laws of the United States require that formality; and the truth is, that not an American vessel in an hundred has the seamen's articles countersigned in that manner; but Cowell's attorney pretends that an antiquated, an obsolete ordonnance of France, of the year 1750, authorizes all ships of war to arrest such vessels, as have them not, as pirates. The tribunal of commerce has refused pronouncing in this question till they receive instructions from the Executive, having written on the subject to the three ministers of Justice, Marine, and Foreign Relations, and I am going to do the same, but my application will be signed by Mr. Skipwith. Mr. Vail further adds, with much truth, "the American commerce very much depends upon the fate of these two vessels, and the hopes of the privateers are placed greatly on these vessels being condemned;" and in another place he writes that most of the privateers are owned or commanded by Americans, who create these difficulties.

Another letter from Mr. Le Baron fils, our consular agent at Dieppe, informs that the American ship Hare, of New York, Captain Nathan Haley, of the burthen of two hundred and eighty tons, has been sent into Dieppe on the 17th instant, having been captured by a French privateer. These captures alarm very much our traders. If this Government sanctions the doctrine held out at the tribunal at L'Orient, it would be tantamount to a state of warfare, as almost every vessel we have now in Europe are in that predicament.

Extract of a letter from General Pinckney to the Secretary of State, dated

AMSTERDAM, March 8, 1797.

I have just received intelligence from Major Mountflorence, that the tribunal-civil of the Department of the Pas de Calais has confirmed the judgment of the tribunal of commerce, condemning, as lawful prize, the American vessel Royal Captain, John Bryant master and owner, for want of a sea-letter. I understand that it is a Captain Nathan Haley, an American, who commanded the privateer under French colors, which captured and carried into Dieppe, the 17th ultimo, the American ship Hare, commanded by a namesake and cousin of his, bound from England to New York with a cargo, it is said, of fifty thousand pounds sterling. Mr. Barnet, our consular agent at Brest, informs me that several citizens of the United States, who were captured in British vessels, on board of whom they had been pressed, are at present confined in the prisons of that place as prisoners of war, and suffer much by close confinement and bad provisions, and that all his solicitations in their behalf, since the latter end of January, have been in vain. These injurious acts to our countrymen and trade are exceedingly distressing, nor can it be said when they will cease. It is thought by many, and I believe justly, that the election of their new third will determine France either to conciliation or avowed hostilities; as much as I wish for the former, I wish the measures of our Government will be dispassionate and candid, but firm. Mean submissions are generally returned with contempt and renewed oppression.

To Mr. Monroe's Valedictory Address to the Executive Directory, the President replied:

Mr. minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America: By presenting to-day your letters of recall to the Executive Directory, you give to Europe a very strange spectacle.

France, rich in her liberty, surrounded by a train of victories, strong in the esteem of her allies, will not abase herself by calculating the consequences of the condescension of the American Government to the suggestions of her former tyrants; moreover, the French republic hopes that the successors of Columbus, Ramhiph,* and Penn, always proud of their liberty, will never forget that they owe it to France. They will weigh, in their wisdom, the magnanimous benevolence of the French people with the crafty caresses of certain perfidious persons who meditate bringing them back to their former slavery. Assure the good American people, sir, that, like them, we adore liberty; that they will always have our esteem; and that they will find in the French people republican generosity, which knows how to grant peace, as it does to cause its sovereignty to be respected.

As to you, Mr. minister plenipotentiary, you have combated for principles; you have known the true interests of your country: depart with our regret. In you we give up a representative to America, and retain the remembrance of the citizen whose personal qualities did honor to that title.

March 2, 1797.

The Executive Directory having consulted the law of the 9th of March, 1793, considering that the flags of neutral Powers being no longer respected by the enemies of the French republic, and all the rights of men being violated to their prejudice, it is no longer permitted to the French people towards those Powers, in general, that wish which they have so often manifested, and which they will constantly entertain for the full and entire freedom of commerce and navigation, directs, among other dispositions:

I. That ships of war and privateers may stop and bring into the ports of the republic neutral ships, which shall be charged in whole or in part with merchandise belonging to the enemy.

II. That merchandise belonging to the enemy shall be declared good and lawful prizes, and be confiscated to the profit of the captors.

III. That, in all cases, neutral ships shall be released the moment that the merchandise seized is discharged; that the freight of it shall be paid at the rate which shall have been stipulated by the consigners; and that a just indemnity shall be granted, on account of their detention, by the tribunals competent to decide on the validity of prizes.

IV. That these tribunals shall be directed, besides, to send, three days after the decision, a double inventory of the merchandise to the Minister of Marine, and another to the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

V. That the present law, applicable to all the captures that have been made since the declaration of war, shall cease to have effect as soon as the enemy shall have declared non-seizable, although destined for the ports of the republic, the merchandise laden on board neutral ships which shall belong to the Government or to French citizens.

Having seen the law of the 27th of July, 1793, which directs the foregoing law to be fully executed; having also seen the seventh article of the law of the 13th Nivose, third year, which enjoins all the agents of the republic to respect and observe, in all their dispositions, the treaties which unite France to the neutral Powers of the continent, and to the United States of America; considering that this last is not derogatory to the law of the 9th of May, 1793, resolves as follows:

Art. I. The commissaries of the Executive Directory, with the civil tribunals of the department, shall take care that, in the contests upon the validity of maritime prizes, no decision shall be founded on the seventh article of the law of the thirteenth Nivose, without the minister of Justice having been previously consulted, conformably to the third article of the law of the eighth Floreal, fourth year, relative to the treaties, in virtue of which neutral persons pretend to withdraw themselves, by means of the first of these laws, from the execution of that of the 9th of March, 1793.

Art. II. The minister of Justice shall examine whether the treaties still subsist, or whether they have been modified since the conclusion of them; there shall be furnished to them, by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, all the documents of which they shall stand in need, and reference shall be made to the Executive Directory, as it is prescribed by the law of the eighth Floreal, fourth year.

Art. III. The Directory remind all the French citizens that the treaty concluded on the 6th of February, 1778, between France and the United States, has been, on the terms of the second article, modified of full right by that which has been concluded at London, on the 19th of November, 1794, between the United States of America and England: in consequence,

1. After the article seventeen of the treaty of London, of the 19th of November, 1794, all merchandise of the enemy's, of merchandise not sufficiently ascertained to be neutral, conveyed under American flags, shall be confiscated; but the ship on board of which such merchandise shall be found, shall be released, and given to the proprietor. The commissaries of the Directory are enjoined to accelerate, by all means in their power, the decision of the contests which shall arise, either upon the validity of the captures or the cargoes, or upon freights and insurances.

2. According to the eighteenth article of the treaty of London, dated the 19th of November, 1794, relative to articles declared contraband by the twenty-fourth article of the treaty, dated February 6th, 1778, are added the following:

Ship timber; oakum, pitch, and rosin; copper for sheathing vessels; sails, hemp, and cordage; and every thing which serves, directly or indirectly, to the arming and equipping of vessels, excepting bar iron, and fir in planks. These articles shall be confiscated as often as they shall be destined or attempted to be carried to the enemy.

3. According to the first article of the treaty of London, of the above date, every American who shall hold a commission from the enemies of France, as well as every seaman of that nation composing the crew of the ships and vessels, shall, by this fact alone, be declared piratical, and treated as such, without suffering the party to establish that the act was the consequence of threats or violence.

4. In pursuance of the law of the 14th of February, 1793, the regulations of the 21st of October, 1744, and of the 28th of July, 1778, respecting the manning of vessels and neutral merchandise, shall be complied with, according to their form and tenor.

Every American ship shall therefore be deemed a lawful prize, which shall not have on board a bill of lading in due form, according to the plan annexed to the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, the execution of which is enjoined by the twenty-fifth and twenty-seventh articles of that treaty.

* Probably intended for Raleigh.

5. The commissioners of the Executive Directory are required to carry into effect the penalties that attach on all clandestine attempts that may be made by American, or vessels belonging to any other nation, to pass as neutral, on board the vessel where the fraud is attempted to be practised, in the manner that these penalties have been repeatedly carried into effect during the present war. The penalty shall attach where the blanks in the consignments and invoices are not filled up, though signed and sealed; where the papers are in the form of letters, containing fictitious signatures; where are double passports or policies, specifying different destinations; where consignment is made to two or more factors; and where there are different receipts or papers of any kind, which consign the whole or part of the same goods to different owners or different destinations.

6. By this article, provisions of the treaty of the ninth Frimaire last, relative to the freight and insurance, are repealed as far as they apply to insurance.

7. The present treaty shall be published in the bulletin of the laws. The ministers of Marine and of the Colonies, of Justice, and of Foreign Affairs, are charged with the execution of it in their respective departments.

Extract of a letter from John Q. Adams, Esquire, minister resident of the United States near the Batavian republic to the Secretary of State, dated

THE HAGUE, November 4, 1796.

In the letter from the committee of foreign affairs, a copy of which was enclosed with my last, they have raised pretensions and used expressions, upon which I have not thought it necessary to anticipate the opinion which you will form or the notice which you may think proper to take of them. But, as it is possible that the tone and ideas may appear extraordinary, I think it necessary to add a few observations, and some particulars of information, which will make them more accountable.

The general disposition, even of the patriotic party in this country, favors cordially and sincerely the neutrality of the United States. They have a very substantial reason for this disposition, as they are continually receiving remittances of interests upon their moneys loaned to the United States, and as these are almost the only public funds upon which the payments are still punctual, they apprehend that the difficulties and the necessities of war might produce a suspension or postponements on the part of the United States similar to those of which many of the belligerent Powers have given examples. But at the same time, the patriotic party can have no avowed will different from that which may give satisfaction to the Government of France. They feel a dependence so absolute and irremoveable upon their good will, that they sacrifice every other inclination, and silence every other interest, when the pleasure of the French Government is signified to them in such a manner as makes an election necessary.

I received, not long ago, an intimation, that one of the members of the committee of foreign affairs had confidentially communicated to a friend, a circumstance which was intended to be kept profoundly secret: it was, that the French Government had determined to defeat, if possible, the treaty lately concluded between the United States and Great Britain, and had signified to the committee of foreign affairs here their expectation, that they would concur, with all their influence, towards the same object. The tenor of their letter strongly serves to show the accuracy of the information. The object which the last paragraph of their letter aims at, is not at all equivocal; but in considering the manner in which they urge their proposals, the address with which they pursue their point may be ranged on a level with their logic. After having undertaken formally to justify the condemnation of the Wilmington Packet's cargo, because they concluded it to be French property, they make no difficulty to assume a right to insist upon the protection of Batavian property on board of American vessels. They call very loudly upon the United States to go to war with Great Britain, and make a common cause with the French and Batavian republics. The whole of this singular passage might have excited a stronger sentiment than it did, had I not previously received the intimation mentioned above. Considering their language as dictated by an irresistible external impulse, an excuse for its singularity was derived from the necessities of their situation. In the answer which I have given, therefore, it was my endeavor to avoid every unnecessary discussion, and, as far as possible, every unpleasant expression; but the inconsistency of their pretensions with their own argument, could not be passed without notice. Their oblique insinuation, of treaties formed by the United States militating with that before contracted with this republic, I thought it necessary to repel in the most decided and explicit manner. Their assertion of numerous services rendered by their republic to the American nation, authorized the reference in the answer to the reciprocal services and common utility, upon which I conceived the engagements between the two nations to be founded. As they very clearly hint a wish that the United States should violate some treaty concluded after that with the Batavian republic, and make a common cause with them and France, I thought the honor and dignity of my country, and its Government, required an explicit declaration in answer, that they would inviolably maintain their engagements with all other nations, as faithfully as with this; but I did not think it necessary, though it might have been not unfair, to observe that their proposal, of a common cause to be made with the French republic, could not be made by them without her concurrence, or that the energy which they would insist upon for the protection of their property in American vessels would be unnecessary, if it were efficaciously employed in giving security to the navigation of their own flag. It may be mentioned here, that the American flag is not the only one, for the honor of which these gentlemen have taken so deep and so generous a concern. They, some time since, interested themselves in a similar manner for the honor of the Danish neutrality, until they were given to understand, by the Count de Bernstorff, that the Government of Denmark was the proper judge of its own honor, and was not disposed to listen to their instigations upon its concerns with other nations.

Extract of a letter from the Commission of Foreign Affairs of the Batavian National Assembly, to the minister resident of the United States of America, dated

THE HAGUE, September 27, 1796.

We cannot let the present opportunity pass, without requesting you to state to your Government how useful it would be to the interests of the inhabitants of the two republics, that the United States should at last seriously take to heart the numberless insults daily committed on their flag by the English; to represent to them, that when circumstances oblige our commerce to confide its interests to the neutral flag of American vessels, it has a just right to insist that that flag be protected with energy, and that it be not insulted at the expense of a friendly and allied nation. Deign to recall to the remembrance of the nation of which you are minister, that the numerous services which our republic has rendered to it, our reciprocal relations, as well as mutual utility, imperiously require that it should cease to view with indifference the manner in which the English act, who carry off, with impunity, from on board American vessels the property of Batavians. Lead them to perceive that reasons of convenience, treaties concluded subsequent to that with the Batavian republic, cannot change or annul a treaty formally concluded and ratified between our two nations, between two nations who have equally suffered from the arrogance and despotism on the seas of proud Albion: in a word, between two nations who, making common cause with the French republic, and governing themselves by the imprescriptible rights of nature, and of men, may render to the two hemispheres a peace for which humanity languishes.

Extract of a letter from John Quincy Adams, Esquire, minister resident of the United States at the Hague, to the Committee of Foreign Relations of the Batavian National Assembly, dated

THE HAGUE, October 31, 1796.

I shall not fail to transmit also to the Government of the United States, the other observations which you have thought proper to make to me on this occasion. It does not belong to me to judge, with what sentiments it will view that part of your letter, in which you complain of the seizure of Dutch property on board American vessels, when it compares it with the other part where you suppose that the quality, necessary to procure the protection of the American flag for the lading of a vessel, did not exist, because the lading appeared to you to be French property. But you, yourselves, on reflection will, I hope, be convinced, that these two claims are not easy to be reconciled.

But I will take upon myself, citizens, to assure you, that it is unnecessary to remind the nation, whose minister I have the honor to be, that "reasons of convenience, or treaties posterior to that concluded with the Batavian republic, cannot destroy or annul that treaty." I can answer, before hand, that the Government of the United States is perfectly sensible of this truth, and has always conducted itself agreeably to the principles on which it is founded. In all posterior engagements it has reserved to itself the power of fulfilling all prior ones; it will ever fulfil those which reciprocal utility and services have caused it to contract with the Batavian republic; and, while it religiously observes all the obligations of its treaties with other nations, it will, in like manner, observe all those which you have a right to demand from it.

Mr. Adams will inform you from the Hague of what is passing in that quarter; but, lest his opportunities of writing should be less frequent than mine, it may be proper to state, that I have reason to believe, though the French Government assign our treaty with England as the cause of their maritime conduct towards us, that they have recently demanded of Hamburg and Bremen to suspend all commerce with England. These cities have not yet complied, and the French minister has been recalled from Hamburg. The same demand has been made at Copenhagen, and the refusal has produced a sharp diplomatic controversy. These Powers have made no late treaties with England.

Letter from the Minister of Spain to the Secretary of State, dated

MAY 6, 1797.

SIR:

The King, my master, desirous of drawing closer the connexions of friendship and good correspondence already subsisting between Spain and the United States, concluded with them, on the 27th of October, 1795, a treaty dictated by the most generous principles, opening to the Americans the navigation of the Mississippi to the ocean, and ceding to the United States a considerable portion of territory, by agreeing to draw a line of demarcation between the possessions of both parties. Equally animated by the desire of diminishing for humanity the horrors of war, he adopted the liberal principle, that free ships shall make free goods. This stipulation was in reality an incalculable advantage for the American citizens, who, by the extension of their navigation, the geographical situation of their country, and the nature of their political connexions at that epoch, promised a neutrality as advantageous as durable. At the same time, His Majesty agreed by the said treaty, that articles necessary for the construction and repair of vessels should not be deemed contraband. In a word, the concessions on the part of Spain for cementing a sincere union between both nations were such, that the treaty was received throughout the United States with enthusiasm, and with the most evident marks of general approbation. In these circumstances, the King, my master, who had so efficaciously advanced the interests of America, promised himself, by the effect of a good correspondence, as sacred among nations as between individuals, that the United States at least would not contribute to the injury of Spain. What should be the surprise [admiracion] of His Majesty on knowing that this country had contracted engagements with England prejudicial to his rights, and to the interests of his subjects, nearly at the same time in which, with so much liberality, he was giving to the United States the most striking proofs of the most sincere friendship.

Upon the whole, the King, my master, well persuaded that England, in her treaty with America, had surprised the good faith of the Federal Government, reserved to himself to make, on a proper opportunity, the necessary representations; not doubting but that the equity of the United States would place Spain, in relation to other Powers, upon that footing of equality, without which the neutrality adopted by America would exist only in appearance, and be purely nominal; but experiencing, since the declaration of the war against Great Britain, injuries and evils which he had foreseen, from the moment he was informed of the English treaty, he finds himself under the necessity of anticipating this step, and therefore has ordered me to make to this Government, through you, the following observations:

By the 15th article of the treaty concluded between His Majesty and the United States, it is stipulated, that the subjects of the King, and the American citizens, may navigate with their vessels and cargoes freely to all the ports, except such as are declared blockaded, making the neutral flag secure the goods which they may have on board, so that they cannot be seized, even though they should belong to an enemy. His Majesty hastened with pleasure to adopt a principle so useful to humanity, although for the reasons hinted above, it was to operate more advantageously to the American citizens than to his subjects. His Majesty ought to have expected, on the part of the American Government, dispositions equally friendly, and as their adoption would not prove injurious to those Powers who should establish them, that this should form a general rule in all their engagements of a like nature; but, unfortunately, the 17th article of the English treaty has dissipated this agreeable hope: for, it not only permits English vessels to take and carry into port those of America, upon the arbitrary ground of suspicion, but also to take and seize enemy property or merchandise found under the American flag. In short, the principle, that free ships make free goods, was then destroyed; and His Majesty is reduced to the disadvantageous situation of seeing the property of his subjects seized with impunity, under the safeguard of neutrality, whilst a state of war requires that his squadrons and ships should respect English property on board of American vessels. Can it then be supposed, with good faith, that the King intended voluntarily to go into a stipulation, the observance of which should require from his subjects nothing but detriment and injury? An adherence to the principle adopted by the King implicitly leads him to a reciprocity complete in all its circumstances.

Nor are the injuries to Spain, arising out of the 18th article of the treaty with Great Britain, less palpable. From it, like the preceding, arise great losses to the American navigation; but the damages which the subjects of the King and his royal service experience, are still of much greater consideration. By that article, England and the United States agree, that timber for ship building, tar, rosin, copper, in sheets, sails, hemp, cordage, and, generally, whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels, shall be declared contraband. In the 16th article of the treaty with Spain, after enumerating those articles which should be deemed such, it is stipulated, that all kinds of cotton, hemp, flax, tar, pitch, ropes, cables, sails, sail cloth, anchors, wood of all kinds, and all other things proper for the construction and repair of vessels, shall be looked upon as articles of free commerce. What then is the consequence of these contradictory stipulations? Is it not abandoning to England the exclusive commerce of naval stores? And is it not giving her, in a maritime war like the present, a powerful arm, which she uses to the injury of Spain, whilst the latter must suffer from avarice, or the high price of an article to her so absolutely necessary? You will say in reply, that Spain entered voluntarily into these stipulations; but could it ever have been expected, that America would have made, almost at the same moment, such, on her part, as should cause the King, my master, to repent of his generosity and great beneficence.

In the preamble to the Spanish treaty, its object is said to be for the mutual advantage and reciprocal utility of both countries. I leave you to determine what advantages either Spain or America can derive from the 15th and 16th articles of their treaty, whilst those of the 17th and 18th of the English treaty remain in full force.

Thus far, I have represented merely the injury done to the interests of Spain; but I shall now state to you a point in which her rights are essentially concerned—I mean the navigation of the Mississippi.

The just ground upon which Spain refused to acknowledge the mutual and illegal cession which England made to the United States, in the 8th article of the treaty of 3d September, 1783, of the free navigation of the Mississippi to the ocean; the necessity in which America has found herself of recurring to a special treaty with Spain for obtaining it, and above all, the tenor of the 4th article of the said treaty, in which it is agreed, that the free navigation of the said river to the ocean belongs exclusively to the subjects of the King, and to the citizens of the United States, had given His Majesty reason to believe, that the federal Government, by this stipulation, annulled, as illegal, the claim which it had made with England, as to this point, in the 8th article of the treaty of 1783. But His Majesty has seen with equal surprise, that the United States not only pretend to confirm that right to England by the 3d article of their commercial treaty, but that they have, since the conclusion of that with Spain, in which the navigation of the Mississippi is confined exclusively to the Spaniards and Americans, agreed to the explanatory article signed here by yourself and the English chargé des affaires, Mr. Bond, on the 4th of May, 1796, in which it is declared, that no other stipulation or treaty concluded since by either of the contracting parties, with any other Power or nation, is understood in any manner to derogate from the right to the free communication and commerce guarantied by the 3d article of the treaty to the subjects of His Britannic Majesty.

The King, my master, finds so much the more difficulty in reconciling this stipulation concerning the navigation of the Mississippi, in article 3d, of the English treaty, confirmed by the explanatory article of the 4th of May, with the 4th article of that with Spain, as on examining the original right of England, none is found to exist, and the United States alone hold that which Spain ceded in the said article of the treaty with them. In order to convince you of this, let us examine the stipulations of the former treaties, from which I give the following extract:

By the 6th article of the preliminary treaty made on the 3d November, 1762, between France and Great Britain, and by the definitive treaty signed on the 10th of February, 1763, it is stipulated that all that part of Louisiana situated on the east of the Mississippi, excepting New Orleans and its dependencies, should belong to Great Britain.

By the 8th article of the provisional treaty concluded between the United States of America and Great Britain, on the 30th November, 1782, and the definitive treaty signed on the 3d of September, 1783, it is stated, that the navigation of the Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, shall for ever remain and be free to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States.

By the preliminary articles of the treaty concluded between Spain and England, and the definitive treaty signed on the 3d of September, 1783, Great Britain ceded to Spain all East and West Florida, which two provinces were the only territory that that nation had remaining in this part of the continent.

In the 5th article, in which this session is stipulated, not a single word is said relative to the navigation of the Mississippi, nor do the other articles say any thing on the subject.

When England signed these preliminary articles with the United States of America, in 1782, Great Britain still held all the right to East and West Florida, because then she had not ceded for ever those provinces to Spain, as is proved afterwards by the treaty of 1783, and without the least mention therein of the Mississippi.

Therefore, England having ceded East and West Frorida in 1783, and not having reserved the right to the navigation of the Mississippi, of course lost it entirely when she made Spain mistress of the two banks.

The only right which the United States had in the navigation of that river was founded on the stipulations derived from England; but having changed their political existence by the declaration of their independence, and having by this act separated their interests from those of Great Britain, the liberty of navigating the Mississippi did not follow to the United States, but by a special treaty which has just been concluded between Spain and this country.

So far good; how can the United States without the consent of Spain, cede to England the right of navigating the Mississippi which is granted only to themselves? And in virtue of what privilege can the Federal Government give the navigation of this river to a nation who has renounced all her rights through the medium of solemn treaties, and who not only does not hold a single port, but also does not possess a single inch of land on its banks?

This simple exposition, in conjunction with the opinion of all jurists, that the navigation of rivers naturally belongs to him who possesses the two banks, evidently manifests the injury done to the rights of Spain in the 3d article of the English treaty, and the explanatory article signed on the fourth of May, 1796.

The King of Spain, desirous of preserving the best harmony and friendship with this country, as protector of the interests of his subjects, has ordered me to represent to this Government what I have just mentioned, and his Majesty, relying upon the equity of his demands, hopes that the United States, animated by the same sentiments, will come to a composition, which, without injuring the American citizens, shall ensure the happiness of his subjects, and guard the rights of his sovereignty.

I with pleasure embrace this opportunity of renewing my wishes to serve you, and that God may preserve your life many years.

Your most obedient servant,

CARLOS MARTINEZ DE YRUJO.

Letter from the Secretary of State to the Minister of His Catholic Majesty, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Philadelphia, May 17, 1797.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, which has been laid before the President of the United States. It contains three subjects of complaint, as arising out of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and Great Britain.

1. That the principle, that free ships make free goods, is thereby destroyed; the 17th article not only permitting, English vessels to take and carry into port those of America, upon the arbitrary ground of suspicion, but also to take and seize enemies' property or merchandise found under the American flag.

2. That by the 18th article of that treaty, timber for ship building, tar, rosin, copper in sheets, sails, hemp, and cordage, and generally whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels, are declared contraband.

3. That by the third article of that treaty, and the explanatory article added thereto, the United States have ceded and confirmed to Great Britain the right of navigating the river Mississippi; a right which you say the United States themselves acquired only by virtue of their treaty with Spain.

Your letter also contains various intimations, which, in connexion with these three topics of complaint, it will be proper for me to notice.

It is very true, that our treaty with Spain was received throughout the United States with satisfaction and general approbation, because it closed a dispute, which had been pending many years between the two countries, by His Catholic Majesty's acceding to the claims of the United States (which they deemed founded in right) to the free navigation of the Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, and to their southern boundary line as described in the treaty of peace of 1783, between the United States and Great Britain. We were also satisfied with the engagement of His Catholic Majesty to compensate our mercantile citizens for the losses they had sustained by the capture of their vessels and cargoes by the subjects of His Majesty, during the late war between Spain and France. All these were acts of substantial justice, which were necessarily approved by every upright mind. All the other stipulations of the treaty between the United States and His Catholic Majesty were wholly voluntary, and perfectly reciprocal; so that neither of the two contracting parties could say, that they had granted or received a favor. I make this observation, because of the numerous intimations in your letter, that by these other stipulations, benefits and advantages had been granted by His Catholic Majesty to the United States, without receiving from them any equivalent: intimations for which we see no foundation. To instance in the articles which constitute the two first subjects of your complaint.

1. Free ships shall make free goods. It is impossible that the two contracting parties should ever have conceived that this rule, as between themselves, could have any operation, except when one was at war and the other at peace. The United States, being in the latter situation, have a right to carry in their vessels goods of the enemies of Spain, without being liable, on that account, to capture. On the other hand, if the United States were at war, and Spain at peace, her subjects would have a right to transport in their vessels the goods of our enemies, free from capture by the armed vessels of the United States. And thus this stipulation is exactly equal on both sides.

2. Ship timber and naval stores are, by the law of nations, contraband of war. But the United States and Spain, for their mutual benefit, agreed to consider them as free goods, in order that either party remaining at peace might safely continue its commerce in those articles, even by carrying them to the enemies of the other. And thus this rule will operate equally, like the former.

You compare the liberal stipulations in these two articles with those of a contrary nature in the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, and ask, what should be the surprise [admiracion] of His Catholic Majesty on knowing of the latter engagements? After remarking, that, if those stipulations were liberal on the part of Spain, they were alike liberal on the part of the United States, seeing they were perfectly reciprocal;—permit me to say, that the engagements with Great Britain do not appear to offer any cause for "surprise" on the part of His Catholic Majesty: because His Majesty had seen, during the whole course of the American war, how steadily Great Britain persisted, in opposition to the demands of all the maritime powers, to maintain her claims under the law of nations, to capture enemies' property, and timber, and naval stores, as contraband, in neutral ships. His Majesty had also seen in the present war, in which he was for a time a party with Great Britain against France, that Great Britain continued to avow and practise upon the same principles. And with such a perfect knowledge of the principles and conduct of Great Britain, and while she was still engaged in the war with a Power, which she strenuously endeavored to deprive of timber and naval stores, and whose mercantile shipping was greatly reduced, could His Catholic Majesty expect that Great Britain would relinquish her legal rights to a nation (the United States) which abounded in materials for building and equipping ships, and whose vessels adapted to the carrying trade traversed every sea and visited every quarter of the globe? You seem to imagine there is the more reason for "surprise," because, as you say, the engagements between the United States and Great Britain were contracted "nearly at the same time"—"almost at the same moment" with our stipulations with His Catholic Majesty. But allow me to bring to your recollection the periods when these different treaties were formed. That with Great Britain was concluded on the 19th day of November, 1794: that with Spain, on the 27th of October, 1795. Further, the treaty with Great Britain was published in Philadelphia, on the first day of July, 1795: almost four months before the treaty with His Catholic Majesty was concluded; and nearly ten months before it received his ratification, at which time (Spain and the United States being then at peace with all the world) it does not appear that His Catholic Majesty found the smallest difficulty in giving his final sanction to his treaty with the United States, on account of their prior treaty with Great Britain. Moreover, Mr. Thomas Pinckney, who negotiated the treaty with Spain, being privy to the whole negotiation with Great Britain, and perfectly acquainted with every article of the British treaty, it is hardly to be doubted, that he communicated to the Prince of Peace every information concerning it which had any relation to his negotiation with Spain. The mode of proceeding in the cases of captures of American vessels is precisely the same in both treaties, and the most material expressions in the 7th article of the British treaty are copied into the 21st of the treaty with Spain.

I am now to consider your third complaint—that relating to the navigation of the Mississippi.

You enter into an examination of the right of the United States to this navigation, and draw this conclusion, that their right is derived solely from the cession of His Catholic Majesty by the 4th article of his treaty with the United States. Hence you are induced to ask, "How can the United States, without the consent of Spain, cede to England the right of navigating the Mississippi, which is granted only to themselves?" If, sir, your statement was correct, there could be no question in the case. If the right of the United States to the navigation of the Mississippi originated in their treaty with Spain, which was concluded on the 27th of October, 1795, it requires no argument to prove that they could not have granted the right of that navigation to Great Britain on the 19th of November, 1794.

But I might deny that the United States ever granted the right of navigating the Mississippi to Great Britain. A recurrence to the treaties, to which you refer, will prove that she possessed that right by the peace of 1763, and that she has never formally relinquished it. I do not, indeed, conceive the inquiry essential to the subject of your present complaint; but as you have thought fit to go into it, you will allow me to follow you.

By the definitive treaty of peace concluded the 10th of February, 1763, France, then possessed of Louisiana, ceded to Great Britain all her possessions on the east side of the Mississippi, except the town and island of New Orleans. And it was likewise stipulated "that the navigation of the river Mississippi shall be equally free, as well to the subjects of Great Britain as to those of France, in its whole length and breadth, from its source to the sea, and expressly that part which is between the said island of New Orleans and the right bank of that river, as well as the passage both in and out of its mouth." The people of the United States being then subjects of the King of Great Britain, they of course participated in the right of navigating the river Mississippi, and by the 8th article of the provisional treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concluded the 30th of November, 1782, and the definitive treaty of peace concluded the 3d of September, 1783, this right was confirmed, it being therein stipulated, that "the navigation of the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, shall for ever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States."

By the definitive treaty of peace between Spain and Great Britain, concluded the 3d of September, 1783, the latter ceded to Spain "East Florida, as also West Florida;" but the river Mississippi, as you observe, is not even mentioned in the treaty. What is the just inference from this circumstance, the United States need not decide. Doubtless Great Britain conceived it important to hold a right to the navigation of it, and all parties, at that time, certainly supposed that parts of her territories joined its eastern side, and probably no one can now say they do not. But however this silence with regard to the navigation of the Mississippi, in the treaty between Spain and Great Britain, may be construed; whether the latter by not reserving, is to be considered as relinquishing her right to it; or by not expressly relinquishing, is to be understood to retain it; it is proper to consider the nature and effect of the stipulations on this subject, between her and the United States.

When peace was made between the two Powers in 1783, both were entitled to the free navigation of the Mississippi; and both desiring to preserve this right, they mutually stipulated for its continuance: but neither is pledged to maintain it for the other; though each is bound not to interrupt the other in the exercise of that right. The treaty of London, concluded on the 19th of November, 1794, contains, as to this point, no new grant, on either side; but their respective rights are recognized; it being declared, in the third article, that "the river Mississippi shall, according to the treaty of peace, be entirely open to both parties." Had this declaration been wholly admitted, the right of Great Britain to the navigation of the Mississippi would have been neither increased nor diminished. But because the fourth article of the subsequent treaty with Spain excited some apprehensions in Great Britain, that it might countenance an attempt to exclude her from the navigation of the Mississippi, the explanatory article which you mentioned was formed, declaring, that no stipulations in any treaty subsequently concluded by either party, can be understood to derogate from the rights of free intercourse and commerce secured by the said third article to the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, and to the citizens of the United States. The fourth article of our treaty with Spain received its peculiar form, with the design that it might not derogate from the prior stipulations of the United States with Great Britain. And this, as I shall presently show you, was perfectly understood by the Government of Spain. And let me assure you, that the Federal Government no more seeks the excuse, than it merits the imputation, "that England, by her treaty with America, had surprised its good faith."

In discussing their respective projects of a treaty, it appears that the Prince of Peace, on the part of Spain, proposed that Mr. Pinckney, on the part of the United States, should enter into a stipulation which would have gone to the exclusion of Great Britain from the navigation of the Mississippi. To this project Mr. Pinckney returned the following answer:

Extract from the "Notes on the project of a Convention proposed by His Excellency the Prince of Peace, September 25, 1795."

The words "alone" and "exclusively" should be omitted; for Spain could scarcely confide in the good faith of the United States, or in the convention which she is about to conclude with them, if they agreed to an article which would be an infraction of a treaty previously concluded: for by the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, concluded in 1783, it is stipulated that the navigation of the river Mississippi shall continue free to the subjects of Great Britain and to the citizens of the United States."

Here, sir, you see that the Federal Government, far from "giving His Catholic Majesty (as you suggest) reason to believe that they had annulled, as illegal, the claim which they had made with England, as to this point, in the eighth article of the treaty of 1783," expressly declared that the attempt would be a violation of the good faith of the United States pledged to Great Britain in that treaty.

To get rid of the embarrassment, the particular form of expression which we find in the fourth article of the treaty with Spain was adopted. You will observe, sir, that this, like every other treaty, contains, generally, the joint stipulations of the contracting parties. Such is the stipulation of the United States and Spain in the beginning of the fourth article: "It is likewise agreed that the western boundary of the United States which separates them from the Spanish colony of Louisiana, is in the middle of the channel or bed of the river Mississippi, from the northern boundary of the said States to the completion of the thirty-first degree of latitude north of the equator." Then follows the clause respecting the navigation of the Mississippi. "And His Catholic Majesty has likewise agreed that the navigation of the said river, in its whole breadth, from its source to the ocean, shall be free only to his subjects and the citizens of the United States, unless he should extend this privilege to the subjects of other Powers by special convention." Here Spain is the sole party to the excluding cause. And the twenty-first article of the treaty presents a similar instance of a joint and separate stipulation. The two contracting parties jointly agree on the mode of adjusting the claims of American citizens for the losses they had sustained from the capture of their vessels by the subjects of Spain: and then "His Catholic Majesty undertakes to cause the same to be paid." Now it might with as much propriety be affirmed that the United States are by this clause bound to contribute (and equally with His Catholic Majesty) to those payments, as be inferred from the declaration of His Catholic Majesty singly, in the fourth article, relative to the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi, that the United States have thereby engaged to exclude from it the subjects of Great Britain.

The simple fact is, that the United States were contending with Spain for the free navigation of the Mississippi for themselves; and by this clause in the fourth article of the treaty their claim was admitted. Any declaration of His Catholic Majesty alone, to exclude other nations, was to them quite immaterial.

Thus, sir, I have answered to all your complaints, and, I hope, satisfactorily. The United States, equally with His Catholic Majesty, are desirous of preserving the best harmony between the two countries; and the American Government will always be disposed to adopt any proper measures for that end.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 6.

Copy of a letter from General Pinckney to the Secretary of State, dated

Paris, February 1, 1797.

Dear Sir:

The day after I had enclosed my last of the 24th ultimo, (No. 5) intelligence was received that Bonaparte had obtained a most brilliant victory in Italy; that he had made twenty-three thousand Austrian prisoners; killed and wounded six thousand, and had taken sixty pieces of cannon, and twenty-four standards; and the day after the arrival of this news, the following letter was written to me by Mr. De la Croix:

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

LIBERTY. EQUALITY.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs to Mr. Pinckney, Anglo-American.

PARIS, the 6th Pluviose, 6th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

The Executive Directory has charged me to make known to you, that not having obtained special permission to reside at Paris, you are amenable to the law which obliges foreigners to quit the territory of the republic. I had the honor of informing you near two months ago, by the principal Secretary of my department, of the intentions of the Government in this respect; I cannot dispense with notifying you of them to-day.

Receive, sir, &c.

CH. DE LA CROIX.

To which I returned the following answer:

To the Minister of Exterior Relations.

PARIS, 7th Pluviose, 1797.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

I did not receive until three o'clock to-day, your note in date of the 6th instant, informing me that the Directory had charged you to acquaint me, that not having obtained particular permission to reside at Paris, I was subject to the law which obliged strangers to quit the territory of the republic. I intimated to you some time since, by the Secretary-General of your department, and by Major Rutledge, my Secretary, that I deemed a notification of this sort, in writing, from you, necessary previous to my departure. Having now received it, I shall without delay prepare to go, and, in the meanwhile, will be obliged to you for the necessary passports for myself and family, with our baggage, to quit the republic in my way to Holland.

Accept citizen minister, &c.

CHARLES C. PINCKNEY.

I should have made some observation on being termed Anglo-American, but, on inquiry, I found it was customary to call all my countrymen so, to distinguish us from the inhabitants of St. Domingo, and the other French West India Islands. I have received my passports, and shall, in two days, set out for Amsterdam. I know not what has occasioned this determination of the Directory, after having permitted me to remain here so long a time, from their refusal to acknowledge me. You will judge whether the answer of the Senate and the House of Representatives to the President's speech, and the late successes in Italy, have not concurred to occasion it. Mr. De la Croix assured Major Rutledge, that he acted by the express orders of the Directory in this particular, and not from himself.

Your letter of the 26th of November, with the duplicate of your letter of the same month, (the original of which has not reached me) I recived the 29th ultimo, and am happy to find that Mr. Adet's disorganizing manœuvres have been treated by my countrymen in the manner they deserved, and that his attempts to divide has tended to unite them. I most ardently wish that we would banish all party distinctions and foreign influence; and think and act only as Americans—for all parties in this country unite in thinking that we ought to act as if we were altogether their dependents, and indebted to them solely, and not to our own exertions for our liberty and independence. Hence, our treaty with Great Britain is here generally execrated, and our having any kind of commercial connexion with that country, even if the treaty had not been made, would, I believe, have been disliked. They wish to destroy the trade of Great Britain, and they look upon us as one of her best customers; and, to obtain their object, they care not what we suffer. I shall write to you again as soon as I arrive at Amsterdam. Please to direct to me, under cover, to our bankers there, and be assured I am, &c.

CHARLES C. PINCKNEY.

TRIPOLI.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MAY 26, 1797.

UNITED STATES, May 26, 1797.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I lay before you, for your consideration and advice, a treaty of perpetual peace and friendship between the United States of America and the Bey and subjects of Tripoli, of Barbary, concluded, at Tripoli, on the 4th day of November, 1796.

JOHN ADAMS.

Treaty of peace and friendship between the United States of America and the Bey and Subjects of Tripoli, of Barbary.

ARTICLE 1. There is a firm and perpetual peace and friendship between the United States of America and the Bey and subjects of Tripoli, of Barbary, made by the free consent of both parties, and guarantied by the most potent Dey and Regency of Algiers.

ART. 2. If any goods belonging to any nation, with which either of the parties is at war, shall be loaded on board of vessels belonging to the other party, they shall pass free, and no attempt shall be made to take or detain them.

ART. 3. If any citizens, subjects, or effects, belonging to either party, shall be found on board a prize vessel, taken from an enemy by the other party, such citizens or subjects shall be set at liberty, and the effects restored to the owners.

ART. 4. Proper passports are to be given to all vessels of both parties, by which they are to be known. And considering the distance between the two countries, eighteen months, from the date of this treaty, shall be allowed for procuring such passports. During this interval the other papers, belonging to such vessels, shall be sufficient for their protection.

ART. 5. A citizen or subject of either party having bought a prize vessel, condemned by the other party, or by any other nation, the certificates of condemnation and bill of sale shall be a sufficient passport for such vessel for one year; this being a reasonable time for her to procure a proper passport.

ART. 6. Vessels of either party, putting into the ports of the other, and having need of provisions or other supplies, they shall be furnished at the market price. And if any such vessel shall so put in, from a disaster at sea, and have occasion to repair, she shall be at liberty to land and re-embark her cargo without paying any duties. But in no case shall she be compelled to land her cargo.

ART. 7. Should a vessel of either party be cast on the shore of the other, all proper assistance shall be given to her and her people; no pillage shall be allowed; the property shall remain at the disposition of the owners; and the crew protected and succored till they can be sent to their country.

ART. 8. If a vessel of either party should be attacked by an enemy, within gun-shot of the forts of the other, she shall be defended as much as possible. If she be in port she shall not be seized on, or attacked, when it is in the power of the other party to protect her. And when she proceeds to sea, no enemy shall be allowed to pursue her from the same port, within twenty-four hours after her departure.

ART. 9. The commerce between the United States and Tripoli; the protection to be given to merchants, masters of vessels, and seamen; the reciprocal right of establishing consuls in each country; and the privileges, immunities, and jurisdictions, to be enjoyed by such consuls, are declared to be on the same footing with those of the most favored nationsre spectively.

ART. 10. The money and presents demanded by the Bey of Tripoli, as a full and satisfactory consideration on his part, and on the part of his subjects, for this treaty of perpetual peace and friendship, are acknowledged to have been received by him previous to his signing the same, according to a receipt which is hereto annexed, except such part as is promised, on the part of the United States, to be delivered and paid by them on the arrival of their consul in Tripoli; of which part a note is likewise hereto annexed. And no pretence of any periodical tribute of further payments is ever to be made by either party.

ART. 11. As the Government of the United States of America is not, in any sense, founded on the Christian religion; as it has in itself no character of enmity against the laws, religion, or tranquillity, of Mussulmen; and, as the said States never entered into any war, or act of hostility againtst any Mahometan nation, it is declared by the parties, that no pretext, arrising from religious opinions, shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two countries.

ART. 12. In case of any dispute, arising from a violation of any of the articles of this treaty, no appeal shall be made to arms; nor shall war be declared on any pretext whatever. But if the consul, residing at the place where the dispute shall happen, shall not be able to settle the same, an amicable reference shall be made to the mutual friend of the parties, the Dey of Algiers; the parties hereby engaging to abide by his decision. And he, by virtue of his signature to this treaty, engages for himself and successors to declare the justice of the case, according to the true interpretation of the treaty, and to use all the means in his power to enforce the observance of the same.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MAY 31, 1797.

UNITED STATES, May 31, 1797.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I nominate General Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, of South Carolina, Francis Dana, Chief Justice of the State of Massachusetts, and General John Marshall, of Virginia, to be jointly and severally envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French republic.

After a mature deliberation on the critical situation of our relations with France, which have long engaged my most serious attention, I have determined on these nominations of persons to negotiate with the French republic, to dissipate umbrages, to remove prejudices, to rectify errors, and adjust all differences, by a treaty between the two Powers.

It is, in the present critical and singular circumstances, of great importance to engage the confidence of the great portions of the Union in the characters employed, and the measures which may be adopted. I have, therefore, thought it expedient to nominate persons of talents and integrity, long known and intrusted in the three great divisions of the Union, and, at the same time, to provide against the cases of death, absence, indisposition, or other impediment, to invest any one or more of them with full powers.

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JUNE 13, 1797.

UNITED STATES, June 12, 1797.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have received information from the commissioner appointed on the part of the United States, pursuant to the third article of our treaty with Spain, that the running and marking of the boundary line between the colonies of East and West Florida, and the territory of the United States, have been delayed by the officers of His Catholic Majesty; and that they have declared their intention to maintain his jurisdiction, and to suspend the withdrawing of his troops from the military posts they occupy within the territory of the United States, until the two Governments shall, by negotiation, have settled the meaning of the second article respecting the withdrawing of the troops, garrisons or settlements, of either party in the territory of the other; that is, whether, when the Spanish garrisons withdraw, they are to leave the works standing, or to demolish them; and until, by an additional article to the treaty, the real property of the inhabitants shall be secured; and, likewise, until the Spanish officers are sure the Indians will be pacific. The two first questions, if to be determined by negotiation, might be made subjects of discussion for years, and as no limitation of time can be prescribed to the other, a certainty, in the opinion of the Spanish officers, that the Indians will be pacific, it will be impossible to suffer it to remain an obstacle to the fulfilment of the treaty on the part of Spain.

To remove the first difficulty, I have determined to leave it to the discretion of the officers of His Catholic Majesty, when they withdraw his troops from the forts within the territory of the United States, either to leave the works standing or to demolish them; and to remove the second, I shall cause an assurance to be published, and to be particularly communicated to the minister of His Catholic Majesty, and to the Governor of Louisiana, that the settlers or occupants of the lands in question, shall not be disturbed in their possessions by the troops of the United States, but, on the contrary, that they shall be protected in all their lawful claims; and, to prevent or remove every doubt on this point, it merits the consideration of Congress whether it will not be expedient immediately to pass a law, giving positive assurances to those inhabitants who, by fair and regular grants, or by occupancy, have obtained legal titles or equitable claims to lands in that country, prior to the final ratification of the treaty between the United States and Spain, on the 25th of April, 1796.

This country is rendered peculiarly valuable by its inhabitants, who are represented to amount to nearly four thousand, generally well affected and much attached to the United States, and zealous for the establishment of a Government under their authority.

I therefore recommend to your consideration the expediency of erecting a Government in the district of the Natchez, similar to that established for the territory northwest of the river Ohio, but with certain modifications, relative to titles or claims of land, whether of individuals or companies, or to claims of jurisdiction of any individual State.

JOHN ADAMS.

Report of the Secretary of State to the President of the United States, of the proceedings of Andrew Ellicott, Esq. Commissioner for running the boundary line between the United States and East and West Florida.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 10, 1797.

The Secretary of State respectfully reports to the President of the United States the substance of the information received the 8th instant, from Andrew Ellicott, Esq. the commissioner of the United States appointed to run the boundary line between their territory and His Catholic Majesty's colonies of East and West Florida.

Although Mr. Ellicott left Philadelphia in September, 1796, to proceed, by the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, to the Natchez, the place appointed by the treaty with Spain, at which the commissioners of the two Governments were to meet, yet, owing to the lowness of the waters of the Ohio, he did not reach its mouth until the 19th of December; two days after which, both the Ohio and Mississippi were almost frozen over. On the 21st of January the ice began to give way, and their store boat arriving on the 28th, they proceeded on the 31st for the Natchez. On the 21st of February, Mr. Ellicott received a letter (No. 1) from His Catholic Majesty's Governor, Gayoso de Lemos, dated at the Natchez, the 17th of February, mentioning the information he had received of his approaching arrival, attended by a military guard and some woodsmen, and desiring that the troops might be left about the mouth of Bayou Pierre, assigning for his reason that, thereby, every unforeseen misunderstanding between the troops of the two Powers would be prevented. With this request, from views of accommodation, Mr. Ellicott complied. Bayou Pierre is about sixty miles above the Natchez.

On the 24th of February, Mr. Ellicott reached the Natchez, and immediately by a letter acquainted Governor Gayoso of his arrival. The Governor, on the same day, returned an answer, No. 2. The day following they had an interview, and fixed on the 19th of March to proceed down the river to Clarkesville, near which place it was supposed the line would commence. The Monday following, February 27th, Mr. Ellicott wrote a letter, No. 3, to the Baron de Carondelet, His Catholic Majesty's Governor General of Louisiana, and the commissioner named by the court of Spain, for ascertaining the boundary line, to inform him of his arrival at the Natchez, as the commissioner of the United States. The baron's answer, No. 4, dated March 1st, was received the 9th, and on the same day Governor Gayoso waited on Mr. Ellicott, and informed him that the baron, in consequence of interesting concerns below, had declined to attend, and that the whole business had devolved on him. Mr. Ellicott expressed his satisfaction, because he expected that he, Governor Gayoso, would immediately be ready to proceed. The Governor answered, "No time shall be lost; but I fear I shall not be ready by the 19th; and, although the baron declines acting, on account of the business which demands his constant attention at Orleans, he is, nevertheless, desirous of having an interview with you; and, for that purpose, has ordered a galley to be fitted up for your use and accommodation to New Orleans." Mr. Ellicott considered that the third article of the treaty with Spain required the commissioners for running the boundary line to meet at the Natchez; and that being then at his post, it was his duty to remain there until the Spanish commissioner should be ready to proceed with him to the place where the line should commence; and, therefore, he declined the baron's invitation.

On the 27th of February, Mr. Ellicott encamped at the upper end of the town of Natchez, about a quarter of a mile from the fort occupied by the Spanish troops; and, two days after, hoisted the flag of the United States. Upon this he received a verbal message from Governor Gayoso, by his aid, Major Minor, desiring the flag might be taken down, which Mr. Ellicott declined doing. The request was not repeated. Here Mr. Ellicott began his astronomical observations, and found the hill on which he was encamped to be in latitude 31 degrees 33 minutes 46 seconds, or about 39 miles north of the south boundary of the United States.

In this situation Mr. Ellicott was told alarming stories about the unfavorable disposition of the Indians, under an idea that the United States were meditating their destruction. The whole settlement was for some days swarming with them, and they frequently went about his camp with drawn knives. For his own safety he frequently issued provisions to them. Thus critically circumstanced, he, on the 11th of March, wrote to Governor Gayoso the letter, No. 5, to which he received the answer, No. 6. But, in the mean time, Mr. Ellicott had sent an express to the commanding officer of his escort (consisting of only twenty-five men) which, in compliance with the Governor's first request, he had left sixty miles up the river, to come down directly to the Natchez; and being determined not to countermand this order, he, on the 13th, wrote to Governor Gayoso the letter, No. 7, proposing Bacon's landing, about a mile below his camp, for the station of his escort; but before this letter was sent, he had an interview with the Governor, who undertook to prove the propriety and necessity of the whole party from the United States going down the river to Clarke's place, and closed his reasoning, by observing that, if the escort did land at the Natchez, he should consider it as an insult offered to the King, his master. Mr. Ellicott then telling the Governor that he should send him immediately an answer, in writing, observed, that the desire which was constantly manifested to draw him from that place (the Natchez) appeared very singular, as it was designated in the late treaty between His Catholic Majesty and the United States, as the place of meeting for the commissioners; and, therefore, that he should reject every proposition that was intended to draw him from his present situation, until the commissioner and surveyor on behalf of the crown of Spain were ready to proceed to business. To which the Governor replied, "Sir, you either mistake my meaning, or I have expressed myself very badly. I do not want you to leave this place; but, on the contrary, I am desirous for you to take up your residence in my house; you will live there much more comfortably than in a tent." Mr. Ellicott said that his tent was much more agreeable than a palace: for, in his camp he enjoyed an independence characteristic of the nation he had the honor to represent. The next morning Mr. Ellicott sent his letter, No. 7, and the same day received the Governor's answer, No. 8, expressing his entire satisfaction with Mr. Ellicott's sentiments, as uniformly agreeing with his own, in every thing which could combine the mutual interests of the two nations.

The evening following, (March 15th) Mr. Ellicott's escort arrived at the landing, and the next day went down to the place he had proposed for their station.

The officer of the escort having found in the settlement a number of deserters from the American army, took them up. This occasioned some verbal communications between Governor Gayoso and Mr. Ellicott, the former desiring the deserters might be dismissed. Mr. Ellicott thereupon proposed this arrangement: That such deserters from the army of the United States as came into that country and took the protection of the Spanish Government, prior to the time fixed by the treaty for the evacuation of the posts, should, for the present, remain unmolested; but that such as had come to that country since that time, should be liable to be taken and detained.

About the time Mr. Ellicott's escort arrived, the principal part of the artillery was taken out of the fort and carried to the landing, and every appearance made of a speedy evacuation; but on the 22d of March, great industry was used in carrying cannon back to the fort, which were immediately remounted. This gave great alarm to the inhabitants of the district, who generally manifested a desire of being declared subjects of the United States, and at once to renounce the Spanish jurisdiction. In order to quiet the minds of the inhabitants, and to be able to give them some reasons for the Governor's conduct, which now began to be considered as hostile to the United States, Mr. Ellicott, on the 23d of March, wrote the letter, No. 9, which was followed by a note, No. 10, to which he received the Governor's answer, No. 11. This answer, containing information that the important business of running the boundary line should soon be commenced, and an assurance that nothing could prevent the religious compliance with the treaty, Mr. Ellicott expressed his satisfaction in his letter to the Governor, No. 12.

It being now reported that the American troops would be down in a few days, the Governor sent, by his aid, to Mr. Ellicott, an open letter from the Governor, directed to Captain Pope, who, it was said, commanded those troops, informing him that, for sundry reasons, it would be proper, and conducive to the harmony of the two nations, for himself and the detachment under his command, to remain at or near the place where the letter should meet him, until the posts should be evacuated; and as every preparation was making for that purpose, the delay would be but of a few days, when he would be happy to see him at the Natchez. This proposal to Captain Pope, the Governor, in his letter, No. 13, desired Mr. Ellicott to second. Upon reading the letter, Mr. Ellicott observed to Major Minor, that it was impossible for him to join in the Governor's request to Captain Pope, as it was well known to him (Mr. Ellicott) that, instead of evacuating the posts, they were making them more defensible. However, Mr. Ellicott said he would write a letter to the officer commanding the detachment, and requested Major Minor, (as he was to be the bearer of the Governor's letter to the Walnut hills) to take charge of it; to which he had no objection. This letter is No. 14.

On the 28th of March, the Governor issued the proclamation No. 15, bearing the date of March 29th, and another, No. 16, bearing the same date, with the avowed object of quieting the minds of the inhabitants; but they produced a contrary effect. As soon as the Governor discovered this, he requested two gentlemen of the settlement to inform Mr. Ellicott that he, the Governor had received directions from the General-in-chief, the Baron de Carondelet, to have the artillery and military stores expeditiously removed from the forts, which were immediately to be given up to the troops of the United States, upon their arrival. Great pains were taken to inculcate this report, but it did not remove suspicions. In order, therefore, to obtain a direct explanation, Mr. Ellicott, on the 31st of March, wrote to the Governor the letter No. 17, enclosing two paragraphs, No. 18, of an address he had received from a number of respectable inhabitants of the district. The Governor's answer, No. 19, of the same date, confirmed every suspicion, as it contained an explicit declaration that his General had given him positive orders to suspend the evacuations of the posts until the two Governments should determine whether the works were to be left standing, or to be demolished, and until, by an additional article to the treaty, the real property of the inhabitants should be secured; agreeably to his proclamations, in which the Governor thought proper to tell the inhabitants that negotiations were on foot between His Catholic Majesty and the United States, for the adjustment of that and other matters. It may not be improper to remark, that no such negotiation has existed, and that this is the first time that these objections to the evacuation of the posts have been heard of. This peremptory declaration of Governor Gayoso, requires no comment.

Mr. Ellicott says, that with the exception of about eight persons, including some officers, all the inhabitants of the Natchez district, (within the limits of the United States) are desirous of coming under their jurisdiction, and to have a Government established there, similar to that northwest of the river Ohio. My inquiries enable me to add, that the population amounts to near four thousand souls.

Mr. Ellicott further informs, that he has not only reason to believe, but is certain that many grants for lands in that district have been given out by the officers of the Government of Louisiana, since the ratification of the late treaty, and that their surveyors are now executing the surveys.

On the 14th of April, when Mr. Ellicott was folding up his despatches, he received, from Governor Gayoso, the letter No. 20, of that date, complaining of the enlistment of persons in that district, as an infringement of the rights of His Catholic Majesty, and requesting that the persons enlisted might be discharged. To which Mr. Ellicott immediately returned the answer No. 21, observing that the matter required investigation, but assuring Governor Gayoso that he would be careful neither to infringe the rights of the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, nor willingly suffer those of the citizens of the United States to be infringed.

The bearer of Mr. Ellicott's despatches informs me, that, before he left the Natchez, they had heard that two gunboats were preparing at New Orleans to bring up reinforcements; and, since his arrival I have received information which, connected with this detail of facts, is entitled to belief, that, about the 10th of May, three large boats, full of troops, besides a party by land, set off from New Orleans for the Natchez. It was added, for the purpose of driving off the continental troops that had taken possession, agreeably to the late treaty.

JUNE 12, 1797.

I have just received from the Secretary of War, two letters, (which I have numbered 22 and 23) dated the 18th of December, 1796, from the officer of His Catholic Majesty commanding the post at New Madrid, one addressed to the late General Wayne, and the other to Lieutenant Taylor, whom the general sent thither with letters to obtain information relative to the delivery of the post occupied by His Catholic Majesty's troops within the territory of the United States; by which it appears that the evacuation of those posts was at that time proposed to be deferred, merely because the water of the Mississippi was so low as to render the transport of artillery, &c. very difficult, and the navigation dangerous.

NATCHEZ, February 17, 1797.

SIR:

Some gentlemen that left you at the mouth of the Ohio have informed me of your approaching arrival here, and that, to attend you on your commission, you bring a military guard, and some woodsmen. It is with pleasure that I propose myself the satisfaction of seeing you here, and to make your acquaintance. Though I do not conceive that the least difficulty will arise respecting the execution of the part of the treaty in which you are an acting person; yet, as we are not prepared to evacuate the posts immediately, for want of the vessels that I expect will arrive soon, I find it indispensable to request you to leave the troops about the mouth of Bayou Pierre, where they may be provided with all their necessaries, which you can regulate on your arrival here. By this means, every unforeseen misunderstanding will be prevented between His Majesty's troops and those of the United States; besides, it is necessary to make some arrangements previous to the arrival of the troops, on which subject I shall have the honor of entertaining you when we meet.

I embrace this opportunity to assure you of the satisfaction I feel in being appointed to act in concert with you, though your first interview is to be with the general in chief of this province.

I have the honor to be, &c.

It is with pleasure I embrace this opportunity of informing you of my safe arrival at this place, as commissioner in behalf of the United States, for ascertaining the boundaries between the territories of His Most Catholic Majesty and those of the United States.

The polite manner in which I have been received at the posts on the Mississippi, now in possession of His Most Catholic Majesty, demands my thanks and gratitude, and am in hopes that a similar conduct will be observed on our part.

DEAR SIR:

I have received, with great satisfaction, your friendly letter of the 27th of February last; in consequence of which, I congratulate you on your arrival in this country in the character of commissioner on the part of the United States, to run the dividing line between the territories of His Most Catholic Majesty and the United States. You likewise did me the favor to mention with what kindness and attention you were received at the different posts, as well as by the whole Government under my direction; and from the general principles of your nation, I have no doubt but the same conduct will be observed on the part of the United States. God guard you, most excellent sir.

MY DEAR SIR:

The conduct of the Indians yesterday and last night, owing principally to their constant state of intoxication, renders it absolutely necessary, in my opinion, to have recourse to my military escort for protection. The discipline of our army is such, that you may rest assured, none of the inconveniences mentioned in your first communication to me are to be apprehended from the escort's being stationed at this place on our part. And as the attendance of the guard forms a part of the treaty now carrying into effect between His Most Catholic Majesty and the United States, which I am authorized to declare will be observed by the nation I have the honor to represent with good faith and punctuality, I must request the favor of you to withdraw your objections against my escort's joining me at this place as soon as possible. NATCHEZ, March 12, 1797.

MY DEAR SIR:

This morning I had the pleasure to receive your amicable communication, dated yesterday. I give you my sincere thanks for having established this form of intercourse, as it will make our business more easy, and, indeed, it is more conformable to the sincere friendship we have contracted.

In answer to your said letter, I will remark, that such conduct of the Indians is not customary here; I foresaw that it would happen, from the moment you showed a desire of having your colors flying, before all the transactions were terminated; knowing the Indians as well as I do, this was the reason of the objections I offered the moment I saw it hoisted, for otherwise I know it very well, that it is frequently used by the representatives of any nation in a foreign country; it is even done in Spain by foreign consuls. I am sorry you should have experienced any inconvenience from this particular circumstance, and that urged by such effects to wish to have by you your escort. I have not the least objection that it should be called from its actual station; but as it is my duty, and that I am answerable for the tranquillity of the country that is intrusted to my charge, I must propose to you a method that will answer every good and satisfactory purpose. Had not you been unluckily stopped on your voyage to this country, you would have had immediately the General of the province here, to begin the operation of demarking the divisory line between the territories of His Catholic Majesty and those of the United States of America. He had every necessary preparation to attend to the business; but since the time he had a right to expect the commissioners of the United States, the war with England has taken place, and his cares thereby increased, yet he expected to have had it in his power to come to meet you at Daniel Clarke's, esquire, which place is near the point of the 31 degrees; but he has found it impossible, as it would oblige him to make too long an absence from New Orleans; therefore it is myself that will have the honor to accompany you on that important commission, on behalf of His Catholic Majesty. This is the moment when I am in want of every individual thing, both for my person and for the attendants of the commission, though the Geometer, and other officers that are to be employed, are already on their way from New Orleans, and will stop at Clarksville, where I shall go myself as soon as my equipage arrives from the capital; but this will inevitably take some time, therefore the plan that I wish to arrange with you, will be to make Loftus's Cliffs our point of re-union. This place is a short distance from Clarksville, and it is a very healthy situation; there I will send every thing concerning the Spanish commission; and that will be the most convenient place to establish, for a while, your head quarters, under your military escort. By adopting this measure, you will have your people together, and the most distant disagreeable occurrence avoided, as I am positively confident that some would happen by the conjunction here, as you propose. It is true, that by the treaty an escort is supposed, and even recommended to each commission, but it is to be on the line, and not at a distance from it, where it would interfere with other business; therefore, I feel sensibly hurt that it is out of my power to consent to the landing of the troops in this place, though I have not the least objection on their going directly to Loftus's Cliffs.

I have given the most positive orders to prevent the Indians getting liquor; and to their interpreter I have given the strictest charge to be always in sight, and to-morrow I expect that they will remove to some distance from hence.

I have the honor to be, &c.

NATCHEZ, March 13, 1797.

MY DEAR SIR:

Your favor of yesterday was handed to me in due time, which would have been answered sooner, had not the storm last night prevented me from writing in my tent. Your letter, as well as many circumstances which have come to my knowledge, contain fresh proofs of your desire to promote good order and harmony in this part of the country. But, sir, I cannot suppose that any inconvenience could possibly arise, or the peace of this settlement be disturbed, by the arrival and landing of the escort which I left at Bayou Pierre: if I did suppose the contrary, I trust that I should be one of the last persons to propose the measure. In my opinion, the escort which accompanied me is as much bound to observe good order in this country as the troops of His Catholic Majesty. This is not an opinion of the day; it has uniformly been mine ever since I left the seat of our Government: in consequence of which, immediately upon entering the Mississippi, I issued a standing order that, when any of our party, the military included, should be at any place where the jurisdiction was exercised by His Catholic Majesty, the laws and usages of that Government should be observed and submitted to in the most pointed manner. The escorts, by the spirit of the treaty, are intended for our mutual protection against straggling hostile Indians, and the preservation of our stores. This appears to be their whole business.

As I hope that mere punctilios may never interrupt our friendship, and the conduct of the Indians having become more peaceable since the night before last, I am less anxious for the escort's being stationed at my present encampment: I would, therefore, to prevent any disturbance or misunderstanding, propose that the officer who commands the escort which accompanied me to Bayou Pierre, be directed to proceed down the river to Bacon Landing, from whence he may come to this place and procure such necessaries as he may be in want of for the ensuing season.

As this is the place designated by the treaty for our meeting, and making our arrangements for carrying on the business, I conceive there would be an impropriety in my leaving it till your excellency is ready to join me in fixing the first point of latitude.

I am, &c.

The remounting of the cannon at this place at the very time when our troops are daily expected down to take possession of it, the insolent treatment which the citizens of the United States have received at the Walnut Hills, and the delay in the business upon which I came, concur in giving me reasons to suppose, that the treaty will not be observed with the same good faith and punctuality by the subjects of His Catholic Majesty as it will by the citizens of the United States. No. 11.

NATCHEZ, March 23, 1797.

MY DEAR SIR:

I have just now received your communication of this day, by which I am sorry to find the construction you put on the storing of the ammunitions that came from the Walnut Hills in this fort. I have no other place to put them in, for it would be imprudent to leave them exposed in an insecure place at a time when the Indians might take advantage of us, if they found that in the present circumstances we acted without the necessary precautions; at the time you see me conducting ammunitions to the fort, you will likewise see as many go out of it for the Arkansas, to reinforce that post, which will now be exposed to the incursions of the Osage Indians, who in the last season pillaged the white hunters of that country.

I am entirely unacquainted with any ill treatment that the citizens of the United States should have received at the Walnut Hills: if you mean the execution of the orders of the General-in-chief of this province, to demolish that post, it was in consequence of our treaty with the Indians, that they might have no just reason to complain of our conduct: but, since I have been informed of their unsettled disposition, I have sent counter orders to suspend every thing that might injure the actual estate of those fortifications; and, in such circumstances, shall not move any thing else until the arrival of the American troops, that are daily expected.

The unavoidable detention that has been experienced in beginning the line, you know the reasons; but they shall soon be removed, as Lieutenant Colonel Guillemard is far on his way up, and, at his arrival, this important business shall be begun.

I do assure you that there is nothing that can prevent the religious compliance of the treaty, though I might observe that the conduct of some persons that seem to affect an immediate interest with the United States is such, as to occupy my attention. I request that you will be so kind as to take such measures as to suppress untimely expressions, that can only tend to disturb the tranquillity of the public, of which I am solely answerable for the present.

As I was finishing this, Mr. Gillespie brought to me your note, inquiring if the works at the Bluffs had been destroyed or removed to the other side of the river.

What I have already said concerning our treaty with the Indians, I suppose has guided the General of this province to take that step. I really do not know whether they are destroyed, or not. I give you my word that I did not know what was to be done there; and it is only by Baron Bastrop that I learn that that post would soon be evacuated: but as this is a thing that only regards the General of the province, I cannot account for it, nor can I say more on the subject, as all the orders proceed from him—that post being entirely out of my jurisdiction.

This will be handed you by Major Minor, a friend of mine, an officer in the service of His Catholic Majesty; your polite attention to him will be considered as a particular favor conferred upon me. By order of Governor Gayoso, his letter to you of this day has been shown to me; his request for you and the troops under your command to remain for an indefinite time above this place, appears to me a very extraordinary one; sufficient time has already been given by the United States for the evacuation of all the posts on the east side of the Mississippi, above the 31st degree of north latitude; and from the troops of His Catholic Majesty carrying up and remounting the cannon at this place, I cannot pretend to say that an evacuation is really intended in any reasonable time. From this circumstance, I should conclude that the sooner you are here the better. However, as I have no control over the destination of the troops of the United States, except my own escort, I shall take it for granted that your instructions are sufficiently pointed to direct your conduct. Please to accept of my sincere wishes for the safe and speedy arrival of yourself and troops at this place; and am, &c.

Don Manuel Gayoso de Lemos, Brigadier in the royal armies, Governor Military and Civil of Natchez and its Dependencies, &c. &c. &c.

Whereas the political situation of this country offers a large field to busy and malignant minds to disturb the tranquillity of its inhabitants, it is therefore my duty, and the continuation of that vigilance which I have constantly exerted, not only to promote the happiness of every individual of this Government, but likewise to support their interest, and secure their tranquillity, that I step forth to warn the public against being led by their innocent credulity against any measure that may be productive of ill consequences, and frustrate all the advantages they have a right to expect: and by the present I assure to them, if they continue as they have always done, with strict attachment to the welfare of His Catholic Majesty's Government, from which will depend the following favorable events, viz. His Majesty has offered to support the rights of the inhabitants to the real property; and until that is ascertained, I am bound to keep possession of this country, as likewise until we are sure the Indians will be pacific.

Contrary to the general expectation, the same indulgence that until now protected the inhabitants in distress will be continued during His Majesty's sovereignty in this country; and this being the season in which the planters are employed in preparing for an ensuing crop, none shall be disturbed from that important object on account of their depending debts. The misconstruction of what is the enjoyment of the liberty of conscience is hereby positively explained to be, that no individual of this Government shall be molested on account of religious principles, and that they shall not be hindered in their private meetings; but no other public worship will be allowed but that generally established in all His Majesty's dominions, which is the Catholic religion.

These important objects, that until now have not been published, though resolved, I acquaint the public with, apprehensive of the dangerous insinuations of several persons that have made it their business to dazzle the public with false notions, to serve their own purpose, in the speculation of lands that are lawfully held by all the inhabitants of this Government: therefore, I firmly rely that no person will deviate from the principles of adhesion to our Government, until the negotiations that are now on foot between His Majesty and the United States of America are concluded, and thereby the real property of the inhabitants secured.

Given under my hand and the seal of my arms, and countersigned by the secrerary of this Government, by H. M. at the Government House, Natchez.

No. 16.

Whereas the alarming circumstances that prevailed for a while in this Government obliged me to circulate proclamations, wherein I warned the people of their immediate danger. Now, that these troubles have subsided, I cannot but publish my approbation, and applaud that upright sense of duty that the inhabitants have shown to the laws of our gracious sovereign, by seconding his representative, the right they have so justly acquired of being considered the most loyal subjects of His Majesty. In my last publication I mentioned that, until the real property should be secured to the inhabitants, this country should be considered in the same situation as before, as likewise while the pacific disposition of the Indians was not ascertained. I find it my duty to explain that a negotiation is now carrying on to secure the right of the said real property. As that right cannot be secured but by an additional article to the late treaty, and until that article is officially communicated to me, I am bound to keep possession of the country, and continue to its inhabitants the same indulgence and the same anxious protection as until now. The negotiations with the Indians will produce the same effects, as it is impossible for His Majesty to leave unprotected so many of his faithful subjects, and expose other settlements to the revengeful disposition of discontented Indians. These important objects are of the greatest moment to every person in this Government; their interest and allegiance to His Majesty binds them to keep steady in their principles of loyalty, until, by the definitive arrangements of both nations, a change takes place. Being informed that some persons are apprehensive that violent measures will be taken against those that seemed pleased with the prospects of becoming citizens of the United States, I declare that such a notion is unfounded, as likewise the suspicion that individuals would be prevented from moving to any part they please, either within His Majesty's dominions or elsewhere, as it is notorious that no such obstacle was ever offered to any body, it being contrary to one of the greatest prerogatives that are enjoyed by His Majesty's subjects.

NATCHEZ, March 31, 1797.

MY DEAR SIR:

I was last evening addressed by a number of respectable inhabitants of the district of Natchez. They are very much alarmed for their situation, in consequence of having expressed their pleasure, since my arrival at this place, in speedily becoming citizens of the United States. Your proclamation of the 28th instant, they conceived, renders that event doubtful. They have, therefore, from considerations of personal safety, and to avoid the insults which many of them have experienced from one or more officers of a small grade in this district, called upon me to use my influence with your excellency to grant them, and all others who incline to leave this country, the privilege of disposing of their properties, and passports to enable them to reach the frontiers of such States as they may be inclined to remove to. I have now stated the substance of their application, and assure your excellency, from the respectability of the applicants, it is a subject in which I feel myself interested, and to which I request your excellency's attention.

Ever since I arrived in this district, I have uniformly recommended to the inhabitants a quiet submission to the Government now in force, at the same time they have been in the most explicit manner assured that the period would not be far distant when the jurisdiction of the United States would be extended to them. But they are not satisfied; they have their suspicions; and it is your excellency alone that can quiet them. Let the cannon and military stores be again taken out of the fort; withdraw your objections to the arrival of the American troops; and their apprehensions will subside. I do not pretend to say that their apprehensions are well founded; it is possible they are not; but your objection to my escort's being stationed with me; your hauling back and remounting the cannon at this place; your despatching Major Minor to delay the arrival of the troops of the United States at this post, added to your excellency's proclamation, however well meant, have had a contrary effect by increasing their fears.

I have enclosed two paragraphs of the address which was handed to me last evening. I am, &c.

ANDREW ELLICOTT.

His Excellency MANUEL DE GAYOSO.

Many whose ideas of allegiance had been preponderant from the treaty until the time of your arrival at this place, thought themselves at full liberty to announce their sentiments in any way that might not affect the operations of peace and good order in society. But the result is a melancholy contrast to the construction. Some have been already torn away from the bosom of agricultural life, and conveyed to prison with every indignant epithet that malevolence could invent. Scouts are crossing the country in various directions, breathing threats of vengeance against those who had unguardedly thrown aside the mask of duplicity; and a number are waiting with solicitude the moment of their fate.

There are many in this country to whose exertions America is much indebted for her political existence. We call upon you in the name of such; we call upon you in the name of every friend to that emblem of peace and science which has been recently displayed to us; to stand forth with a confidence suitable to the dignity of your commission, and demand of the Governor passports, with leave for all such as would dispose of their property, and avail themselves of a change of situation by withdrawing to the United States.

NATCHEZ, March 31, 1797.

MY DEAR SIR:

I have just now received your favor of this day, in which you informed of the application of several respectable inhabitants of this Government to you, requesting your interposition to facilitate to them a privilege that they never ceased enjoying, and in which consists the greatest liberty of a Spaniard. There is not one single instance in our Government of having made opposition to a person's selling his property, and leaving the country, whenever they called for a passport; and, as our system is not altered, I shall not refuse the same privilege to any person that may apply for it.

I am sorry to find that those persons who have addressed you have imposed upon your credulity and goodness, in making use of remonstrances proper to make sensation on the feelings of a good citizen of the United States; but there is not a word of truth in what they have advanced. I have not taken notice of the satisfaction that some persons have expressed on the prospect of becoming citizens of the United States, nor has any body been apprehended for it, nor have I issued any order for such a purpose, but against Mr. Green, Senior, who had made his escape, conscious of the criminality of his conduct, which is notorious; and, indeed, in all the extent of this Government, there is but one single individual confined, and that is for a criminal proceeding. There is not a single patrol out in search of any one; nor, just at this moment, do I find occasion for it; but if I should, I would employ every means in my power to suppress disorder, and to keep the peace of the country, as I have always done.

I doubt not of the assurances you please to give me of the good advice you have uniformly given to the people, it being conformable to the character of a gentleman, whose object is another than that of interfering in the matters of Government.

My proclamation I found absolutely necessary to calm the minds of the people, stating to them the true situation of the political arrangements between His Majesty and the United States, which does not dissolve the treaty, but requires an essential explanation, not only with regard to the points alluded to in my proclamation, but likewise, as I am authorized to declare to you, that the General of this province finds himself under the necessity to consult His Majesty concerning the manner in which the posts are to be evacuated; as it appears by General Wayne's communication to him, that he expects that the posts will be delivered with the buildings standing as they are; and, by the treaty, we conceive that the posts are to be demolished before we leave them; and as such interpretation of the true meaning of the treaty, either one way or the other, [it] might produce unnecessary ministerial contests, my General has given me positive orders to suspend the evacuations of the posts until the matter shall be amicably settled between the two courts. In the mean while, if the troops of the United States that are daily expected, arrive, they shall be received at Nogales in the most friendly and hospitable manner, as is due to a nation with whom we are at perfect peace, and with whom we wish to keep the most perfect harmony.

I flatter myself you will do me the justice to acknowledge the propriety of my conduct in obeying the superior order of my General, who is actuated by the principles of the strictest honor in supporting the interest of His Majesty intrusted to him.

The uniform good harmony that we have reciprocally promised to each other will subsist; and it will not be only our duty, but our glory, to banish every shadow of misunderstanding which is wrongfully interpreted by the public, without any more foundation than assisted those that tried to persuade you of wrongs that they never suffered.

I am, &c.

NATCHEZ, April 14, 1797.

MY DEAR SIR:

I am informed that the officer commanding your escort has enlisted several persons resident of this Government, which, being against the laws of nations, I cannot pass unnoticed, it being an infringement on the sovereignty of the King, my master, and a disregard of the authority residing in me.

I cannot persuade myself that it was done intentionally, nor thinking that it could give the most remote offence; but, as the matter is of a most delicate nature, I request you to give the necessary orders that the men so enlisted may be discharged, and delivered to Major Minor, whom I commission for this purpose.

The object of the escort not being to raise men in this country, while under His Catholic Majesty's dominion, I request of you likewise to give the most precise and positive orders to the officers of the troops, or to whom it may appertain, to discontinue such proceedings, or any thing that may injure the immunity of the King's dominions, or his royal rights.

The most perfect harmony and friendship subsisting between His Catholic Majesty and the United States of America, the same being recommended in the most particular manner to the individuals of both nations, it would be unaccountable if we, that have had the honor to be distinguished by our appointments, did not promote this friendly reciprocity, which not only consists in a hospitable and polite intercourse, but guarding and keeping to one another the prerogatives and privileges that are due.

Enclosed I have the honor of transmitting to you a list of the men that to my knowledge have been recruited, or suffered to be recruited, in this Government, by the officer commanding your escort.

I have the honor to be, &c.

MANUEL GAYOSO DE LEMOS.

NATCHEZ, April 14, 1797.

DEAR SIR:

Your excellency's favor of this date was handed to me by Major Minor; but the request it contains is of so general and important a nature, and affecting so deeply the privileges of the citizens of the United States, that I must take a short time to investigate its ultimate tendency, as a part, if not all, of the persons named in your excellency's list cannot, by any construction of the late treaty, or the laws of nations, be considered as the subjects of His Catholic Majesty. You may rest assured that, having in view the sacred and honorable principles which are the basis of that Government I have the honor to serve, and by which treaties are considered the most sacred of all obligations, I will be careful, neither to infringe the rights of the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, nor willingly suffer infringement of those of the citizens of the United States. I am, &c.

Lieutenant Colonel Charles de Hault de Lassus to Major General Anthony Wayne.

NEW MADRID, (on the Mississippi) December 18, 1796.

SIR:

Lieutenant Taylor has delivered to me your excellency's letter, dated Detroit, October 19th, 1796, and, according to your intention, I have acquainted him with the orders I have received from the Governor General of this province, respecting the treaty of friendship, navigation, and limits, between the United States of America and the King my master. I here enclose a copy of my letter to him, wherein I hope you will find sufficient and satisfactory information. As Lieutenant Taylor has, according to his instructions, determined to return from here without going any further down, I am about sending immediately an express to New Orleans, with your excellency's letter to the Governor General of Louisiana; I will think myself happy if I have succeeded in complying with your intentions.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES DE HAULT DE LASSUS,
Lieut. Col. in His Catholic Majesty's service, and commander of the Post of New Madrid.

Lieutenant Colonel Charles de Hault de Lassus to Lieutenant Taylor.

NEW MADRID, (on the Mississippi) December 18, 1796.

SIR:

According to his excellency, Major General Wayne's desire, I have the honor to inform you of my having received, from the Governor General of this province, information respecting the ratification of the treaty of friendship, navigation, and limits, between the King my master and the United States of America. You have seen, in his letter which I have read to you, that I have orders not to prevent, in the least, the going down the Mississippi of the commissioners appointed on the part of the United States to fix the limits, and of the troops that were to accompany them; but, that in the mean time he orders me to tell them, that the evacuation of the posts cannot take place until the time of high waters. I will beg leave to observe to you, that although this is the affirmative answer that General Wayne speaks of, yet, as he says that the troops who are to take possession of the posts are now waiting at Fort Massac, their coming down the river immediately, that is, before the high waters, would be somewhat sooner than the Governor General of this province seems to expect, and somewhat contrary to Major General Wayne's own intentions, since he tells the Baron de Carondelet, in his letter, to appoint the most convenient time for the evacuation of the posts. I hope you will be so good as to make that observation to such officers as are in possession of General Wayne's orders respecting the taking possession of the posts, and, at the same time, to make them sensible of the conveniency it will be, to both the Americans and the Spaniards, to wait for a more proper season for the transport of artillery, baggage, provisions, &c. which could not be moved, at this present time, without much trouble and risk, on account of the river being so remarkably low as to render its navigation very dangerous.

I have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES DE HAULT DE LASSUS,
Lieut. Col. in His Catholic Majesty's service, and commander of the Post of New Madrid.

To Lieutenant TAYLOR.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 125. [1st SESSION.

SPAIN, GREAT BRITAIN, AND FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED JUNE 22, 1797.

UNITED STATES, June 22, 1797.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

Immediately after I had received your resolution of the 10th of June, requesting a report respecting the depredations committed on the commerce of the United States, since the 1st of October, 1796, specifying the name of the vessel taken, where bound to or from, species of lading, the value (when it can be ascertained) of the vessel and cargo taken, and by what Power captured, particularizing those which have been actually condemned, together with the proper documents to ascertain the same, I directed a collection to be made of all such information as should be found in the possession of the Government. In consequence of which, the Secretary of State has made the report and the collection of documents which accompany this message, and are now laid before the House of Representatives, in compliance with their desire.

JOHN ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 21, 1797.

SIR:

I have the honor to lay before you a report respecting the depredations committed on the commerce of the United States since the 1st of October, 1796, as far conformable to the resolve of the House of Representatives of the 10th instant as the materials in my possession would admit. The number of captures will give a tolerably correct idea of the extent of our losses, and the documents will show the nature of the depredations, and the causes or pretences for which they have been committed.

I am, with the greatest respect, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

Report of the Secretary of State respecting the depredations committed on the commerce of the United States, since the 1st of October, 1796.

American vessels have been captured since the 1st of October, 1796, by the armed vessels of Spain, Great Britain, and France. Of captures by Spanish cruizers, one was of the polacre Independence, Captain Robertson, laden wholly on account of the United States, with stores for Algiers, in pursuance of the treaty with that regency. She was taken on the 16th of February last, at the entrance of the straits of Gibraltar, and carried into Cadiz. The polacre's papers were perfectly clear; among others, she had a special passport under the hand of the President of the United States, and the great seal thereof, declaring the vessel to be the property of two citizens of the United States, (whose names were inserted in the passport) and that the cargo was wholly the property of the United States, and destined for Algiers. She had, also, the passport of the Dey. The general of the marine had cleared the polacre and cargo; but the owners of the privateer appealed to the tribunal at Madrid, and on the 31st of March, there had been no decision known at Cadiz.

There have, probably, been a number of captures by Spanish cruisers, although not particularly specified; the consul of the United States in one of the ports of Spain having informed that, almost daily, American vessels were taken and brought in by French and Spanish privateers.

Captures and losses by British cruisers, the Secretary presumes, have not been numerous: for the citizens of the United States having, these three years past, been accustomed to look up to the Government for aid in prosecuting their claims, it is not to be doubted that, generally, these cases have been reported to the Department of State. An abstract of such as have been communicated is annexed.

In order to present a clearer view of French depredations, it will be necessary to notice the rules which she has prescribed to her cruisers and tribunals.

As applicable to captures made since last October, the decree of the Executive Directory of the 2d of July, 1796, merits the first attention. It announces that the conduct of France towards neutrals will be regulated by the manner in which they should suffer the English to treat them. At Malaga and Cadiz, the French consuls have interpreted this decree to authorize the capture and condemnation of American vessels for the single circumstance of their being destined to a British port. But its fullest effect has been produced in the West Indies, whose seas swarm with privateers and gun boats, which have been called forth by the latitude allowed to their depredations by the indefinite terms of that decree, and the explanatory orders of the agents of the Directory at Guadaloupe and St. Domingo. Two of these decrees have been already communicated to Congress,* and it may be only requisite here to refer to them.

At Guadaloupe an order was issued by Victor Hugues and Lebas, dated the 1st of February last, (13th Nivose, 5th year) authorizing the capture and condemnation of all neutral vessels bound to certain enumerated ports, which, it is pretended in the decree, were delivered up to the English, and are occupied and defended by emigrants; and, also, of such vessels as should be cleared out generally for the West Indies. This decree refers to and enforces a decree of the 24th of December, 1796, (4th Nivose last) issued in conformity with the decree of the Executive Directory of the 2d July, 1796, so far as it is not departed from by that decree of the 27th of February last. The decree of the 24th December has not been received at the Department of State; but is supposed to direct the confiscation of the cargoes of neutral vessels, bound to or from British ports, occupied by them before the present war. For it appears that, whilst they have confiscated both vessel and cargo in cases which fall within the scope of the decree of the 1st of February, they have spared the vessel, and confiscated only the cargo, where she had been bound to or from such acknowledged British port.

The agents of the Directory at Cape François, by their decree of the 27th November last, direct the capture and bringing into port of American vessels bound to or from British ports, there to remain until it should be further ordered. This further order was afterwards issued, as will appear by the copy of the condemnation of the ship Pattern, of New York; by which it will be seen that, like the consuls at Malaga and Cadiz, they interpret the decree of the Executive Directory of the 2d of July last, as authorizing the condemnation of American vessels merely because bound to or from a British port.

To the foregoing succeeded the decree of the Executive Directory of the 2d March last, which has been communicated to Congress during the present session. That copy of the decree was taken from a newspaper, and is now found to be imperfect. A translation from the decree, as officially published by the Directory, is annexed to this report. Although we do not yet know what is its operation, yet it cannot fail to produce very great vexation and loss to the American commerce; the documents it requires to prevent confiscations not having been before declared indispensable, or demanded, and no time being allowed for the vessels of the United States to provide themselves therewith.

Besides these several decrees, and others which, being more limited, the former have superseded, the old marine ordinances of France have been revived, and enforced with severity, both in Europe and the West Indies. The want of, or informality in, a bill of lading; the want of a certified list of the passengers and crew; the supercargo being by birth a foreigner, although a naturalized citizen of the United States; the destruction of a paper of any kind soever; and the want of a sea-letter, have been deemed sufficient to warrant a condemnation of American property, although the proofs of the property were indubitable.

The West Indies, as before remarked, have exhibited the most lamentable scenes of depredation. Indeed, the conduct of the public agents and of the commissioned cruisers there has surpassed all former examples. The American vessels have not only been captured under the decrees before mentioned, but when brought to trial in the French tribunals, the vessels and cargoes have been condemned, without admitting the owners, or their agents, to make any defence.

This seems to be done systematically, and for the obvious purpose of insuring condemnations. By this monstrous abuse in judicial proceedings, frauds, and falsehoods, as well as flimsy and shameless pretexts, pass unexamined and uncontradicted, and are made the foundation of sentences of condemnation.

The persons also of our citizens have been beaten, insulted, and cruelly imprisoned; and, in the forms used towards prisoners of war, they have been exchanged with the British for Frenchmen. American property going to, or coming from, neutral or even French ports, has been seized; it has even been forcibly taken when in their own ports, without any pretence, or no other than that they wanted it. At the same time, their cruisers are guilty of wanton and barbarous excesses, by detaining, plundering, firing at, burning, and distressing, American vessels.

Official papers to prove the very numerous depredations on our commerce, and the atrocities and abuses attending the capture and condemnation of our vessels and cargoes, by French cruisers and tribunals, not having been publicly called for, few have been received. Of former claims for injuries committed since the beginning of 1793, and of which a report was made to the House of Representatives on the 27th of February last, a very small proportion had been satisfied; and for a considerable time no payments had been obtained. Under this distant and discouraging prospect of obtaining compensation, the citizens, suffering by more recent French depredations, have generally omitted to present accounts of their losses; and they have, in many cases, had no opportunity of getting the evidence of the condemnations, which are attainable before the tribunals of other nations; the mock trials, as before observed, being very often carried on, and sentences of condemnation pronounced in the absence of the American owner, master, or supercargo.

Such documents as the Department of State is possessed of concerning these depredations are annexed; and to them is added a concise abstract of the cases. These support the principal facts above stated, and show the nature of French depredations. To supply, in some measure, the want of official papers, an examination has been made of two newspapers published in Philadelphia, the Gazette of the United States, and the Philadelphia Gazette, from the 1st of July, 1796, to the present time. Between the 1st of July, and the 1st of October, few captures were made, the decree of the Directory, of July the 2d, not being in general operation until October. This examination was chiefly made prior to the call of the House of Representatives for a report on this subject, with a view to ascertain the number of French captures, and the circumstances attending them; and the result of the whole is annexed. It is regretted that the time did not permit a re-examination of those papers, to ascertain likewise the captures made by the British cruisers. The editors of those two gazettes agree in saying that no great attention was paid to the subject for the purpose of inserting accounts of all the captures which were published in the various other newspapers; yet the number collected exceeds three hundred, of which but few escape condemnation. The evidence arising from the multiplied and concurrent publications of these facts in the newspapers, some of them certified by the American masters of the captured vessels, cannot fail of producing a conviction of the reality of the evils represented.

There have been frequent accounts of attempts to effect condemnations by bribing the officers and seamen of our vessels to swear falsely; but it was reserved to these times, when offered bribes were refused and threats despised, to endeavor to accomplish the object by TORTURE. This was inflicted by a French privateer. The evidence of the fact appears in the protest of Captain William Martin, master of the ship Cincinnatus, of Baltimore, in which he is supported by the testimony of his mate and one of his seamen. A copy of the protest is annexed, together with an extract of a letter from Mr. King, minister of the United States in London, who examined Captain Martin's thumbs, and says the marks of the torturing screws will go with him to his grave. All which is respectfully submitted.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 21, 1797.

No. 1.

Abstract of two cases of capture made by British cruisers, of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, since 1st October, 1796, and wherein documents have been received at the Department of State; also a copy of a memorandum, filed by Samuel Smith, Esquire, relating to captures made by the British, of vessels in the property of which he was concerned.

NOTE. No documents accompany the two cases of capture above mentioned, they having been sent to London in order that compensation might be obtained for the damage suffered.

The schooner St. Patrick, Robert Gardner, master, belonging to Thomas Stagg, Junior, Thomas Snell, and Joseph Foulke, all native citizens of the United States, the two former residing at New York, and the latter at Curacoa, as agent of the partnership of which he was a member.

31st July, 1796, she sailed from New York, bound to Curacoa, then a colony of the States of Holland, being allies of Great Britain, with a cargo of provisions and dry goods, the property of the said owners of the vessel.

18th of August she arrived at the place of her destination, and delivered her cargo to the said Foulke, who shipped on board her, in return, a cargo of hides and goat skins, besides five thousand dollars in cash, the property of the said owners of the vessel.

About the 1st September following, she sailed for New York.

About the 15th of the same month, she was captured by His Britannic Majesty's ship of war Topaze, Captain Church, in company with the Thisbe, Capt. Oaks, and the Thetis, Captain Cochran, and was by them sent for Bermuda, where she arrived on the 22d.

Proceedings were duly commenced against her in the court of vice admiralty; and on the 4th November the judge thereof decreed that the vessel and cargo should be restored; certified probable cause for the capture, and ordered the claimant to pay the taxed costs of the court. The captors appealed, and the master appealed for costs and damages.

The schooner Lively, John Clarke, master, belonging to John Gardner, junior, of the city of Philadelphia.

She was captured and carried into Martinico, where the cargo, (except ten casks of nails which were condemned as contraband) as well as the vessel, was acquitted by the court of vice-admiralty, on the 27th of February.

List of captured vessels belonging to the Messrs. Smiths, &c. of Baltimore, deposited in the office of the Department of State, by General Smith, June 17, 1797.

The ship James, John Smith, master, laden by Samuel and John Smith, and S. Smith and Buchanan, with a cargo of flour, 2,260 barrels, which cost thirty thousand two hundred and fifty dollars, sailed from Baltimore the 1st December last; was captured by two French frigates and sent into Guadaloupe; the supercargo was imprisoned for several days, but afterwards released and permission given to sell his cargo, which, thus sold, produced only 23,576 dollars.

On learning the ship James was captured, we immediately despatched our schooner William, Francis Smithwich, master, (then laden and about to sail for Jacmel, with a cargo which cost four thousand dollars) for Guadaloupe, with such letters to the supercargo as we supposed would be useful. The William was captured off Guadaloupe by the British, and sent into Martinique; after a short detention she was released, but immediately after leaving Martinique, lost both masts in a squall, was then obliged to put into St. Croix to refit, and from thence having learned that the James was released, proceeded to Cape François, where she disposed of her outward cargo, and took an order on Jacmel for a load of coffee which she received, and on her voyage home was taken by the Hind British sloop of war, and sent into Jeremie, about the 13th of May; from Jeremie she was sent to Port-au-Prince for trial, where she was waiting the arrival of the judge at our last accounts, dated 18th May. The captain writes that he had on board 100,000 lbs. coffee, the value of which is about 22,000 dollars.

The brig Gratitude, James Clifton, master, laden at New York, by Mr. Archibald Gracie, on account, and by order of Samuel and John Smith, John Hollins, and S. Smith and Buchanan, sailed from thence about the 1st March last, with a cargo of beef and pork, which cost nine thousand nine hundred and thirty-eight dollars thirty-six cents, bound to Cape François. Off Fort Dauphin was boarded by the Ceres, British frigate, and sent under convoy to the Mole, where permission being refused for her to proceed elsewhere, the supercargo was compelled to sell the cargo at public sale, where it produced only six thousand four hundred and fifty-one, leaving a loss of three thousand four hundred and twelve dollars, and sixty-four cents.

The brig Abeona, Isaac Isaacs, master, laden by Samuel and John Smith, John Hollins, and S. Smith and Buchanan, with a cargo of sundries, bound to Cape François, was boarded by the British frigate Ceres, Captain Newman, and by her sent to the Mole, where, as in the case of the Gratitude, her cargo was sold at public vendue, except such part as was said to be inadmissible at an English port, and these were ordered to be taken back to America. The sales at vendue amounted to seven thousand nine hundred and forty-seven dollars, twenty-five cents, the candles and soap not permitted to be landed, cost eight hundred and fifty dollars; the cost of the cargo, when it left Baltimore, was thirteen thousand three hundred and twenty-eight dollars. The Abeona, returning from the Mole to Baltimore, was captured by a French privateer, and sent into Jean Rabel; Captain Isaacs went to the Cape and got her released; but before he could return to Jean Rabel, his brig had been cut out by the British, and sent to the Mole. Captain Isaacs went on to the Mole to claim his vessel: the soap and candles, before declared inadmissible, were taken out at the Mole, and the brig sent down to Jamaica for trial. Captain Isaacs rose upon the prize master, and arrived yesterday with the brig.

The cargo cost, from hence,	$13,328 00
The sales at vendue,	7,947 25
Loss,	$5,380 75

The brig Fell's Point, Captain Creighton, sailed from Baltimore in March, with a cargo of flour, &c. the property of Samuel and John Smith, John Hollins, and S. Smith and Buchanan, bound to Cape François, was boarded by the British, sent to the Mole, where her cargo would not sell; it was put into store, and the brig has returned with produce, for a small advance made by the house with whom the business was left. This cargo cost sixteen thousand five hundred and thirty-six dollars, twenty-nine cents.

The brig Fanny, Captain Richard Fisher, laden with flour, on account of Samuel and John Smith, John Hollins, and S. Smith and Buchannan, sailed from Baltimore for Cape François, in March; was boarded by the British, and sent to the Mole; from the Mole, as his cargo would not sell at any price, Captain Fisher obtained permission to proceed to Jeremie, where, he writes, his cargo was equally unsaleable. This cargo cost nine thousand six hundred dollars.

The schooner Sally, laden with coffee, on account of John Hollins, and S. Smith and Buchanan, sailed from Petit Guave, about the 15th May, bound to Baltimore; was captured by the British, and sent into Jeremie; from Jeremie she was ordered to Port-au-Prince, where, at the last accounts, she was waiting the arrival of the judge. The exact value of this cargo is not known—it is estimated at twenty-two thousand dollars.

The ship Sidney, Captain James Parker, laden at Surinam, with coffee, sugar and cotton, on the account of Samuel and John Smith, and S. Smith and Buchanan, on her passage to Baltimore was captured about the 12th April past, and sent into St. Kitts, by the Portland, of Antigua, a British privateer. The only letter received from Captain Parker, is dated 15th April; he had only just reached St. Kitts, and did not know what would be her fate. Of this cargo no duplicate invoice has been received; its probable value is about one hundred thousand dollars.

No. 2.

Decree of the Executive Directory.

12th Ventose, (March 2, 1797) 5th year.

The Executive Directory having considered the law of the 9th of March, 1793, which, stating that the flags of neutral Powers not being respected by the enemies of the French republic, and all the rights of nations being violated to its prejudice, the French people can therefore no longer fulfil, towards those Powers in general, the wish which they have so often manifested, and which they will constantly form for the full and entire freedom of commerce and navigation, among other regulations, ordains:

1. That French ships of war and privateers may stop and bring into the ports of the republic neutral ships which shall be found laden in whole or in part, with merchandise belonging to enemies.

2. That merchandise belonging to the enemies shall be declared good prize, and be confiscated to the benefit of the captors.

3. That, in all cases, the neutral ships shall be released as soon as the unlading of the merchandise seized shall be effected; that the freight of it shall be paid at the rate which shall have been stipulated by the freighters, and that a just indemnity shall be granted in proportion to the time of their detention, by the tribunals whose duty it is to take cognizance of the validity of prizes.

4. That these tribunals shall be obliged, moreover, three days after their decision, to furnish a copy of the inventory of the merchandise to the Minister of Marine, and another copy to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

5. That the present law, applicable to all prizes which have been made since the declaration of war, shall cease to have effect as soon as the enemy Powers shall have declared free and not seizable, though destined for the ports of the republic, merchandises laden on board of neutral ships, which shall belong to the Government or citizens of France.

Having likewise considered the law of the 27th of July, 1793, which, confirming that of the 9th May preceding, before repealed, ordains that it shall have its full and entire execution, and that, consequently, all other regulations to the contrary are, and remain, abrogated; which abrogation evidently comprehends the law of the first of the same month, by which the vessels of the United States of America had been excepted from the law of the 9th of May, conformably to the fifteenth article of the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778.

Having also considered the 7th article of the law of the 13th Nivose, 3d year, (3d or 4th of January, 1795) which enjoins on all the agents of the republic, on all commanders of the armed force, and on all officers, civil and military, to cause to be respected and observed, in all their acts, the treaties which unite France to the neutral Powers of the old continent, and to the United States of America; and adds, that no infringement shall be made of those treaties, and that all regulations which are contrary thereto, are annulled.

Considering that this last law does not derogate from that of May 9th, 1793, except in favor of those neutral Powers whose treaties, now subsisting with the French republic, are contrary to its regulations; that it is consequently of importance, for the information as well of commanders of the armed force of the republic, and of vessels commissioned by it, as of the tribunals appointed to decide on the validity of prizes, to take measures for preventing them from supposing either that treaties exist, which never have taken place, or from considering, as in force, treaties concluded for a determinate time, which has expired; or that they ought to execute according to the letter, treaties, which have been modified since their conclusion; that to this last class particularly belongs the treaty of amity and commerce concluded on the 6th of February, 1778, between France and the United States of America; that, in fact, by the second article of this treaty, France and the United States engage mutually not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party; and that it is added by the same article, that this other party shall enjoy the same favor freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional; that thus the regulations stipulated in favor of England by the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded at London the 19th of November, 1794, between that Power and the United States of America, are deemed to have been stipulated in favor of the French republic itself, and, consequently, modify in those points, which are contrary thereto, the treaty concluded on the 6th of February, 1778; that, agreeably to these regulations, the French Government declared, by its decrees of the 14th and 28th of Messidor, 4th year, (2d and 16th of July, 1796) as it is again obliged to do at this time, that it will use the just measures of reciprocity, which it had a right to exercise in this respect, in every thing which is connected with the circumstances of the war, as well as with the political, commercial, and maritime interests of the French republic; that, consequently, it is necessary to ascertain, by reconciling the treaties of the 6th of February, 1778, and of the 19th of November, 1794, whatever is doubtful, concerning the cases in which this right of reciprocity may be exercised.

Considering that there have arisen, very recently, concerning the manner of proving the property of vessels and merchandise pretended to belong to neutrals, doubts and contests which would never have taken place if the ancient regulations relative to this matter had been better known; that it is consequently of importance to bring again into view these regulations, and cause to be executed the 5th article of the law of the 14th of February, 1793, which shall be continued in force.

After having heard the ministers of Justice, of the Marine, and of the Colonies, decree as follows:

Article I. The commissioners of the Executive Directory near the civil tribunals of the departments shall take care, that, in the contests about the validity of maritime captures, no judgment shall be given which is founded on the 7th article of the law of the 13th of Nivose, 3d year (3d or 4th of January, 1795) without the minister of Justice having been previously consulted, conformably to the third article of the law of the 8th of Floreal, 4th year (27th of April, 1796) relative to the treaties, by virtue of which, neutrals might claim an exemption by means of the first of these laws, from the execution of that of 9th of May, 1793.

Art. II. The minister of Justice shall consequently examine, whether the treaties appealed to are yet in force, or whether they have been modified since their conclusion: he shall, for this purpose, be furnished by the Minister of External Relations, with all the documents which he shall have need of, and shall make a report thereof to the Executive Directory, as is prescribed by the law of the 8th of Floreal, 4th year.

Art. III. The Executive Directory reminds all French citizens, that the treaty made on the 6th of February, 1778, between France and the United States of America, has, according to the terms of the second article, been modified of full right, by that which was made at London on the 19th of November, 1794, between the United States of America and England; consequently,

1. According to the 17th article of the treaty of London, of the 19th of November, 1794, transcribed here below, (a) all merchandise of the enemy, or merchandise not sufficiently proved to be neutral, laden under the American flag, shall be confiscated; but the vessel on board of which it shall be found shall be released and restored to the owner. It is enjoined on the commissaries of the Executive Directory, to accelerate, by all the means in their power, the decision of contests which shall arise, either on the validity of the prize cargo, or on the freights and demurrage.

2. According to the 18th article of the treaty of London, of the 19th November, 1794, transcribed here below, (b) to the articles declared contraband by the 24th article of the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, are added the following articles:

Timber for ship building, pitch, tar, and rosins, copper in sheets, sails, hemp, and cordage, and every thing which serves directly or indirectly for the armament and equipment of vessels, unwrought iron and fir planks excepted. These several articles shall be confiscated whenever they shall be destined, or attempted to be carried to the enemy.

3. According to the 21st article of the treaty of London, of the 19th of November, 1794, transcribed here below (c) every individual known to be an American, who shall hold a commission given by the enemies of France, as well as every seaman of that nation making a part of the crew of enemy ships, shall, by that act alone, be declared a pirate, and be treated as such, without being allowed in any case to allege that he was forced to it by violence, menaces, or otherwise.

4. Conformably to the law of the 14th of February, 1793, the regulations of the 21st October, 1744, and of the 26th July, 1778, concerning the manner of proving the property of neutral ships and merchandise, shall be executed according to their form and tenor.

Every American ship shall, therefore, be a good prize, which shall not have on board a list of the crew in proper form; such as is prescribed by the model annexed to the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, the observance of which is required by the 25th and 27th articles of the same treaty.

5. It is enjoined on the commissaries of the Executive Directory to call down the rigor of the tribunals on the fraudulent manœuvres of every ship owner calling himself a neutral, whether an American, or of any other nation, on board of whose ship there shall be found, as has been many times practised in the present war, either blank sea-papers, although signed and sealed, or blank papers in the form of letters, containing the signatures of individuals, or double passports, or sea-letters which indicate different destinations of the vessel, or double invoices, bills of lading, or sea-papers of what kind soever, which assigns to the whole or part of the same merchandise different owners, or different destinations.

6. By means of the regulations of the present decree, that of the 9th of Frimaire last, (29th of November, 1796) concerning freights and demurrage, is repealed so far as relates to demurrage only.

7. The present decree shall be inserted in the journal of the laws.

The ministers of the Marine and of the Colonies, of Justice, and of Foreign Relations, are charged with the execution of it, in their respective departments.

REWBELL, President.
LAGARDE, Secretary General.

(b) Art. 18. "In order to regulate what is in future to be esteemed contraband of war, it is agreed, that, under the said denomination shall be comprised all arms, &c. as also timber for ship building, tar, or rosin,* copper in sheets, sails, hemp, and cordage, and generally whatever may serve directly† to the equipment of vessels, unwrought iron and fir planks only excepted; and all the above articles are hereby declared to be just objects of confiscation, whenever they are attempted to be carried to an enemy."

* The decree of the Directory says "pitch, tar, and rosins." [Brais, goudron, et résines.]
† The decree says, "directly or indirectly."

(c) ART. 21. "It is likewise agreed, that the subjects and citizens of the two nations shall not do any acts of hostility or violence against each other, nor accept commissions or instructions so to act, from any foreign prince or State, enemies to the other party; nor shall the enemies of one of the parties be permitted to invite, or endeavor to enlist in their military service, any of the subjects or citizens of the other party, and the laws against all such offences and aggressions shall be punctually executed. And if any subject or citizen of the said parties respectively shall accept any foreign commission or letters of marque, for arming any vessel to act as a privateer against the other party, and be taken by the other party, it is hereby declared to be lawful for the said party to treat and punish the said subject or citizen, having such commission* or letter of marque, as a pirate."

MALAGA, 3d Frimaire, 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Permit me, Mr. consul, to reply in the French language; it will cause less delay, and the sense will be more precise.

The French republic does and will know how to cause neutrality to be respected by its ships of war, and by her privateers, upon every point in which the neutral Powers cause the same to be respected by the English. The Rover and the Nancy are detained not under frivolous pretexts, but because, according to the ordinances which serve as a rule to the French privateers, they have, more or less, come within the confiscating clause, especially the Rover. You are not ignorant that French merchants have an indirect interest in these vessels; therefore, I cannot be deceived in my opinion by my attachment to my fellow-citizens, since in this circumstance they are Frenchmen opposed to Frenchmen.

You ask me what papers an American commercial vessel should have on board to avoid running the same risk. I conceive that every merchant should, in this respect, consult the ordinances of the Powers at war, relative to privateers, &c. Doubtless you will perceive that I can but imperfectly extract in a letter the ordinances of France on this subject; that it would be unfair to exact from me a task more complete than the means which I point out.

I shall only observe, because the observation in my opinion has escaped many of the merchants of this place, that the vessel should have a signed bill of lading of the whole cargo, containing her destination and names of the owners; and that in case transfers† and changes in the cargo are to take place, which require unsigned bills of lading, to be signed only when the cargo shall be in a definitive state, these unsigned bills of lading are insufficient, and there should be others signed, containing the cargo, such as it is, before their arrival at the place of transfer; without which, the cargo would be liable to be detained and confiscated, should it not be otherwise pointed out, as well as the destination, &c. in some bill, manifest, or charter party, in proper form, and signed, and on board of the vessel. I shall add, that there should not be on board either captain, officer, supercargo, or agent, of an enemy's country; that they should not tear nor suppress any paper; that the vessel should be furnished with a passport, or paper proving the property of the vessel, &c.; that upwards of two-thirds of the crew should belong to the neutral country; that she ought to have proofs of the neutrality of the vessel and cargo; in a word, that in the present circumstance, she should not come from, nor even be destined to an enemy's port; the latter case exposing her likewise to confiscation, according to the proceedings of the English marine, &c. &c.

I repeat that this short enumeration is necessarily very incomplete; that it is given only from the respect I have for you, and that it will be proper to recur to the ordinances, regulations, decrees, and arrêts of the French Government. They are so interesting to maritime commerce, that they should be familiar to all those who follow it. I pray you, sir, to be persuaded of my attachment.

No. 3.

Copies of Documents, remaining in the Department of State, relative to American vessels captured or condemned by the French, since 1st October, 1796.

BRIG DESPATCH, (LUNT.)

The declaration and representation of Martin Parry, William Ham, and Thomas Lunt, all of Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, merchants and citizens of the United States of America, owners of the brig Despatch and cargo, captured by a French private ship or vessel of war, carried into Port-au-Paix, and condemned by the commission at Cape François, is as follows: All the said persons solemnly aver and declare, that the said brig sailed from Portsmouth aforesaid, on the 14th day of August, 1796, bound to the West Indies. That, at that time, and until and at her capture and condemnation as aforesaid, they were truly and exclusively the owners of said brig and cargo, saving only the small adventures belonging to the seamen on board. That when said brig sailed as aforesaid, the master, the said Thomas Lunt, was furnished with and possessed of a register, sea-letter, and all other papers, required by law to evidence that the property was bona fide and wholly American. And the said master, Thomas Lunt, declares, that he arrived in the said brig at Cape Nicholas Mole, on or about the 5th day of September, in the year aforesaid. That he disposed of his deck load of lumber there, and proceeded directly to Port-au-Prince, and there finished the sale of his cargo for cash, and purchased a load of molasses at L'Archaye and Bouccassin Plantations, consisting of 144 hogsheads, and several tierces and barrels, the whole, at the lowest estimation, containing 16,500 gallons. That he sailed from Port-au-Prince for home; that is, the said Portsmouth, on or about the 29th day of October, in the year aforesaid. And after beating in the Bite of Leogane for sixteen days against northerly winds and a strong current, he put into Cape Nicholas Mole, and there filled up their water, having three casks empty, and sailed from thence about the 17th day of November. That on the 18th day of the same, they were captured by the French privateer Adelaide, John Thetard, master, who seized every scrip of paper they could find. And no papers were concealed or destroyed. The captors then carried the said brig into Port-au-Paix, and from thence the papers were all ordered to Cape François, accompanied by the master, mate, and people's declarations before the justices at Port-au-Paix. The master proceeded immediately to the Cape, where he got information of the day when the trial was to come on of said brig and cargo. He endeavored to gain admittance with an attorney, but was refused, being told that the place was sacred, and no person admitted there. That, on the 27th day of December now last past, he was informed by the Secretary, that his vessel and cargo were condemned, but could not obtain a copy of the sentence or decree until the 7th day of January. That he made application for his own private papers and accounts, but was denied even a sight of them. That in the copy of the decree, or sentence, mention is made of sixteen hogsheads of molasses as belonging to a Mr. Forbes, a British subject; but this representation is wholly erroneous, and destitute of foundation or evidence. There was no molasses or other property on board belonging directly or indirectly, to any person or persons but the aforesaid owners, excepting the small adventures of the people belonging to the said brig. The said master had with him papers relating to his then last voyage, which were seized by the captors, with the rest. Among these there was indeed a bill of sixteen hogsheads of molasses; but it was molasses purchased by the said Forbes, for the said master, on the said former voyage, and had no connexion with the cargo on board. The bill was made out by the planter to Mr. Forbes, and he charged the molasses in his account

* The decree of the Directory declares, that, not only those Americans who take commissions of the enemies of France, but all American seamen making part of the crew of their enemies' vessels, shall be treated as pirates, even though compelled by force to serve in such ships.

current with the said master, and gave him the said bill, to show the quantity, and it was with the same account current when he was taken. He also declares that the date of said bill is erroneously mentioned in said decree, as the same molasses was purchased and received of said Forbes in April, 1796. And he conceives he could have clearly evinced all this, had he obtained opportunity to be heard, to the entire satisfaction of the commissioners, the judges.

And these declarants further and unitedly say, that, by the capture and condemnation aforesaid, they have suffered the loss of $14,454 dollars, at a low estimation, exclusive of Captain Lunt's expenses and loss of time.

PORTSMOUTH, March 10, 1797.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of New Hampshire.

Be it known that, on this 10th day of March, in the year 1797, at Portsmouth, in said State, before me, Daniel Humphreys, Esq. notary public, in and for the same State, by letters patent duly commissioned and sworn, personally came and appeared, Martin Parry, William Ham, and Thomas Lunt, all of the same Portsmouth, merchants, and citizens of the said States, persons to me well known, and worthy of good credit, and subscribed the foregoing declaration in my presence, and being by me duly and severally sworn, on their oath did depose to be true, the things and matters by them therein jointly and respectively set forth and declared, in such manner as the said declaration purports to be the affirmation of each of the deponents.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal of office, the day and year last before written.

IN THE NAME OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

Extract from the registers of the deliberations of the Commission, sent by the French Government to the Windward Islands.

CAPE, 7th Nivose,
5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Having examined the minutes of the proceedings on the arrest of the brig Despatch, of Portsmouth, Captain Thomas Lunt, by the privateer Adelaide, commanded by John Thetard, from which it appears that the said brig was taken on the 27th Brumaire last, bound from Port-au-Prince and the Mole, and on her return to Portsmouth.

The declaration of Peter L'Aborde, master of the said prize, before the justice of the peace of Port de Paix, on the 28th of last Frimaire, relative to the said capture, and his being carried into the road of Port de Paix.

Also, a declaration of Peter L'Aborde, and John Dallon, port warden at Port de Paix, relative to the change of anchorage of the said brig, by her captain, Lunt, on the refusal of the latter to return to his former anchoring ground, the said declaration containing a protest of the said Peter L'Aborde, as prize master of the said brig, against whatever might result from the refusal of the said Lunt. Having examined the minutes of the inventory of the papers, on board of the said brig, by the said justice of peace, and seen the minutes of the proceedings in fixing the seals on board of the said brig by the said justice of peace, and the inventory of the vessel, as also the minutes noticing the said seals on board of the said brig, and the appointment of a person to guard them; in which minutes, the said Captain Thomas Lunt being asked if he had not, in his possession, or on board his vessel, any papers, letters, or journals, relative to his voyage, as well as the cargo with which he is laden, delivered to the justice of peace sundry papers, letters, or journals, of which he made a small packet, sealed with the seal of the said captain, and by him *paraphee, observing that the paper, serving as a cover to them, was found by citizen Canelle, under the hat of the mate of the brig. The interrogatories answered by three of the crew of the said brig before the said justice of peace.

Having seen a stitched book containing translations, into the French language, of the papers of the said brig, written or printed in English, and of which the following are a part:

1st. An acquittance from the custom house at Port-au-Prince, on the discharge of Thomas Lunt, captain of the brig Despatch, dated 27th October, 1796.

2d. An acquittance from the custom house of St. Nicholas Mole on the discharge of Thomas Lunt, captain of the brig Despatch, dated 27th October, 1796.

A number of invoices, written in the French language, of sugar and syrups, sold by sundry persons to Thomas Lunt, and of the growth of the plantations of L'Archaye and Bouccassin.

In a word, having seen the French invoice of 16 hogsheads of molasses, sold to Mr. Forbes, and delivered to Captain Lunt, amounting to 4,457 livres, 14 sous. The said invoice being dated at Bouccassin, 28th October, 1796, and signed by Dabadeillesse.

Considering that the minutes of the capture of said brig, of the interrogatories of the crew, the acquittances of the custom houses of Port-au-Prince and the Mole, the dates of the invoices; that, in fact, there is scarcely one of these papers which is not, in itself, a proof that the brig Despatch sailed from ports of the colony in the power of the enemy.

Considering that the sixteen hogsheads of molasses, designated in the invoice above mentioned, signed by Dabadeillesse, belonging to Forbes, a known Englishman, from Jamaica, of a commercial house at Port-au-Prince. The commission has decreed, and hereby does decree, that the said brig Despatch and her cargo are good prize, and shall be sold to the profit of the captors. That, therefore, all persons having charge of the said brig and cargo shall be held to deliver the same to the said captors. The present decree shall be notified to Captain Lunt by Captain Thetard, and, for the complete execution of the present decree, the captor shall make provision with the proper persons.

BRIG RESOLUTION.

Edward and Samuel Cutts to Timothy Pickering, Secretary of State.

PORTSMOUTH, April 3, 1797.

SIR:

We conceive it necessary to lay before our Government the state of the loss of our brig Resolution and cargo. She sailed from the port of Demarara, bound to this port about the 20th of last August, and on the 29th of the same month was captured by a French privateer and carried into Porto Rico. After having been detained three months, the cargo was condemned without trial, upon the frivolous pretence of their not finding such papers as they thought sufficient to prove the property American; and of her being from a port in possession of the British, notwithstanding the said vessel had every paper lawful and customary respecting herself and cargo, proving both to be bona fide American property, which papers were taken possession of by the captors, immediately upon possessing themselves of the vessel, and were never afterwards recoverable by the captain, except the register of his vessel. His vessel was likewise restored to him, but as they had stripped him of his last shilling, even to his clothes, and imposed upon him heavy charges, he was under the necessity of disposing of her for the trifling sum of three hundred and twenty-five dollars, to defray his expenses.

* Marked with a knot or flourish.

The protest, condemnation, and other papers can be forwarded as occasion may require. A statement of our loss is in the account enclosed and we trust that restitution will be procured for us, for so flagrant a violation of our property.

We are, with all due respect, &c.

SCHOONER DELIGHT, (HATCH.)

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.—Hancock ss.

Be it remembered, that, on the tenth day of May, Anno Domini 1797, came before me the subscriber, notary public of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, for the county of Hancock, residing at Castine, late Penobscot, in said county, Mark Hatch, jun. master of the schooner Delight of Penobscot, and John Hatch, mate of the said schooner, and made the following protest, viz: That, on the 19th day of November last, he sailed from the island of Barbadoes, and, on the 15th of December following, in latitude 37. 30. longitude 64. 30. split our jib. On December 18th, lying to in a gale of wind at northwest, split out the whole of the mainsail, above the balance reef, then put to scudding under bare poles; on the 20th of December, being in a gale of wind at northwest, a sea struck us down on our beam ends, and shifted the ballast and cargo, and did much damage to the vessel, then put a scudding. On the 21st December, shipped a sea over the stern carried away the binnacle and compasses. On the 30th, lying to under a balance reef main sail, split it all to pieces, then bore away for the West Indies, being in distress and out of water. On February 17th, sailed again from Barbadoes, having repaired the vessel; on the 20th of February, at two o'clock, P. M. was chased by a French privateer, which came up with us at 4 o'clock; the captain of the privateer ordered me to hoist out my boat and go on board with my papers, which I did; he sent the boat back with a prize master and four hands, and brought two of my crew on board the privateer, and ordered the vessel for Porto Rico. The captain of the privateer kept the register, the sea-letter, and my protest, and sent only the clearance and some letters in my schooner; I saw the captain lock the papers up in his chest; I was on board the privateer three weeks, during which time several articles of clothing, my trunk, and spy glass, were taken from me; I was carried, in the privateer, to St. John's, in Porto Rico; my schooner was carried into the same place, but the prize master went down to St. Domingo, and got her condemned there before the privateer arrived. The reason given for her condemnation is, that there was no register nor sea-letter, and both these papers the captain had in his chest on board the privateer. My mate went to Porto Rico, in my schooner, and requested of the prize master to let him go down to St. Domingo to attend the trial; he was encouraged that he should go, but was afterwards refused. After the vessel was condemned, I and my crew were put on shore, without any money or provisions, and must have perished, had we not taken shelter on board American vessels in the island.

MARK HATCH, Jr.
JOHN HATCH.

Wherefore, the said deponents, and I the said notary, do hereby most solemnly protest against Louis Giradeau, officer of the French privateer the Vengeance, for seizing, by force of arms, the said Mark, his vessel, papers, and cargo. And also all others concerned in aiding and assisting in the seizure and detention of the said Mark, his vessel, papers, and cargo aforesaid, and against all the damages, losses, costs, and expenses already suffered by means thereof. In testimony whereof, the said deponents have hereunto set their hands, and in faith and testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my notarial seal at Castine aforesaid, the day and year first above written.

CONDEMNATION OF SCHOONER DELIGHT.

We, Francis Pons, judge of the tribunal provisional of prizes established at St. Domingo.

Upon examination of the petition presented to us, by citizen Louis Giradeau, officer of the French privateer the Vengeance, in the name of the captain and crew of said privateer, praying that the said schooner taken under American colors, named the Delight, by the said privateer, and carried into Porto Rico, may be declared good prize. Having seen the clearance of the said schooner, dated 17th November, 1796. Having seen the other papers of the said schooner which the said citizen Louis Giradeau has exhibited to us, consisting of some letters, accounts, &c. among which we have not found either a sea-letter, nor certificate of registry of said vessel, nor the proof that she belonged to a citizen of the United States. Having observed also, that those papers are the only ones which, by the 25th article of the treaty of friendship and commerce between France and the United States, dated the 6th February, 1778, determines what vessels and cargoes are American property. And what defect on the contrary shows that they are English property covered by American colors. Having seen the resolutions of the commissary of the executive power of our tribunal, and maturely considered the same, do condemn and declare good prize, the said schooner Delight, with her cargo, the whole to be confiscated and sold to the advantage of the captors, by them to be disposed of according to the terms of their charter party, reserving the rights of the tribunal and of the invalids of the republic.

SCHOONER TWO FRIENDS, (VAN RENSELAER.)

LIBERTY. EQUALITY. FRATERNITY.

IN THE NAME OF THE PEOPLE OF FRANCE.

In the 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible, the 28th Ventose, in the morning.

Before the undersigned public notaries, appeared the citizen W. Van Renselaer, captain of the schooner Two Friends of New York, assisted by citizen Adrian O'Quin, interpreter of foreign languages in this town, who has deposited with Gaernier, one of the undersigned notaries, a declaration under private signature by him this day executed and attested by three men belonging to his crew; which paper he has requested the said Gaernier to enter formally on his minutes, that he might deliver a copy of it to whoever might require the same, which has been delivered to the said appearer, after having been certified to be true, and signed and marked in presence of the undersigned notaries.

Done, and passed at Jacmel, in the study, the day, month, and year above mentioned; and after having been read, the said appearer signed the same with the interpreter, and us the said notaries. Signed, W. Van Renselaer, O'Quin, Vallenet, notary, and Gaernier, notary.

The following is the declaration alluded to: I the undersigned W. Van Renselaer, captain of the schooner Two Friends of New York, belonging to Mr. Thomas White, make the present declaration, and protest before the notaries at Jacmel. That I cleared out, at the custom house at Wilmington, on the 13th of February, 1796, for Martinique, put to sea on the 15th, and on the 18th, sent back my pilot, the wind being at south-west, and blowing a fresh breeze with a high sea, which continued until the 22d. After this time, and until I reached the latitude of 26 degrees north, longitude 58, nothing happened to us until I was taken, which was on the 6th of March. At six o'clock in the morning I perceived three sail, one of three masts, a brig and a schooner at a distance from us: the wind at the south, at 10 o'clock the schooner gave us chase, after 12 o'clock came up with us. This was a French privateer called the Voltigeur, Captain Loumbard. She had been out from Curaçoa twenty-six days upon a cruise; she brought us to, sent her boat aboard, took possession of my vessel and crew, sending me, in the first instance, on board the privateer, and, during my absence, took from my chest all my papers and a great proportion of my effects. They likewise pillaged the chest of Joseph Crouder, my mate, of the greatest part of his effects, as well as those of the crew. They took the journal, and sent the mate with two seamen on board the privateer, leaving three of my crew on board the schooner; they sent a prize master with six seamen to take her to Curaçoa. Myself, mate, and two sailors being still on board the privateer, on the 8th of March at break of day a sail was descried, they gave her chase, and at eight o'clock they overtook her. This was an American vessel, called the Industry of Charleston, Captain Joseph Lovel, bound to Jacmel; the captain had the goodness to receive us from on board the privateer, in which we suffered greatly, and we arrived yesterday about noon in the port of Jacmel, where I this day make the present declaration to serve in case of need. At Jacmel, this 28th Ventose, (18 March, 1797, O. S.) 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible, signed on the minutes, W. Van Renselaer.

We, the undersigned, Joseph Crouder, mate of the schooner Two Friends, and Stephen Hyter, and Spencer Morison, seamen, on board the said schooner Two Friends, of New York, Captain W. Van Renselaer—certify and attest that the above declaration of Captain W. Van Renselaer is exact, and agreeable to the truth; at Jacmel, the said day, month, and year, above mentioned. Signed on the minutes, Joseph Crouder, Stephen Hyter, and Spencer Morison.

I certify the above to be a true copy, signed and marked by desire, of the report deposited by the undersigned notaries, this day 28th Ventose, fifth year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

We, the captain and major part of the officers and crew of the French privateer Voltigeur, Captain Loumbard, certify that about noon on the 16th Ventose, we visited the American schooner Two Friends, Captain William Van Renselaer, bound from Wilmington to Martinique, and that having found on board of him a quantity of tar, pitch, and turpentine, we conceived ourselves authorized to arrest him according to the existing laws of the French republic. In faith whereof we have delivered him these presents to serve him in case of need, and have sent his vessel for Guadaloupe. STATE OF NEW YORK, ss.

John W. Leonard, master of the schooner Blazing Star, of New York, maketh oath that, on or about the 20th day of April last, this deponent was at Curaçoa, and present at a public auction, when the schooner Two Friends of

New York, was sold to a Captain Hathaway for the sum of seven hundred and fifty pieces of eight, to the best of this deponent's recollection; and that this deponent doth believe it was a real sale, as he saw said Hathaway afterwards in possession of said vessel and fitting her for sea.

SCHOONER ZILPHA, (BRIARD.)

By this public instrument of protest, be it known unto all whom it may concern, that on the day of the date hereof, before me, Christopher Ellery, Esq. legally elected and engaged public notary, residing in Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, in the United States of America, cometh Samuel Briard, late master of the schooner Zilpha, of Portsmouth, owned by John Wardrobe and the said Samuel Briard, both citizens of the United States, and on his oath solemnly administered by me the said notary, deposeth and declareth that, he sailed in and with said schooner from Portsmouth aforesaid, which is in the State of New Hampshire, in said United States, on the 30th day of November last, bound to the island of Tobago, the said schooner being laden with beef, oil, fish, lumber, and other things, and properly fitted for the voyage, and arrived there on the 31st day of December following, that there having sold said cargo, and received in return for the same, and for a part of the cargo left there on credit in August last by John Flagg, then master of said schooner, forty-two puncheons of rum, one tierce and one barrel of sugar, on account of said Wardrobe and Briard; and also two puncheons of rum on account of said Flagg; and likewise two puncheons of rum belonging to the mate of the said schooner; he left the island on the 20th day of February last, bound to said Portsmouth, and proceeded on his proper course for the Mona passage to the leeward of the island of Porto Rico, until the 24th day of said February, when having said passage clearly in sight, he was intercepted, forcibly seized, and detained by a privateer schooner, mounting six carriage guns, belonging to citizens of the French republic, named the Hirondale, and commanded by Michael Seber, who, immediately on coming up, ordered the course of the schooner Zilpha to be altered, and that she should steer with him close in with the land, sending his boat on board the Zilpha and directing the captain to come on board his privateer with all his papers, and two of his men, and putting on board the Zilpha a prize master and boat's crew, and conducting her after the privateer, with the said master and two men in the Hirondale all night, till the next morning, when both vessels came to anchor in a bay on the southwest part of the island of Porto Rico, called Cabo Raxo, (or Cape Raxa) and when said schooner was forthwith stripped of all her sails and rigging, provisions and other things; that the following day the schooner was moored by the captors close in with the shore, and the said master and crew of the Zilpha obliged to quit her, by order of the said commander of the said privateer, he having previously taken possession of said Zilpha's logbook, register, and every other paper concerning or appertaining to her whole voyage, which papers, &c. the said Captain Seber declared would be sent to St. Domingo, in the island of Hispaniola, but at what time did not say: though at this time there was not even the most distant appearance of any opportunity to go down to St. Domingo; that the said master and crew of the said Zilpha having nothing to subsist on, for their maintenance, were obliged to go on board the brig Resolution, then lying in said Cabo Raxo, which brig had before been taken by a French privateer, since sold and commanded by Captain Samuel Bowdish, of and bound to New London, and was the only refuge for them; that the aforementioned privateer sailed on the 27th of said February, leaving said master no other satisfaction than a certificate signed by said captain, stating that he had taken said Zilpha, and declaring also that he was governed by orders from the French Government in France, that all the armed vessels of France had received similar orders to those by which he acted, and which authorized them to capture all American vessels going to, or coming from, English ports in the West Indies; that said brig Resolution left Cabo Raxo on the 1st day of March instant, on board of which vessel said Briard and the people of his vessel came passengers, together with four other American captains, that had been captured by the French privateers; that at the port of Cabo Raxo, there was no officer acting as notary public; and that he has not since his capture aforesaid, found it possible to enter his protest before this day, being the day after the arrival of said brig in Newport aforesaid; and that his mate and people are prevented joining him in this protest, by reason of their having gone on board a vessel bound to Newbury, nearer to their homes than the port to which said brig Resolution was bound.

SAMUEL BRIARD.

Wherefore I the said notary, at the request of the said master, who has hereunto set his hand, the day of the date hereof, in testimony thereof have protested, and do hereby solemnly protest against the capture of the aforesaid schooner Zilpha, in manner as declared by said master, as the sole cause of the loss of said schooner and her cargo, and of all further loss, detriment, and damage, already suffered or to be sustained in said schooner and her lading thereby, whether the same be borne by the owners, shippers, insurers, or any others concerned in said schooner and lading.

Thus done and protested, this 20th day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, under my hand and notarial seal.

We the subscribers do hereby certify, that on the 25th day of February, in the year 1797, being then in the island of Porto Rico, in a bay on the southwest part of said island, called Cabo Raxo (or Cape Raxa,) a privateer belonging to citizens of the French Republic, named the Hirondale, commanded by a captain Michael Seber, came into said port, and brought in with him the schooner Zilpha, Samuel Briard, master, of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, having forcibly taken said schooner as a prize on the 24th instant, bound to Portsmouth, then on her way through the Mona passage from the island of Tobago; and that after anchoring the Zilpha, the crew of the privateer, by order of their commander, proceeded to strip and dismantle her of her sails, rigging, &c. And at the same time, the captain informed the said Briard, that he must immediately quit his vessel with his crew, which he was obliged to do in great haste in our presence, having no other alternative, his logbook and papers of every description having been previously taken from him, and no place where he could stay on board, or on shore, to be of any further service to his late vessel, having nothing for himself and crew to subsist on, the brig Resolution being the only refuge presenting to them: the said Captain Seber, with much reluctance, gave them permission to take with them two barrels of beef, and three of bread for seven people, refusing any more; the privateer went again to sea on the 27th instant in the morning, leaving said Briard no further satisfaction than a certificate that said Seber had captured the Zilpha; that the register, log-book, and all the papers, would be sent to the island of Hispaniola (to St. Domingo) for trial, and that he should continue to capture all American vessels he should meet, that were either going to, or returning from, an English port, it being the orders so to proceed, to all the armed ships and vessels of that republic, from the French government in France, and those orders and proceedings were to continue until further directions from them.

PORTO RICO, BAY OF CABO RAXO, this 28th day of February, in the year 1797.

SAMUEL M. BOWDISH, late master of the schooner Schetucket, taken by the schooner L'Espiegle, Captain Debon.
SAMUEL MOORE, late master of the brig Resolution, taken by schooner Paspartante.
GEORGE SYDLEMAN, late master of the brig Union, left at Demarara, now a passenger on board sloop Crisis, Captain Cook of Norwich, taken by the privateer Cockle, and carried into Punch, south side of Porto Rico.
JOHN GRANT, late master of the sloop George, of Kennebunk, taken by the schooner Hirondale.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of New Hampshire.

I Daniel Humphreys, Esq. notary public, by lawful authority duly commissioned, constituted, admitted, and sworn, and duly exercising said office, in and for the State of New Hampshire, dwelling in Portsmouth within the same. Do certify to all persons to whom these presents may come, or whom they may concern, that the foregoing writing on the other side, is a true copy of an original certificate, appearing to be signed by several American masters of vessels at Cabo Raxo, Porto Rico, whose names are subscribed thereto. I having compared the foregoing copy with said original, do find it exactly conformable thereto: And I further certify, that on this 30th day of March, 1797, before me personally came Captain Samuel Briard, therein named, and Captain Samuel Moore, late master of the brig Resolution, and being both by me duly and severally sworn, on their oaths did depose that they saw the said original certificate signed by each of the said captains, by each one in his own proper hand writing, and that it is the very certificate they freely gave the said Briard. And the said Moore further deposes, that he with the others signed the same, and that the matters and things therein set forth are just and true.

SAMUEL BRIARD,
SAMUEL MOORE.

In testimony whereof, said deponents have above set their names, and I have hereunto subscribed my name, and affixed my seal of office in said Portsmouth the day and year aforesaid.

SHIP SUCCESS, (GORTON.)

By this public instrument of protest, be it made known and manifest, that on this day the 27th of January, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, before me Clement Biddle, notary public for the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, duly commissioned and qualified, dwelling in the city of Philadelphia, personally came Daniel S. Gorton, late commander of the ship Success of Philadelphia, of the burthen of about one hundred and fifty-eight tons, and being duly sworn according to law, on his solemn oath, deposes and says, that the said ship being under his command and loaded at Plantain Garden, River Bay, in the island of Jamaica, with a cargo of sugar, coffee, and seven casks of rum, the two latter his own adventure, he set sail from said port, on the 14th day of August last, bound for this port of Philadelphia; and on the 20th day of said month, steering their direct course for this port, as near as they could make the same, they were boarded and taken possession of by a French Republican privateer, called the Faguse, of Gonaives in Hispaniola, commanded by Antoine Martin, and owned by one Molino, a man of color, who took his said ship and cargo into the port of Cumberland harbor, called by the Spanish Guantanamo, in the island of Cuba, and thence to the port of St. Jago in said island; that he entered a protest at said port of St. Jago on the 1st of September, but being by an interpreter, and not able to obtain a full explanation, he now extends and adds thereto, that having arrived with said ship at St. Jago the 1st of September, soon after the privateer's crew began to plunder, and shortly after forcibly unloaded the whole of the cargo in two vessels, a brig and sloop, which they sent from St. Jago about the 1st of October, as the prize master of his ship informed him, to go to Gonaives or Cape François, in order to have the said goods condemned, that he presented memorials to the Spanish Government at St. Jago, praying that they would not suffer his cargo to be taken out or sent away without his ship, or that his case might be heard by the Spanish courts and justice be done to him as an American, sailing in an American vessel and under an American flag, to which the Governor replied, that he could not refuse the said privateer to take the cargo away, but would not suffer them to land it; that he remained with the ship in charge of the said privateer's crew, till about the last of October, when the prizemaster informed him that the cargo had been condemned at Gonaives by order of the French commissary at the Cape, and that his ship was acquitted, but they gave him no copy of condemnation, or other papers, but that he might take his ship and go where he pleased; and then the privateer's crew left his ship, and he again took charge of her; they also gave him two hundred dollars in cash, but plundered his ship of her spare and light sails, and many materials and stores. That this deponent determined to go to the Cape François to seek redress, and put Captain William M'Cucheon, of this port, who had been captured and brought into St. Jago, in charge of his said ship Success, and despatched her from thence on the 10th day of November last, for Philadelphia, since which he has heard nothing of said ship, except a rumor that she was at Cape Nicola Mole. That he remained at St. Jago seeking a passage for the Cape, but finding none, and being short of money, and in a bad state of health, and a rumor of a war suspending his supplies of money, he left St. Jago the 15th of November, and arrived here the 20th instant, and found his said ship Success had not arrived, and now desires to protest, requiring an act of me the said notary, to avail him when and where it may be needful and necessary.

Signed in Register.

DANIEL S. GORTON.

Whereupon I the said notary, at the request aforesaid, have protested, and by these presents do solemnly protest against the said French Republican privateer Faguse, her owners, commander, officers and crew, for the capture of said ship Success and cargo, that all losses, costs, charges, damages, breaches of charter party, and bills of loading, may be submitted unto, suffered and borne by those to whom it may belong.

Thus done and protested.

SHIP COMMERCE, (HAM.)

By this public instrument of protest, be it made known and manifest, that on this day. the 1st day of January, in the year 1797, before me Jacob Mayer, consul of the United States at the city of Cape François, personally came and appeared Andrew Frothingham, jun. owner and passenger on board the ship Commerce, of Newburyport, in the State of Massachusetts, Tobias Ham, master, and William Wetson, mate of the said ship, and being duly sworn according to law, declared and swore for truth, that they sailed from Norfolk, in the United States, on the 3d day of December last, bound for Jamaica, with a cargo of lumber, &c.; that on the 25th day of the same month, being about eighteen leagues from Turks Island, they fell in with a French privateer called the Trompeuse, commanded by La Barriere, who fired a gun, when they instantly hove to, and the aforesaid privateer came close under their stern, hailed them in English from whence they came and where they were bound; that the aforesaid Tobias Ham answered them twice, very distinctly, that he was from Norfolk, in the United States, and that he was bound for the island of Jamaica; whereupon, the aforesaid privateer, not being the length of the ship from them, immediately fired a broadside and a considerable quantity of small arms on board the said ship Commerce, which raked her fore and aft, crying out at the same time, that if the aforesaid Tobias Ham, would not strike, that he the said commander of the privateer aforesaid, would sink him. That the said Tobias Ham then repeated that the said ship Commerce was an American ship, and owned by a citizen of the United States; that he the commander of the privateer aforesaid, had wounded four of his men, and had almost made a wreck of his ship: whereupon a boat from the said privateer, came on board the said ship Commerce, with an officer and six men, ordering the aforesaid Tobias Ham, on board the said privateer with his papers, and soon after the said boat returned and carried the wounded men on board the privateer, when the boat again returned, leaving the said Tobias Ham and these deponents that night on board the said privateer; that they lay to until the next morning, and on the day following, being the 26th day, the commander told these deponents that the said ship Commerce was his prize, and that he would send her to the Cape, and ordered an officer of the said privateer to take from on board the said ship Commerce such articles as he thought proper; that the said ship was accordingly plundered of all the stores, cordage, and almost every appurtenance belonging to her, save the long boat and yawl; that the persons wounded, as before mentioned, were, Andrew Frothingham, jun. one of these deponents, in his thigh with a six pound ball, Shubal Baxter, seaman, in his leg with a ball, and Joseph Whitfield, seaman, in his forehead with a splinter of wood; that they, moreover, found in the said ship Commerce's deck two six pound balls, and near forty musket balls, and fifteen grape shot in one hole in their mizen mast; that the said ship was materially injured in her masts, rigging, and sails, and her stern almost tore to pieces; and, finally, they these deponents, together with three seamen belonging to the said ship Commerce, remained on board the said privateer five days, when she fell in with Captain Stotsbury, of Philadelphia, bound to the Gonaives, from St. Thomas's, whom the commander of the said privateer forced to take on board these deponents, together with three seamen aforesaid, and part of the crews of five American vessels, which had been captured some time before by the said privateer, with orders to the said Captain Stotsbury to land them at this port, where they accordingly arrived on the 31st day following, and now desire a protest, requiring an act of me the said Jacob Mayer, to avail them when and where it may be needful and necessary.

ANDREW FROTHINGHAM, Jun.
WILLIAM WETSON.

Whereupon I, the said Jacob Mayer, at the request aforesaid, have protested, and by these presents do protest, against the said captain, and for the damages thereby occasioned to the said ship Commerce and cargo, that all losses, costs, charges, and damages, suffered, or to be suffered, or sustained thereby, may be submitted unto, suffered, and borne, by those of right it shall or may belong.

This done and protested at Cape François, aforesaid, in testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal, this first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, the day and year first above written.

[L. S.] JACOB MAYER.

The above is a copy of a protest made by Andrew Frothingham and Wetson, in the Cape, St. Domingo.

SILAS TALBOT.

SHIP NANCY, (DILL.)

BALTIMORE COUNTY.

Came before me, the subscriber, one of the Justices of the Peace for said county, William Fearson, mariner, who made oath, on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that, on the 25th of March last, he was taken (in the ship Nancy, Captain Dill, bound from Savannah to Cape Nichola Mole) by a French privateer, off the mouth of Port de Paix. The captain and part of the crew were detained on board the privateer; this deponent, with the mate, who was sick, and the remainder of the crew, were stripped of their clothes, even the shirt from his back, and drove below, beating him with a cutlass, using at the same time the most opprobrious and insulting language. We were closely confined, with an allowance of bread and water, and taken by the aforesaid privateer into Jean Rabel, where the ship with her cargo was condemned, and this deponent stripped of his property, to the amount of four hundred dollars, and left destitute of every thing to obtain the common necessaries of life; and, but for the generous assistance of Captain Little, an American, he would have been imprisoned; likewise, by the same captain's assistance, he was enabled to reach this place.

JAMAICA, ss.

Mitchell Cutter, Master of the brigantine Almy, of New York, being duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, maketh oath and sayeth, that he sailed from Montego Bay, in the Island of Jamaica aforesaid, on the 8th day of October instant bound for New York, aforesaid, laden with a cargo of rum, coffee, and pimento, the said brigantine being tight, staunch, and every way properly equipped and manned for her said voyage. That nothing material occurred until the 12th following; being then off the northeast end of the said island, was brought to and captured by two French republican privateer schooners, who fired thirty shots at the said brigantine, although she was, and had been, some time previous, lying to for them. That they ordered the said brigantine's boat to come along side of them; which was accordingly done, when they detained the mate and two seamen, with the ship's register, and sent a prize master and three seamen on board of the said brigantine, until the 13th instant, when she was recaptured by His Britannic Majesty's ship Jamaica, —— Brooking, Esq. commander, and carried into the port of Kingston, in the said island, where she arrived on the 18th instant.

MITCHELL CUTTER.

Sworn, at Kingston aforesaid, this 20th day of October, 1796, before me,

J. WELSH.

BRIG LADY WALTERDORF, (GUTTERSON.)

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, ss.

John Gutterson, of Philadelphia, late master of the brig Lady Walterdorf, being duly sworn, deposes and says, that he sailed in the said brigantine from Demarara, bound to Philadelphia, on the first day of March last, with a cargo consisting of sugar, rum, coffee, cotton, and vinegar, belonging to Robert M'Kean, of Philadelphia, which cargo was purchased by Mr. George M'Guffin, the supercargo, as the returns for the outward bound cargo. That the said brigantine was the property of Mr. Joseph Syms, of Philadelphia. That, on the 5th of the same March, he was captured, in the said brigantine, ten leagues to the northwest of Martinique, by the French privateer Poline, Captain Amuline, belonging to Basseterre, Gaudaloupe; that the crew of the said privateer took from on board the said brigantine this deponent and all his crew, excepting his mate and a seaman, and carried her to Bassetere, where he, this deponent, arrived on the 19th of the same month, in the said privateer. That, on his arrival, he found the vessel and cargo, which had been previously brought in, had been condemned, and the greater part of the cargo unloaded and sold; that this deponent understood that the cause of the condemnation was because he was coming from Demarara, a port which formerly belonged to the Dutch, and which was then in the possession of the British; that, in truth, the brigantine on her outward bound voyage was destined for Surinam, but, being ten or fifteen leagues to the eastward of Surinam, she was stopped by the British sloop of war Favorite, which forbade her entering, and endorsed her papers; that, on this account, he put into Demarara, as the nearest port. That, on the day of her condemnation, the mate and seaman, who had been left on board the brigantine, were put into prison, and, on the arrival of the privateer, the rest of the crew (except this deponent) were also put in prison. That this deponent, on his arrival at Basseterre, was turned on shore, without money or friends, and was left in a destitute situation for eight days, when he was fortunate enough to meet a gentleman from St. Croix, who advanced him money for his necessity, on the credit of his owner. That all the deponent's property on board the brigantine was taken from him, except some of his clothes. That, when an American vessel is brought into Gaudaloupe, the crew is detained on board of her or of the privateer until the sentence takes place, which, if it be for condemnation, has the effect of causing the crew to be removed to a gaol, where they are detained as prisoners of war, on an allowance of half a pound of bread and two ounces of fish per day; that it is not permitted for any one to visit them in their confinement, which is, in all respects, more severe and cruel than that to which British prisoners are subjected, many of whom are permitted to walk about the streets, and all of whom generally have their private property restored to them. That several Americans were sent to Martinique, to be exchanged for Frenchmen, whilst this deponent was at Gaudaloupe, and that some had been returned as Americans, for whom the British would make no exchange; that among the latter there were three little boys, the older of whom was about fourteen years of age; that, when this deponent arrived at Basseterre, he found there an American built vessel, called the Hannah, of New York, which, from her build, he has no doubt was intended for a privateer; she was pierced for fourteen or sixteen guns. That this deponent was acquainted at Basseterre with one Captain Robert Stanton, who has a wife and family at New York, and who told deponent that he had carried the said schooner Hannah out from New York; that deponent was told, by one Branham, (who, as well as this deponent, boarded in the same house with the said Stanton) that Stanton had told him the Hannah belonged to the house of Ingraham, in New York, who had put her in the charge of Stanton to carry her to Gaudaloupe, and there make the best of her. That, some days after, deponent arrived at Gaudaloupe; said Stanton sold the Hannah for a privateer to one Williams, (who told deponent he was an American, and had sailed out of the port of Philadelphia) for seven hundred half joes; that, on the 2d of April, when deponent left Gaudaloupe, Williams had the privateer nearly fitted for sea, and was to sail in her, in a day or two, as commander. That said Williams, together with another American of the same name, is owner of another privateer, which the one last named commands. That deponent thinks the privateer Hannah must have arrived at Gaudaloupe about the latter end of February, or beginning of March.

BRIG ELIZA, (FRANCIS.)

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, State of New York, ss.

By this public instrument of protest be it made known, and manifested unto all persons to whom these presents shall come, or may, in any wise, concern, that before me, John Keese, notary public for the State of New York, by letters patent under the great seal of the said State, duly commissioned, personally appeared Daniel Francis, master of the brigantine Eliza, of New York, who being by me duly sworn according to law, deposed, that he sailed in the said brigantine, on the 25th day of December last, from New London, bound for the windward West India islands; that, in the prosecution of the said passage, on the 16th day of January last, in latitude fifteen degrees fifteen minutes, and longitude, by account, fifty-nine degrees, the said brigantine was captured by two French frigates belonging to the French republic, one of them called the La Pancy, commanded by Vatto, the other called the Thetis, commanded by Bardwin, who took from the said brig Eliza, William Berry, the mate, and David Squire, Hugh Fitzgerald, Henry Doughty, Toby Rowin, and John Forceman, mariners of said brigantine, and put a prize master and five men on board, and ordered them to take the said brigantine Eliza into Guadaloupe; that, on the 20th day of said month of January, the said brigantine was anchored in Bay Mabean, in the island of Guadaloupe, and on the 25th day of said month her cargo was sequestered; that, on the 14th day of February, the whole of said brigantine's outward cargo, aforesaid, having been got on shore by the French, the deponent was permitted to take charge of her again. On the 15th day of February he went to Basseterre, and got the register, sea-letter, &c. of the said brig from the tribunal, and also got back the mate and all the mariners aforesaid, except Henry Doughty, who had been sent to Martinico and exchanged as an English prisoner.

And the said deponent further deposed, that he doth fully believe the said Henry Doughty was born at Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, and is a citizen of the United States of America; that the said William Berry is a native of the State of Pennsylvania, and also the said Fitzgerald; that the said David Squire is a native of the State of Connecticut, known to this deponent from his youth, they being townsmen; that he believes said Toby Rowin is a native of Portugal, and said John Forceman of Sweden. And the said Daniel Francis being desirous to give every satisfaction in his power to the persons interested in the said brig and cargo in the voyage aforesaid, and also to comply with the act of the Congress of the United States of America respecting the impressment and detention of American seamen, hath, on the foregoing premises, before me, in due form protested, and by these presents doth protest, against the commanders and crews of the said French frigates, and all others whom it doth or may concern, for the seizure and detention of the said brig and her cargo, as aforesaid, and for the detention of the said Henry Doughty, and sending him to Martinico as an English prisoner of war; and for all loss, cost, damages, and injury that hath happened and accrued, or that may happen and accrue, by reason and means aforesaid.

Thus done and protested at New York, aforesaid. In faith and testimony whereof the said Daniel Francis hath hereunto subscribed his name, and I have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my seal of office, at New York, the third day of April, A. D. 1797.

SHIP ELIZA, (BURTON.)

Extract from the registers of the Secretary of the municipality of Basseterre, Guadaloupe.

This day, the 6th of Ventose, 5th republican year, in the morning, at the municipal office of Basseterre, Guadaloupe, in which assisted the citizens Patriat, mayor, Négré, national agent, Bazin, municipal officer in service, together with the secretary, appeared Mr. Peter Burton, captain of the American ship Eliza, anchored in this road, and ready to sail for the place of her destination: who, assisted by the interpreter of the English language, and under the faith of an oath then administered, declared, that he sailed from Barbadoes, on the 6th of February, 1797, (old style) bound for Norfolk, in Virginia, with a cargo of twenty-five casks of raw sugar, and twenty-four hogsheads of rum, belonging to John Proudfoot, merchant at that place, and a citizen of the United States; that, on the 14th of the said month, he was met by the privateer Flying Fish, Captain John Johnston, arrived at Basseterre, who took on board a part of his crew, and sent in their stead a prize captain and crew, with orders to take possession of the vessel and to proceed to Basseterre, where he arrived a few days after; that he, the appearer, and part of his crew, were interrogated by the municipality of the said town, and afterwards a judgment of the commercial tribunal was interposed, declaring the cargo of the said vessel to be good prize, and liberating the vessel, with permission to pursue her destination.

Wherefore, as well for himself, as in the name of his owners, and others interested in the ship Eliza and her cargo, he demands an act of reservation and protest, which he executes, as well on account of his arrest and being brought into this road, as on account of the confiscation of his cargo, and, generally, for all wrongs, damages, detention, expenses, costs, and losses, which he suffers by the said arrest and confiscation; as also for whatever may happen to him until he shall have arrived at his destination, reserving to himself to make use of the said reservation and protest, against whom, before whom, and wherever it shall be requisite; which has been given him by the municipal office, and which the appearer has signed, with the interpreter, the members of the office, and the secretary: thus signed on the registers, Peter Burton, Bernier, interpreter, Patriat, maire, Négré, national agent, Bazin, municipal officer, ———, secretary—an erased word void.

Collated. DESCHAMPS, R. Secretary.

I, Canut Robinson, municipal officer of the commune of Basseterre, Guadaloupe, performing in this quarter the functions of mayor, in the absence of the mayor, certify and attest to whom it may concern, that the signature to these presents is that of citizen Deschamps, recording secretary of the municipality of Basseterre; that, to it faith is, and should be, given, as well as to every thing which he signs in the said quality, as well in as out of judgment.

In testimony whereof I have signed these presents, which shall be countersigned by the said recording secretary, and sealed with the seal of the tribunal.

I further certify, that the comptrolled and stamped paper are not used in this island.

Given in the Commons House of Basseterre, Guadaloupe, the 7th of Ventose, 5th republican year.

ROBINSON, Mayor in this quarter.

Received fifty-four livres for copy.

SHIP ELIZA, (BURTON.)

Extract from the Registers of the Tribunal of Commerce, established in the Island of Guadaloupe, sitting at the town of Basseterre, in said Island.

We, the judges of the commercial tribunal, having seen the papers which have been laid before it, concerning the prize made by the privateer Flying Fish, Captain John Dubain, of the ship Eliza, Captain Peter Burton, having also seen the declarations and interrogatories answered at the municipality of this town, and after having heard upon the subject of the citizen commissioner of the Executive Directory near the said tribunal, and his conclusions, as also the report, and considered the whole, the tribunal declares to be good prize to the profit of the captors, the cargo of the ship Eliza, consisting of sugar and rum, of the produce and manufacture of Barbadoes; and that, conformably to the arrêt of the agents of the Executive Directory of the 4th Nivose last, they therefore order that the said cargo be delivered to whoever has a right to the same, to be disposed of as belonging to him, an inventory thereof being previously made.

They order that the said ship Eliza be delivered up as property of American citizens, and therefore give up the same, together with her tackle and apparel, to the said Captain Peter Burton, ordering all persons who may have custody of the same, to deliver her, and the papers concerning the property and navigation of the said vessel, to the said captain, under pain of punishment—

Done and judged by us, Victor Croizier, president; Domingue Romain, Guillaume Corlet, judges; and Gaetan Bazin, surrogate judge of the said tribunal, the 2d of Ventose, in the morning, 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible, signed on the register Croizier, president. D. Romain. Corlet and Bazin.

Collated. L'ATRIERE.

[Copy for captain of the vessel delivered up.]

I, Victor Croizier, president of the commercial tribunal, established in the Island of Guadaloupe, sitting at the town of Basseterre, in said island, certify and attest to all whom it may concern, that Latriere, who has signed the copy of judgment, hereto annexed, is secretary of the said tribunal, that faith should be given to his signature as well in as out of judgment; I also certify that the stamped paper is not used in the colony.

In testimony whereof, I have signed these presents with the said secretary, and have affixed hereunto the ordinary seal of the said tribunal.

[L. S.] Done at Basseterre, the 3d of Ventose, in the 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

SHIP PATTERN, (BOAL.)

This day, the 24th Nivose, 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible, appeared before the notary public of the town and dependencies of Fort Liberty, in the island and coast of St. Domingo, and northern part, there dwelling, the undersigned, and in presence of the witnesses, hereafter named and also undersigned, Henry William Boal, captain of the American ship Pattern, anchored in this road, where she was brought by citizen Fagoude, prize master, and making part of the crew of the French privateer Trompeuse, who captured her at four leagues to the northward of Square Handkerchief, on her way to Jamaica, assisted by John Stuart, his interpreter: the said Henry William Boal presented himself to us, the undersigned notary, the day after his arrival in this port, in order to make the present declaration through us, which we could not receive for the want of an interpreter, the sworn interpreter of the port being absent, who said that on the 9th current, or 28th of December, (O. S.) at noon, he was met, at four leagues to the northward of Square Handkerchief, by the French privateer la Trompeuse, Captain Antoine Barriere, bound for Jamaica; which privateer, being within hailing, asked whence they came, to which they replied from New York; Where were they bound? to Jamaica; that then the privateer put out her boat with five men and an officer; and that, on coming aboard, the officer asked for their clearances and invoices, which were immediately produced; that he then sent all his papers on board the privateer by the appearer's mate; that, after having examined his papers, the privateer sent on board six French seamen and a prize master to conduct the vessel, and detained on board his mate and five of his men, and left only the appearer, his brother, two boys, and a cook, on board his vessel; that the privateer chased him under English colors, which he kept flying until he was alongside, which is contrary to the laws of war: for no armed vessel has a right of visiting another at sea, especially when she is under a neutral flag, without bearing the flag of her nation; and that he even confirmed the English flag under the firing of a gun; that the next day he was carried into Mont Christy, where he was detained nine days; and that on the tenth he was conducted into this port; that on the seventh day after his arrival at Mont Christy, the Frenchmen, who were on board of his vessel, broke open the main hatchway whilst he was on shore; that he is ignorant of what they have taken, but that it appears that there were missing four hogsheads of codfish, one hogshead of rice, two barrels of flour, and nearly all his provisions, as well as nine or ten barrels of salted meat, forming a part thereof; that they have likewise taken a new studding sail, a coil of cordage, two pairs of studding sail gears; but that, further, he does not know, but one may be convinced when the cargo is discharged, on comparing the articles on board with the invoices of the lading, wherefore he makes the present declaration as well for his use to be produced and avail where it ought, and reserving to his owners their recourse against the owners and captain of the said privateer, for the depredations committed on board of him by the said crew; as for the detention and extraordinary expenses he has been obliged to submit to. That the appearer, on seeing the provisions taken from on board, asked the prize master to give him a sufficient quantity for his voyage from Mont Christy to the continent, upon which he gave him six barrels of biscuit and three barrels of salted beef for himself and crew.

Done and passed at Fort Liberty, in our chambers, the said day and year above mentioned, in the forenoon, in presence of the citizens Jean Casaux and Alexander Beochard, merchants in this town, witnesses, expressly requested and called upon, who, after reading, signed the same with the appearer, John Stuart, interpreter, and as notary, thus signed on the minutes of these presents, Henry William Boal, John Stuart, J. Casaux, Brochare, and Derieux, notary. Collated.

IN THE NAME OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

Extract from the Register of the Deliberations of the Commissioners delegated by the French Government to the Windward Islands, at the Cape, the 15th Pluviose, 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Having seen the minutes of the proceedings on the capture of the ship Pattern, of New York, Captain Henry William Boal, taken on the 8th of Nivose last, by the privateer Trompeuse, Captain Barriere. The proceedings on the said prize by the justice of peace at the Cape.

Having seen the register of the said vessel delivered at New York on the 22d of November, 1796, under the command of Henry William Boal. The sea-letter in three languages, French, English, and Dutch, delivered at New York on the 6th of December, 1796, for the said vessel, under the command of the said Henry W. Boal, and containing her destination as for Jamaica. The clearance of the said vessel, dated New York, the 6th of December, 1796, delivered to Captain Henry William Boal, and indicating her destination for Jamaica.

Having seen a number of bills of lading of sundry shippers on board of the said vessel, of merchandises destined for Jamaica.

Considering that it results as well from the interrogatories submitted to in the said proceedings by the captain and others of the crew of the said ship Pattern, as from certain papers above related, and is evidently proved, that the said vessel was expedited for Jamaica.

Considering that the resolution of the Executive Directory of the 14th Messidor last, prescribed to all captains of vessels of the republic, and those of individuals armed as privateers, to treat neutral vessels in the same manner they should permit themselves to be treated by the English.

Considering that it is notorious that the agents of the British Government in the West Indies respect no neutrals; that this notoriety is confirmed by a number of declarations or proofs deposited with the secretary general of the commissions.

Considering that it was not until after the official notification of the said resolution of the Executive Directory, and after the notoriety of the conduct of the British agents in the West Indies towards neutral vessels, that the commission, according to its decree of the 18th Nivose last, declared good prize all neutral vessels going to, or coming from, English ports.

The commission has decreed, and does decree, that the said ship Pattern, of New York, Captain Henry Wm. Boal, captured on the 8th of Nivose last, by the privateer Trompeuse, Captain Barriere, and brought into the road of the Cape, is good prize, together with her cargo and every thing belonging thereto; and that the whole shall be sold for the benefit of the captors and interested in the fitting out of the said privateer; that in consequence, all persons having custody of the said vessel and her cargo, are held to deliver up the same to the captor, captain, or his representative.

The present decree shall be notified to the captain of the said ship Pattern, by the captain of the said privateer or his representative.

And for the complete execution of the present decree, the captor, captain, or his representative, shall make proper provision.

Signed on the register of the proceedings,

SANTHONAX & RAIMOND, Commissioners.
PASCAL, Secretary General.

True copy. The Secretary General of the commission,

PASCAL.

BRIG AMERICAN, (TOWN.)

By this public instrument of protest, be it made known and manifest that, on this twenty-ninth day of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, before me, Clement Biddle, notary public for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, duly commissioned and qualified, dwelling in the city of Philadelphia, personally appeared Thomas Town, junior, commander of the brig American, of Philadelphia, and declared and averred for truth, that the said brig being loaded with a cargo consisting of dry goods, glass, and earthenware, twine, cheese, fifty casks of wine, seven hundred and ten barrels of flour, and shaken casks for coffee and molasses, amounting to eight thousand five hundred and forty-seven pounds four shillings and ten pence half-penny, Pennsylvania currency, the property of Norris and Hall, of said city, merchants, and citizens of the United States of America, and consigned to this appearer; that he set sail with said vessel under his command, and with said cargo on board, from this port of Philadelphia, on or about the 30th of October last, cleared for the island of St. Bartholomew's, but bound for Marigalante, and having touched at Marigalante, and been refused liberty to trade, he proceeded to Point Liberté, formerly Point Petre, in Guadaloupe, where he arrived the 20th day of November, and made sales of his cargo here, loaden and received on board in returns for the same, a cargo of coffee, cotton, and sugar, with which he proceeded for the island of St. Thomas, and arrived there on the fifth day of January last, and having there made sale of his said coffee, cotton, and sugar, he converted the same into dry goods to the value of six hundred and fifteen dollars and a half, ninety-eight barrels of flour, purchased from the cargo of the brig Nancy and Jane, of Baltimore, and sixteen thousand dollars (a few dollars more or less) in Spanish silver dollars, all which he loaded on board at St. Thomas's, arising from the said cargo loaden at Guadaloupe, which arose from the said cargo so loaden as aforesaid at this city of Philadelphia, and was the sole property of the said Norris and Hall; and that he set sail in said brig with the same dry goods, flour, and dollars on board from St. Thomas, on the 22d day of January last, bound for Cape François, and that having arrived off Monto Christo, he was chased by a British man of war, brig, and cutter, which forced him to pass the Cape and run for Port de Paix, where he arrived on the 26th day of January last, and on the 27th of the same month the officers of the said Port seized his papers and sent them to the commissary at the Cape, on which this appearer went to the Cape, where he arrived on the 31st of January, and his papers were returned and declared by the commissary Santhonax to be in good order, on which he returned to Port de Paix, and on his arrival there found a guard of soldiers on board his vessel, and was informed that his money should be taken from him and deposited in the public treasury; but that he should be paid for the same in coffee; and this appearer thereupon, in presence of Andrew Donaldson, his mate, Benjamin Howard, his steward, and Captain Thomas Cunningham, of Baltimore, then on board his vessel, shut up the door of his cabin in which the said money was under his bed, and placed four seals on the lock of the door; that on Sunday morning, the fourth day of February, certain officers of the administration of Port de Paix came on board his said vessel, and demanded his said money, which this appearer refused to deliver, declaring it was the property of his owners; but the said officers forced the door of his cabin, and forcibly took the said money, amount fifteen thousand four hundred and forty-nine dollars, therefrom, and which they carried to the shore in presence of the said Captain Cunningham, first promising to deliver him coffee in return for the same; and in a few days after they forcibly took from him the said ninety-eight barrels of flour, promising to pay for them also in coffee; and that this appearer went to Cape François, and presented a memorial to Santhonax, the civil commissioner for the republic, on the 13th day of said month of February, to which he gave for answer by a letter to the chief of administration at Port de Paix, and ordered him to pay the appearer in coffee at twenty-three sols per pound; on which this appearer returned to Port de Paix, presented the letter from Santhonax to said chief of the administration, and continued to solicit the restoration of his money, or payment in coffee, but without success; and finding no prospect of obtaining redress, and being in want of provisions, on the 10th of March he went with his vessel from Port de Paix to Cape François, and arrived there on the 13th or 14th, and presented a memorial to Santhonax on the 19th of March, stating his case, and demanding a supply of provisions and money to pay his seamen and expenses; and that he might have payment of his demands out of the cargo of the brig Thetis, taken into Cuba and there condemned; to which the said Santhonax ordered him back to Port de Paix, with recommendations in his favor to the ordonnateur, on which this appearer returned with his vessel to Port de Paix, in hopes of obtaining a cargo of coffee, and arrived there, and continued to solicit for the same, but without effect; but had received small supplies of provisions for his crew from the administration; that on his return he found no prospect of relief, and, on the 27th of March, he again went by land to Cape François, and on the 30th presented another memorial to Santhonax, praying his definite orders; to which he sent back the petition, with orders to the ordonnateur "to make payment in fifteen days at latest, in the whole sum, in colonial produce;" on which this appearer again returned to Port de Paix, and continued to solicit payment from the administration there, and obtained about thirty-five thousand livres in coffee and duties, and provisions for his vessel. He then found no prospect of further relief, and being nearly out of provisions, having refused to sign the verbal process which the officers of administration offered him; and having made a protest there, but not fully, as he only could do it through the medium of a French interpreter who understood but little English, and despairing of any success in obtaining payment by further delay, he set sail from Port de Paix on the 13th inst. and arrived here with his said brig American at this port on the twenty-seventh instant, and now desires to protest, requiring an act of me, the said notary, to avail him when and where needful and necessary; and on the fifth of June, in said year, appeared Andrew Donaldson, mate, who, as well as said captain, being duly sworn on their oaths respectively, depose and say, that the facts herein set forth are just and true, the said mate to what passed on board said vessel only.

Signed in notarial register,

THOMAS TOWN, Jun.
ANDREW DONALDSON.

Whereupon, I, the said notary, at the request aforesaid, have protested, and by these presents do solemnly protest, as well against the administration at Port-de-Paix as against the commissary of the French republic and their officers at Cape François, for the unjustly and forcibly seizing and taking away the said money and flour from said brig American, and unjust detention of the said brig under promises of payment for the same, that all losses, damages, costs, charges, breaches of charter party, and bill of loading, suffered or to be suffered or sustained thereby, may be submitted unto, suffered and borne by those to whom of right it may belong.

Quod Attestor,

SHIP KITTY, (M'PHERSON.)

On this twelfth day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, before me, Clement Biddle, Esquire, notary public for the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, duly commissioned and authorized by law to administer oaths and affirmations, dwelling in the city of Philadelphia, personally came Thomas Crawford, Isaac Williams, James Watson, Mathias Christian Brek, late seamen of the ship Kitty, of Philadelphia, Hugh M'Pherson, master, who being duly sworn according to law, on their solemn oath depose and say, that the facts set forth in the annexed deposition or declaration, by them subscribed, in two pages, are just and true.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my notarial seal, at Philadelphia, the day of

CLEMENT BIDDLE, Not. Pub.

Five seamen belonging to the ship Kitty, of Philadelphia, Captain Hugh M'Pherson, who declare the following to be the truth, and nothing but the truth:

The ship left the Isle of France on or about the 9th of November, 1796, and nothing material happened, but meeting with heavy gales of wind, until we were met with, near Cape Lagullus, by His Britannic Majesty's ships Jupiter and Sceptre, commanded by Commodore Losack and Captain Alexander, who put two lieutenants on board said ship and eight British mariners; and took possession of the said ship Kitty; and brought her under convoy forcibly into the Cape of Good Hope, where they arrived on or about the first of January, 1797; where we understood, from the captain, officers, and supercargo, the ship underwent an examination, and was acquitted. The English pressed three men, which were replaced accidentally by three Dutch mariners. The heavy and boisterous weather we experienced caused the vessel to leak, in her upper works, and it was therefore found absolutely necessary to have her calked, and purchase some sails; they were also in want of some provisions, which they bought at the Cape—beef, bread, and fresh provisions; and being short of water, we were there supplied. After supplying ourselves with what was requisite for the continuation of our voyage to Philadelphia, we proceeded on or about 3d February, and nothing material happened until on or about the 30th of March, when we were boarded and taken by the French privateer L'Espiegle, Captain Ant. Daubon, although the captain of the Kitty hailed, to the privateer, that he was from the Isle of France and an American vessel, having the colors of the United States hoisted at the mizzen peak. Captain Daubon ordered Captain M'Pherson to hoist out his boat and come on board of him, using, at the same time, blasphemous language, of damn your eyes, hoist your boat out; and while the undersigned, and the rest of the crew, were busily employed in doing so, the privateer manned his own boat with seven men and a prize-master, who immediately took possession of the vessel by their turning away the man from the helm, and placing one of their own in his room. The prize-master demanded the papers belonging to the ship, afterwards, which were delivered to him, and were sent on board the privateer, together with Captain M'Pherson, in her boat, to undergo an examination as they said. After detaining the captain on board some hours, he and Captain Daubon, with Captain Daubon's lieutenant, and some more people, returned on board, and demanded of Captain M'Pherson, Mr. Charles D. Cox, supercargo, and every other person on board, their papers, which was complied with, we believe, and soon after the captain of the privateer getting on board, we observed him and his officers throw overboard a number of papers, which we saw afterwards floating on the water.

The second day after the Kitty was taken, the captain of the privateer with his men made a general search throughout the vessel; the crew's bedding and chests not being exempt from their scrutiny; they altered the course of the ship, immediately on taking possession of her, for the West Indies, in one of the islands of which, Porto-Rico, we arrived on or about the 3d of April, 1797, the privateer L'Espiegle still continuing in company with us.

On the privateer's people attempting to hoist an English East India Company's flag on board the Kitty, when in sight of the harbor of Porto-Rico, we, as well as the whole crew, came aft on the quarter deck and protested against such colors being hoisted on board our ship, as we disavowed them, not acknowledging any but those of the United States, of which we were citizens, but to no effect, as the prize-master and French mariners persisted in their intention of hoisting them reversed. On our arrival at Porto-Rico, and for nearly twelve days after, we were not permitted to go on shore, nor the supercargo, or have any intercourse whatsoever with the shore. A few days after the town was besieged by the British, when we, the captain, supercargo, and the rest of the crew, were taken from on board the Kitty, guarded by a number of Spanish troops, who took us into three different prisons, in the island of St. John's, where we, the subscribers, remained for thirty-five days in one of them, when we were sent on board, under a guard of a file of Spanish troops, the Spanish frigate named Juno, then lying in the harbor of Porto-Rico, and bound to Havanna, but, by the interference and remonstrance, as we understand, of some American captains and other citizens, to the Governor, Don Castro, we were put on board the guard boat, and transported to the American ship Mount Vernon, then just weighing anchor, and bound to the port of Philadelphia, where we arrived on the land of freedom, thanks to kind Providence, not being suffered to take even our clothes from on board the ship Kitty, and are now destitute of both them and money. We could each, and every one of us, have received a very handsome reward from the captain of the privateer, had we been base enough to have declared a falsehood that they urged and solicited some of the crew to do, namely: that of declaring that some of the cargo was shipped at the Cape of Good Hope. On our departure we understood, and believe it as truth, that Captain M'Pherson, Mr. Cox, and the rest of the crew, were then in prison.

BRIG VALERIA, (STOVER.)

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, Port of Newburyport.

By this public instrument of protest, be it made known, and made manifest, that, on the 22d day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, and in the twenty-first year of the sovereignty and independence of the United States of America, personally came and appeared before me, Michael Hodge, a public notary, within and for the county of Essex, in the commonwealth aforesaid, duly admitted and sworn, residing in Newburyport, in the same county, Henry Stover, late master of the brig Valeria, of Newburyport, owned and belonging to captain John Wells, of said town of Newburyport, merchant, and citizen, who being duly sworn according to law, on his solemn oath, doth depose, testify, and declare, that he sailed from the port of Aux Cayes, upon the south side of Hispaniola, on the 9th day of January last past, in the said brigantine Valeria, bound for Newburyport, laden with one hundred and twenty-one casks of molasses, containing fourteen thousand five hundred gallons, eight hogsheads of brown sugar, eight thousand one hundred pounds, French weight; thirty-five hundred and nineteen pounds of cotton; and fourteen hundred pounds of coffee, all French weight; and which is true, according to the best of his knowledge, recollection, and belief; that on the 15th of the same month of January, being then off Cape Maize, about four or five leagues distance, he was brought to and boarded by a French privateer, called the Souveraine, commanded by one Lawrence Simont, belonging to Cape François, who, after taking possession of the said brig, ordered the deponent on board of the privateer, and carried him into the port of St. Jago, in the island of Cuba, and kept him on board the said privateer a close prisoner, until he, the said Simont, had obtained a permission from the Spanish Government to discharge the said brig Valeria, which was effected in the space of about four days after the arrival of the said brig; that part of cargo of the aforementioned brig was sold and delivered from alongside, that no examination of the deponent was had by any authority whatever, nor could he learn, nor does he believe there was any trial or condemnation of either vessel or cargo; but that he was robbed of all his property without the least pretence or color of law; that as soon as he could procure a friend there to assist him, (which was not obtained without great difficulty) he petitioned the Governor of the place, setting forth the true situation of his case, the barbarous usage he had received by having his vessel and property taken from him by force, without any reason assigned therefor; that he had prosecuted a voyage from the United States to a French port, there had sold and received produce in exchange; that he had neither entered nor cleared at any English port during his voyage, and that his vessel and cargo truly was owned by a citizen and subject of the United States of America. The Governor, in answer, said, that should he interfere in this case he would be brought into trouble, for the captain of the privateer would protest against him, and send it to the Cape, therefore he must, and he did, decline the interference, nor did he protect the deponent, or his property, from the ravages of those piratical men: that he entered a protest while at St. Jago, but could not extend it agreeably to his wishes, by reason that the notaries were entirely under the influence of the French captain and crew, (as appeared to him) and would not insert any thing in the protest, but what they themselves approved of; that, on the 5th day of February following, the deponent finding that he could not obtain any satisfaction there for the loss of his vessel and cargo, with difficulty procured a passage, for himself only, in a Spanish schooner, for Gonaives, where he arrived, and soon obtained a passage in the brig Endeavor, Edward Freeman, master, for Boston, where he arrived on the 15th day of March following, and, on the 18th, at Newburyport. Wherefore, Henry Stover, the master, as aforesaid, doth require me, the said notary, to protest. I, the said notary, do therefore, at the request aforesaid, and on behalf of the said Henry Stover, the master, as aforesaid, and of the owner or owners, freighters, insurers, and all others in any wise concerned or interested in the said brigantine Valeria, and her loading as aforesaid, or any part thereof, solemnly protest against the said Lawrence Simont, his officers and crew, and the owner or owners, agent or agents of said privateer Souveraine; also, against the French republic, and the Governor of St. Jago, for all losses, damages, costs, charges, interest and expenses whatever, had, borne, suffered and sustained, or to be had, borne, suffered and sustained, by the said master, owner or owners, freighters, insurers, and all others in any wise concerned or interested in the said brigantine Valeria, or her loading as aforesaid, or any part thereof, for and by reason of being captured by a French privateer, and his taking vessel and cargo away by force, as aforesaid.

This done and protested at Newburyport, in the commonwealth aforesaid.

In faith and testimony whereof, as well the said Henry Stover, the deponent, as I, the said notary, [L. S.] have to these presents subscribed our names, and I, the said notary, have hereunto put and affixed my seal of office, the day and year aforesaid.

HENRY STOVER.

BRIG CALLIOPE, (LEONARD.)

Extract from the Records of the Registry of the Municipality of Basseterre, Guadaloupe.

On this day, 28th of Ventose, fifth republican year, in the afternoon, at the municipal office of the city of Basseterre, Guadaloupe, in presence of citizens Patriat, mayor; Négré, national agent; Due, municipal officer on service, assisted by the secretary recorder, appeared Mr. John Leonard, master and owner of the American brig the Calliope, of New York, in America, who being duly sworn, and assisted by the interpreter of the English language, did declare that he sailed from the said place on the twenty-third of November last, (O. S.) with a cargo of staves and dry goods, bound to Madeira or Teneriffe; that he arrived at the last mentioned island the latter part of December following, or thereabouts, where he sold his said cargo, and loaded, as return cargo, two hundred and twenty-five pipes of Teneriffe wines, for his account and risk; that he sailed again from thence on the sixteenth of February last, bound to Curaçoa or St. Bartholomew's, but twenty-two days after sailing, steering straight for the place of his destination, without having put into any port, ten leagues to windward of Dominico and Martinico, her head then bearing upon Curaçoa, he met with the privateer called the Dragut, Gabot, commander, who fired two guns at them, which compelled him to shorten sail and bring his vessel to for the said privateer, who, on being within hail, inquired where he was from? to which he answered he was from Teneriffe, bound to Curaçoa; that, afterwards, the said privateer seized the said brig, and obliged the said appearer to give up all his papers; that he was detained on board the said privateer, with his mate and four of his hands; that the master of the said privateer put a prizemaster and crew on board of the said brigantine, and ordered them to steer for Basseterre, Guadaloupe, where they arrived on the twenty-fourth instant, and the said privateer, on the next day that he was brought to an examination before the municipality, and, afterwards, the judgment of the court of commerce, sitting in this city, being given, declared the said brig Calliope, and her cargo, a lawful prize for the benefit of the captors. Therefore, he requires act of the reservations and protestations he makes, as well against the commander of the said privateer the Dragut, her owners, and those concerned, and security on account of his detention and being brought into this harbor, as against the judgment of the court of commerce, on account of the condemnation of the said brig Calliope, and her cargo, and for all losses, charges, damages, expenses, and injury, thereby accruing to his interest, and all others concerned in the said brigantine, reserving to himself to make use of the said protestations against and before whom and where it may belong; also, to extend the same hereafter, either at New York, or elsewhere, if he thinks proper.

Of all which appearances, protestations, and reservations, act hath been granted to John Leonard, that the same may serve and be of value, as of right, and he hath signed, together with the interpreter, the members of office, and the secretary. Recorder so signed on the record; John Leonard; Bernier, interpreter; Patriat, mayor; Négré, national agent; Due, municipal officer on service, and Deschamps, secretary recorder.

SHIP COMMERCE. (LAWTON.)

NEWPORT, March 9, 1797.

SIR:

We consider it our duty to lay before you, for the inspection of Government, an extract of a letter we have just received from Robert Lawton, master of our ship Commerce, informing of his being plundered on the high seas by a French privateer.

This ship was bound from Hamburg to this port; the ship and her cargo are solely our property. As she carried out and was to return with a very valuable cargo, we were particular in procuring and sending in her, every official paper that is granted by the custom house, for the verification of American property; and we made a declaration on oath before a notary public of the ship and cargo being wholly ours, and that no foreign subject or citizen was interested therein. The notary giving a certificate thereof under seal, as also, of our being citizens of the United States; to which Mr. Arcambel, consul of France, annexed his official certificate. That no doubts would appear on the first inspection of the ship's papers, of her being American property, and bound from one neutral port to another. But neither these circumstances, nor the peculiar distress the ship was in, were a protection from the rapacious acts of pillage on the high seas.

When the ship arrives, which we expect will be in all this month, we will obtain from the captain the name of the privateer, his protest, and such other information as we may give, which we will forward to you.

We are, &c.

GIBBS & CHANNING.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq. Secretary for the Department of State.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S, February 2, 1797.

MESSRS. GIBBS & CHANNING:

GENTLEMEN: In my last letter, dated the 1st of this month, being the day of my arrival in this port, after a passage of 118 days from Hamburg, I could not inform you of my distress, as time would not permit. I left Hamburg on the 7th of October, and the 18th I left Coxhaven, and put to sea all in good order on board, and proceeded on my passage until the 20th November, when finding myself on the banks of Newfoundland, on the 29th I was in the longitude 57, with heavy gales of wind until the 31st of December; during these gales I sprung my rudder, and stove in the cabin dead lights, filled the cabin with water, and I apprehend stove some casks of gin in the after hold in the ground tier; on the 31st December, I was obliged to bear away, my rudder being so weak, and the weather so bad, that the ship would not bear sail on her; I proceeded under all sail that the ship would bear to the southward until the 30th of January, when I was taken by a French privateer in the lat. 18. 2. and long. 60. 10.; after overhauling my papers, and threatening to make a prize of me, sent the boat on board, and plundered the ship, and broke open the letters, and my trunks and chests, which they took from me, two gold watches, and what clothes they had a mind for, and three gold watches, and three silver ditto, belonging to Mr. Robert Stephens, Newport, sent on by his brother E. Greene, and broke open sundry bales and boxes in the hold, and started one butt of brandy of yours.

ROBERT LAWTON.

SCHOONER BETSEY, (BROWN.)

By this public instrument of protest, be it made known and manifest, that on this day, the fourth of January, in the year 1797, before me Jacob Mayer, consul of the United States at the city of Cape François, personally came and appeared Reynold Brown, master of the schooner Betsey, of Washington, in the State of North Carolina, and being duly sworn according to law, declared and averred for truth, that he sailed from the said port of Washington in the United States, on the 12th day of September last, with a cargo of lumber, and bound to the Island of St Bartholomew's, but through stress of weather and sickness among his crew, he, this deponent, was forced to enter the first port he could make, which was the port of Jeremie, in this island, where he arrived on the 9th day of November following, and disposed of the cargo of the said schooner Betsey, to the best advantage in his power; that he sailed from the said port of Jeremie on the 20th day of December following, for Turk's Island, and on the 24th day of the same month, being between Cape Nichola Mole and Tortuga, he was captured by the French privateer Le Poisson Volant, commanded by one Captain Thomas, and owned in this port; that on the next day, being the 25th day, he, this deponent, was carried in his own vessel, the aforesaid schooner Betsey, to Jean Rubel, where one of the officers of the said privateer Le Poisson Volant took from him, this deponent, one thousand three hundred and fifty-three dollars and one quarter of a dollar; that in the afternoon of the 31st day following, he was carried to Port de Paix, from which place he obtained leave to come to this city, but was not permitted to bring with him, his mate, or any off the crew of the aforesaid schooner Betsey; and that he accordingly arrived here on the third instant, in a very distressed and sickly state, and now desires a protest, requiring an act of me, the said Jacob Mayer, to avail him, when and where it may be needful and necessary.

REYNOLD BROWN.

Whereupon, I, the said Jacob Mayer, at the request aforesaid, have protested, and by these presents do protest, against the said capture, and for the damages thereby occasioned to the said schooner Betsey and cargo, that all losses, cost, charges, and damages suffered or to be suffered, or sustained thereby, may be submitted unto, suffered, and borne, by those to whom of right it shall or may belong.

Thus done and protested at Cape François aforesaid. In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand, [L.S.] and affixed my seal, this 4th day of January, 1797, the day and year first above written.

JACOB MAYER.

The above is a true copy of the original.

PITT COUNTY, May 31, 1797.

LIBERTY. EQUALITY.

IN THE NAME OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

Extract from the Register of Deliberations of the Commission sent by the French Government to the Windward Islands.

CAPE, 17 Nivose, 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Having seen the minutes of the proceedings on the capture of the galliot the Betsey, of Washington, North Carolina, Captain Reynold Brown, taken the 5th of this month by the French privateer le Poisson Volant, (Flying Fish) Captain Thomas de Haunot, the proceedings on the examination on board of the said galliot, on the 7th of this month, by the justice of peace, John Rabel, from which it results that the said galliot is in ballast, and finding nothing on board except one thousand three hundred and forty-three dollars and one-quarter of a dollar.

Having seen the maritime papers of the said galliot, consisting only of a register and a roll of the crew—the account of the sales of the cargo of the said galliot amounting to 11,460 livres 9 sols 4 deniers, dated at Jeremie the 19th December, 1796, signed La Vigne; a letter from Abm. Welfe, dated at Jeremie the 15th December, 1796, addressed to James Sear, merchant, at Turk's Island, and announcing to him that Captain Brown goes to the said island for a cargo of salt.

A bill of exchange for four hundred dollars, drawn at Jeremie the 15th December, 1796, upon James Sear, of Turk's Island, by Abraham Welfe, to the order of Brown.

Having seen sundry official papers dated at Jeremie, in the month of December, 1796, such as certificates and clearances of the custom houses, permits from the commandant of Jeremie, considering that the papers above mentioned prove, incontestably, that the said galliot sailed from Jeremie, considering that Jeremie is one of the colonial ports in rebellion againt the French republic, and under protection of the British Government, declared in a state of siege by the arrêt of the commission of the 6th of this month.

The commission has decreed, and does hereby decree, that the galliot the Betsey, of the port of Washington, North Carolina, taken the 5th of this month by the French privateer le Poisson Volant, Captain Thomas de Haunot, is a good prize, as well as the moneys found on board, and every thing belonging to the said vessel; that, therefore, all persons having the same in custody, are held to give up the same to the captors.

The present arrêt shall be notified to the captain of the said galliot by the captain of the said privateer, and for the complete execution of the present decree the captor captain shall make proper provision.

Signed on the Registers of the Proceedings,

SANTHONAX, President,
RAIMOND, Commissioner,

NANCY, (CUNNINGHAM.)

NORTH CAROLINA, Port Wilmington:

Be it known that, on the twentieth day of March, A. D. one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, before me, Mark Robert Willkings, notary public for the town of Wilmington, by authority duly commissioned, personally appeared Archibald Cunningham, and entered and reserved a legal protest in my office, and, in order to extend the same, hath this day brought before me John Pollis and Haam Hackmaster, seamen, and each being duly sworn, upon their solemn oaths declare and say, that, on the 22d day of December last, they sailed in and with the ship Nancy, of Wilmington, North Carolina, whereof the said Archibald Cunningham is master, from Bristol, she being tight, staunch, well found, and completely manned, bound to this port, having on board as cargo fifty casks earthen ware, twenty-five casks nails, twenty boxes pipes, forty-two boxes glass, and five thousand five hundred and forty-three bushels salt, and twenty crates empty bottles; that on the 2d day of March following, they were in the latitude of Charleston, in thirteen fathom water, having met with contrary winds and a tedious passage, but with no material occurrence, when they saw a schooner in company with a sloop; that, at three o'clock, they observed the schooner standing for them with all sail; that they, these deponents, crowded all sail to get away, but, notwithstanding, the schooner soon came up with them, and, at half past four, the said schooner was so near as to hail them, and order them to hoist out their boat and come on board; that they, these deponents, suspected the said privateer to be French, although they had no colors up, and did not immediately hoist out their boat, but told the schooner that they had been a long time out, and were very scarce of provisions, and anxious to get into port; whereupon the said schooner hoisted French colors and prepared to fire into the ship, ordering them, at the same time, to send the boat on board with their papers, which they were obliged to do; that the said schooner proved to be a French privateer, called the Pauline, Alexander Bolchoz, master, who sent on board the ship armed men, who took charge of her and sent on board the said privateer the first mate, boatswain, and several of the crew; that the captain of the privateer then declared the said ship and cargo to be a lawful prize, saying that he found by the log-book she had carried naval stores to Great Britain, which were contraband; that the captain of the privateer then made sail, ordering the ship to keep company, and they arrived at Nassau river, on the coast of East Florida, where the captain of the privateer took some provisions and water and a pilot; and on the 9th following, in the said month of March, they anchored off the bar at St. Augustine, East Florida; that he, the said Archibald Cunningham, went on shore in the pilot boat, together with the captain of the privateer and others belonging to her; that the Government would not consent to the ship being brought into the port of St. Augustine as a prize, in consequence of the good understanding, friendship, and harmony existing between Spain and the United States: whereby the captain of the privateer concluded to send the ship to a French port; that he, this deponent, Archibald Cunningham, taking into consideration the consequence of being sent to a French port, whereby much detention and expense would necessarily arise, and probably a total loss, and then lying at anchor in a very dangerous situation, proposed to the captain of the privateer to ransom the ship, which, after some time, was agreed to, upon the captain of the privateer receiving, in cash, the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, which was to be paid down; that he, the said Archibald Cunningham, went on shore for the purpose of borrowing the money, but found much difficulty in obtaining it, and was under the necessity of giving a premium of fifty per cent.; that, by this means, he obtained the said sum of fifteen hundred dollars, and gave bills upon his owners for the same, with the addition of the fifty per cent., making, in all, two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars; that the said sum of fifteen hundred dollars was counted, paid, and delivered to the said Alexander Bolchoz, master of the said privateer, on the 11th day of the present month, March, in presence of F. R. Fatio, Thomas Travers, George Fleming, Thomas Sterling, and A. Buyck, as by their certificate will appear; that they, these deponents, then got the command of the ship, and proceeded for this port, leaving James Murray, the first mate, who chose to continue with the privateer, and arrived here the 18th day of said month, March. And the said Archibald Cunningham, speaking for himself, further saith, that he verily believes that it was for the benefit of all concerned in said ship and cargo, to effect her liberation in the manner it was done; that it was impossible to get any part of the cargo landed to sell to raise cash, and that he was under the necessity of giving so large a premium for the amount of the ransom money, because it could not be got on better terms, and he thought it was most advisable to accede to that, rather than suffer the ship and cargo to be carried to a French port. And the said John Pollis and Haam Hackmaster, each concurring and agreeing with the foregoing affidavit, as far as could come to their knowledge, have each respectively signed their names hereto.

ARCHIBALD CUNNINGHAM, Jr.
JOHN POLLIS,
HAAM HACKMASTER.

Wherefore the said Archibald Cunningham doth protest, and I, the said notary, at his request, do solemnly protest against the said privateer called the Pauline, the commander and crew thereof, and against the French republic, for all losses, damages, delays, detentions, costs, expenses, and charges whatever, already suffered by the said ship Nancy and her cargo, or which may arise or accrue to the owners, underwriters, and all concerned. Thus done and protested at Wilmington.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and affixed my notarial seal, April the third, A. D. one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, and in the twenty-first year of our independence.

MARK R. WILLKINGS, Notary Public.

NORTH CAROLINA, Port Wilmington:

I certify the foregoing copy to be a true and exact copy of Captain Archibald Cunningham's protest, taken from the records of my office, as recorded from the original, in book C, pages 220, 221, 222.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and affixed my notarial seal, Wilmington, May [L. S.] the tenth, A. D. one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, and in the 21st year of our independence.

BRIG TRIO, (STORY.)

JAMAICA, ss.

William Williams Story, master of the brig Trio, of New York, in the United States of America, Samuel Wordelin, boatswain, James Johnson, and Abraham Day, seamen, all belonging to the said brig, being severally duly sworn, upon the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, make oath and say, that they sailed from New York aforesaid, on the tenth day of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, bound for Kingston in the island of Jamaica aforesaid, laden with a cargo of meal, potatoes, bread, fish, and staves, the said brig being tight, staunch, and every way properly equipped and manned for her said voyage; that nothing material occurred until the 27th following, then off Grand Turk's Island, was brought to and boarded by a French republican privateer schooner, mounting twelve guns, called the La Trompeuse, whereof one Antonio La Barrere was commander, who immediately took possession of the said brig Trio, and took on board the said schooner La Trompeuse, William Beadle, mate, John Parker and William Corben, seamen, Americans, and residents of New York, aforesaid, and also William Buly, an Irishman by birth, as these deponents are informed and verily believe, and a resident of New York, aforesaid. And also took part of three coils of new rope, one barrel of bread, and several other articles. That the said La Barrere sent a prize master and four men on board the said brig, and ordered her to proceed for Cape François, in the island of St. Domingo; that on the day following, being the 28th of the same month of December, at about seven o'clock in the forenoon, these deponents (together with William Hunter, a black man, also belonging to the said brig) having a favorable opportunity, &c. re-took possession of the said brig, and proceeded with her on their voyage to Jamaica aforesaid, and arrived at Kingston aforesaid, on the 31st day of December last.

BRIG RUSSEL, (SMITH.)

The brig Russel, Captain Thomas Smith, owned by Messrs. John G. and Thomas Blount, and worth about eight thousand dollars, sailed from Ocacrock, North Carolina, in December last; cleared out for St. Thomas, but went to Providence, and was going from thence to Jamaica when she was captured by the French privateer Trompeuse, Captain Barrere, and carried into St. Domingo, where vessel and cargo were condemned and sold. It is to be observed that Captain Smith had positive instructions not to go, or attempt to go, to any British Island that did not belong to Great Britain at the commencement of the existing war between France and England.

Copies of the condemnation, and of Captain Smith's protest, will be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State, in a few days.

THOMAS BLOUNT.

June 15, 1797.

By this public instrument of protest be it made known, that, on this 2d day of February, 1797, before me Leonard Dessaux, notary and tabellion public, duly admitted, and sworn for the port of Washington, personally appeared Thomas Smith, late master of the brigantine Russel, and being duly sworn according to law, declares for truth, that the Russel sailed from Ocracock bar, in the State of North Carolina, on the 9th day of December last, with the following orders, to wit:

WASHINGTON, November 16, 1796.

CAPTAIN THOMAS SMITH:

Proceed with the Russel as fast as possible into Shew Castle road, where the Grampus will, speedily as possible, deliver you the rest of your load; when that is well completed, proceed to sea, and my present opinion is, that it will be best to proceed to the Island of St. Thomas, and either sell there or at Tortola, as you find will best answer; but sell where you will, avoid Jews and desperadoes who will run after you to purchase; always inquire for the best houses, and make your contracts in writing, and be sure to have despatch if possible.

If salt is to be had at a quarter of a dollar per bushel, ballast with it, and bring good sugar for balance; and if salt is higher, bring one-third rum, and two-thirds sugar, for your returns. I do not consider this order binding; you will inquire of all the vessels that arrive from the West Indies, and proceed to that market that promises the best voyage; and if you hear that herrings answer well at any where you can go, take them in at the Castle, and consult Jack Wallace about the market before you sail. But in no case are you to proceed to an English port in a French island. Or should I suppose lumber will answer well in any French port, as they have not yet began to improve, so that St. Thomas, St. Bartholomew's, Tortola, Barbadoes, Grenada, Antigua, or Jamaica, must probably be the place; therefore clear out for St. Thomas's.

Write me from the bar for what place you sail, and write me every opportunity to any part of the continent from the place you arrive at. Use economy, and make despatch, with my best wishes for your safety.

I am yours, &c.

J. G. BLOUNT.

And, that under these orders he sailed for the island of New Providence, in consequence of information he received, that there had been a hurricane at that place, and arrived there on the 18th of the same month; but not finding an advantageous market, he sailed again on the 19th, in search of a better. That on the day following, at eight o'clock, A. M. they were boarded by a French privateer La Trompeuse, commanded by Antoine Barrere, and owned in Cape François, in the island of St. Domingo. That the said Antoine Barrere took from on board the Russel, the said Thomas Smith, the vessel's register, and other papers, which they still detain, and sundry stores, and detained him some time on board the privateer; then sent him on board the Russel, and took out the mate, and ordered the Russel into the Cape François, where she arrived on the 31st December, and in a few days the commission condemned the said brig Russel and cargo, as a prize to the aforesaid privateer and crew. And therefore now the said Thomas Smith requires a protest.

THOMAS SMITH.
JOHN HUTCHIN.

Wherefore I, the said Leonard Dessaux, at the request aforesaid, have protested, and by these presents do protest, against the said Captain Antoine Barrere, the owners of the privateer La Trompeuse, the commission who condemned said brig Russell, the republic of France, and all concerned therein, for all loss and damages which have, or may accrue, to the owners of the said brigantine Russel and cargo, or all others concerned therein.

Thus done and protested at the port of Washington aforesaid. In testimony whereof, I the said Leonard Dessaux have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my seal of office, this day and date aforesaid.

IN THE NAME OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

Extract of the Register of the Resolutions of the Commission delegated by the French Government to the Leeward Islands.

CAPE, 21*st Nivose*, 5*th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.*

Having seen the certificate of the capture of the brig Russel of Washington, Captain Thomas Smith, taken the 30th of Brumaire last, by the French privateer La Trompeuse, Captain Barrere. Having seen the proceedings of the justice of the peace of the Cape, about said prize. Having seen the shipping papers of the said brig, consisting of the register, the sea-letter, and the manifest of the cargo. Having seen a declaration of said Captain Smith, which appears to have been made on board, in which he says he has remained thirty hours in the island of Providence, and sailed thence for Jamaica, to the consignation of Richard Lake in Kingston. Having seen a petition of the said Captain Smith reclaiming the said vessel in consequence of his pleading that he was bound to a British port, not to any of the ports of St. Domingo revolted against the republic.

Considering that from all the vouchers above related, there results the incontrovertible evidence that the said brig Russel, Captain Thomas Smith, was going from an English port to another.

Considering that the resolution passed by the Executive Directory, the 14th Messidor last, prescribes to all the vessels of the republic, and the armed vessels belonging to individuals to treat neutral vessels in the same manner as they suffered the English to treat them.

Considering that it is publicly known that no neutral flag is respected by the agents of the British Government in the Antilles. And that public evidence is confirmed by a number of declarations made, or depositions recorded in the office of the Secretary-general of the commission.

Considering that it is in consequence of the official arrival of the above resolution of the Executive Directory, and in consequence of the publicity of the manner in which the English Government in the Antilles treats neutral vessels, that the commission passed their resolution of the 18th of this month, by which they declare all neutral vessels bound to or from English ports to be legal prize.

The commission hath resolved, and do resolve that the brig Russel, of Washington, Captain Thomas Smith, taken the 30th Brumaire last, by the French privateer La Trompeuse, Captain La Barrere, is a legal prize, as well her cargo, and every thing that may belong to it, the whole to be sold to the profit of the captors; therefore all guardians and detainers of said vessel and her cargo are bound to deliver both into the hands of the captors or their attorney.

The present resolution to be notified to the captain of the said brig by the captain of the said privateer or his attorney—and for the complete execution of the present resolution, the captain, captor, or his attorney shall, and may, if necessary, apply to whom law directs.

SCHOONER MILTON, (BROOKS.)

Extract from the Registers of the Secretary of the Municipality of Basseterre, Guadaloupe.

This day, the 19th Germinal, 5th republican year, at the municipal office of Basseterre, Guadaloupe, in which assisted the citizens Patriat, mayor, Négré, national agent, Jean Baptist Seignoret, municipal officer in service, assisted by the secretary, appeared Thomas Brooks, captain of the American schooner Milton, of New York, who under the faith of an oath at the moment administered to him, and assisted by the interpreter of the English language, declared that he sailed from the said place on the 7th of March, (O. S.) with a cargo of flour, maize, biscuit, peas, rice, bound for Barbadoes and Martinique, under the direction of M. Valentine Blake, one of the owners of said schooner and cargo; that he arrived at Barbadoes the 29th current, and sailed thence on the 31st of the same month for Martinique; that the day following on his route he perceived a sail at seven in the morning, bearing down upon them under full sail, and all oars out, the island of Martinique then bearing W. N. W. distant near six leagues, but being becalmed was overtaken by her, which proved to be the French privateer called the Drague, of four guns and fifty men, commanded by Captain Gabot, belonging to citizen Sevarme, of Basseterre, Guadaloupe, who manned us, and brought us to the port of Basseterre, where we arrived on the 30th of April, and after which intervened the judgment of the commercial tribunal, condemning the said schooner as good prize, together with her cargo, for the benefit of the captors. Wherefore he requires an act of reservation and protest, which he makes as well in his own, as in the name of the interested in the schooner Milton and her cargo, both on account of her arrest, and being brought into this road by the said privateer, and on account of the confiscation pronounced by the said judgment of the said schooner and her cargo, for the benefit of the captors, and generally for all wrongs, damages, losses, expenses, detentions, and prejudices, which may result therefrom, against the interests of his owners and concerned, reserving to himself to use the said reserve and protest, against whom, before whom, and wherever it may be requisite, even to make the same more full and ample, if he thinks proper, either at New York or elsewhere, which has been delivered to him by the members of the office who have signed with him, the interpreter and secretary.

Signed on the register, Thomas Brooks, Bernier, interpreter, Patriat, mayor, Négré, national agent, and Seignoret, municipal officer in service, and Deschamps, secretary.

And afterwards appeared Shillah Kelly, mate on board the schooner Milton, who, after making oath to speak the truth, and under the assistance of the same interpreter, having requested a communication by him of the declaration this day made by Thomas Brooks, captain of the said schooner, said, that it was exactly agreeable to the truth, and that he had nothing to add to, or take from the same, and thereof requested an act might be delivered to him. And he signed the same, with the interpreter and members of the office. Thus on the registers, Shillah, Bernier, interpreter, Patriat, mayor, Négré, national agent, Seignoret, officer in service, and Deschamps, secretary.

I John Baptist Seignoret, municipal officer of this commune, Basseterre, Guadaloupe, performing in this town the functions of mayor, in the absence of citizen Patriat, mayor of this commune, Basseterre, Guadaloupe, certify to whom it may concern, that the signature above is that of citizen Deschamps, secretary of the municipality of Basseterre, Guadaloupe; that thereto, faith is, and ought to be given, as well in, as out of judgment. In faith whereof, I have signed these presents, which shall be countersigned by the secretary, and sealed with the seal of the municipality.

I further certify, the stamped and comptrolled paper are not used in this colony.

Extract from the registers of the Tribunal of Commerce established in the Island of Guadaloupe, sitting at the Town of Basseterre, in said Island.

We, the judges of the commercial tribunal, having seen the papers which have been sent to it, concerning the capture by the privateer Drague, Captain Antoine Gabot, of the schooner Milton, Captain Thomas Brooks, having also seen the declarations and interrogatories annexed thereto, made on the said prize with the municipality of this town of Basseterre, and after having heard thereupon citizen Bazin, surrogate for the commissioner of the Executive Directory, near the said tribunal and his conclusions, having also heard the report, and considered the whole. Whereas, it is proved by the declarations of the captain, of the supercargo, and by the crew, that the destination of the schooner Milton for the Island of St. Croix was feigned, that her true destination was Barbadoes or Martinique, that she was arrested going from Barbadoes to Martinique, that moreover she was without sea-letters emanating from the authority of the President of the United States of America, and that the supercargo was an Irishman, naturalized as an American only since the present war. The tribunal as well in virtue of the regulation of 21st October, 1744, as of the arrêt of the agents of the Executive Directory of 13th Pluviose last, declares the said schooner, her tackle, apparel, and cargo, good prize to the benefit of the captors: and therefore orders, that the same be delivered up to whomsoever the same may belong, to be disposed of as their property, an inventory thereof being previously made.

Order, &c.

Done and judged by us, Victor Croizier, president, Dominique Romain, and William Curtet, judges of the said tribunal, the 18th of Germinal, in the morning, in the 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Copy for the captors.

I Victor Croizier, president of the commercial tribunal established in the Island of Guadaloupe, sitting at the town of Basseterre of the said island, certify and attest, to all whom it may concern, that Latriere who has signed the copy of judgment above written, is secretary to the said tribunal, that faith should be given to his signature, both in and out of judgment. I also certify that the stamped paper is not in use in this colony.

In testimony whereof, I have signed these presents, and caused the common seal of the tribunal to be hereto affixed.

EXTRACTS FROM COMMUNICATIONS RECEIVED FROM CONSULS OF THE UNITED STATES, RELATIVE TO DEPREDATIONS COMMITTED ON THE COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES, BY THE FRENCH.

Copy of a letter from M. Roquesante, Consul of the French republic, at Cadiz, to Joseph M. Yznardi, consul of the United States, at the same place, dated SEPTEMBER 12, 1796.

CITIZEN CONSUL:

I received your despatch of the 12th September, (O. S.) in which you desire to know my opinion on the subject of the American prize vessel, called the Mercury, commanded by Captain Samuel Brooks, of your nation, captured by the two French privateers, Le Droit de L'Homme, and L'Escamoteur, and brought into Tarifa, the day before yesterday.

The arrêt of the Executive Directory, dated 12th Messidor, which I annex to my despatch, will inform you of the reasons which have authorized our cruisers to arrest the American vessel in question.

The bill of health which was found on board of this American brigantine, shows, that this vessel was bound for Gibraltar, where she was going to sell her cargo, consisting of flour, pitch, tar, &c. It is therefore evident that these provisions and munitions of war were destined for the enemies of the republic. In consequence of the proofs which evidence the succors which it was attempted to carry to this power, with which France is at war, and of the arrêt of the Directory, of the repeal of which I have no knowledge, I do not at present see how I can avoid pronouncing my judgment in favor of the captors and owners. In the mean time to give you an unequivocal proof of the desire entertained by my Government, to maintain the good understanding which prevails between it and yours, I inform you, that I shall not pronounce judgment upon this prize, until I shall have obtained new information, and for this purpose I am about giving orders to my chancellor, to go to Tarifa, to proceed accordingly.

MALAGA, January 28, 1797.

SIR:

Soon after I had the honor of addressing you my former letter, No. 10, dated the 10th November, of last year, a most cruel instance of injustice happened at this port with two of our vessels, viz. the brig Rover of Baltimore, Arthur Smith, master, and the schooner Nancy of Alexandria, Virginia, commanded by Job Palmer; both of them brought from hence cargoes of sugar and coffee to this port, where, on account of the high duties paid on landing, makes the importation next to a prohibition; a sale, however, took place afloat and the vessels were to proceed, and deliver these cargoes at Tangier, a free port in Morocco, to be re-shipped there on others for a market; at this juncture, a small French privateer called the Ferret, belonging to Marseilles, and commanded by Anthony Daumas, lay here, who made sail at the same time of the Nancy and Rover, getting under way, and captured them while they were yet within gunshot of this territory, and brought them back with the French flag flying on their fore-topmasts, manned with Frenchmen, all their papers seized and put into the hands of the French consul here, who pretends to have a prior right for adjudging all cases of this nature in his chancery, although they belong to neutral Powers. When I called on the consul to know the motive of stopping the vessels, I learned from him it was founded on a suspicion of their going to an enemy's port; (say Gibraltar) another motive was the Nancy's carrying thirty pipes of wine, which the supercargo on board her had purchased here for his account, which he intended to carry home, but I believe had not yet drawn out a bill of lading to produce; another motive was, that an English passenger on board the Rover, was seen breaking up a remnant of paper, at the time of the French crew boarding her; either of which said circumstances, he said, was a sufficient motive for condemning the property, according to the established marine laws of the French republic. After hearing these vague insinuations from the consul, I judged it highly proper to call on the Spanish Government for getting the vessels and cargoes liberated from the French chancery, and to decide the business conformable to what they were bound to do by the sixth article of the treaty concluded with the United States of America; but such was the timidness I found there about meddling with any matter that had any connexion with French interest, that I could not obtain any redress until the Captain-general of Malaga consulted the court. I also carried my claim there, and after many remonstrances made to the Secretary of State, about our ships being taken, when within gunshot of this territory, he was prevailed on to order the General at Malaga to withdraw the American papers out of the French chancery, and that he should let the consul know His Catholic Majesty's displeasure in wanting to establish a jurisdiction in Spain, not yet allowed to any nation at no time whatever; this circumstance has in no respect yet bettered the case, for the consul has on two occasions given a flat denial to the King's order, and won't give up the papers until he is desired to do it by the Directory in Paris. During this interval of knowing who is to decide the business, the consul has passed sentence on the Nancy, condemning the thirty pipes of wine as lawful prize to the captors, with costs of chancery, which is ten pounds sterling, for the neglect of not carrying a bill of lading; putting the ship and remainder of the cargo at liberty. The Rover would appear to be under worse circumstances, whereas both ship and cargo are liable to forfeiture on account of the circumstance of breaking a paper at the time of capture. Whatever may be the issue of this unlucky business, I shall take care, sir, to acquaint you, by which means you will be informed of the treatment shown by the French to our flag, and the backwardness of the Spaniards by not redressing such depredations done to the colors in their ports. I send you enclosed a copy of the consul's sentence, and his answer to a letter I wrote him, making an inquiry of all the papers that neutral vessels should have on board, to satisfy the French cruisers for my Government.

I have the honor to be, &c.

MICHAEL MURPHY.

CONSULATE OF MALAGA, French republic.

FRENCH REPUBLIC.

We, Nicholas Maurice Champre, consul of the French republic with the kingdom of Grenada, resident at Malaga, authorized by the laws of the 3d of Brumaire and 8th of Floreal, of the 4th year of the republic, to pronounce on the validity of prizes brought into the ports within the limits of this consulate by the ships or privateers of the republic, having seen the collection and inventory of the papers found on board of the Anglo American schooner the Nancy, Captain Job Palmer, taken by the French privateer Le Ferret, Captain Anthony Daumas, arrived at Marseilles, as well as sundry other documents exhibited, as well by the said citizen Daumas as by the said Captain Palmer, and by William Bartleman, supercargo on board of the said schooner. The said collection and inventory executed by citizen John Baptist Pelieu, chancellor of the consulate, agreeably to the said law of the 3d Brumaire, 4th year.

Having also seen the instruction given by the said chancellor, consisting of the interrogatories and declarations by him received from the said Captain Palmer, the said supercargo Bartleman, the pilot Joseph Quill of the said schooner, and from the citizen Daumas, and several officers and others on board of the said privateer, among others from Anthony Joseph Daumas, prize master on board the said prize, as also the papers containing the said instruction mentioned in the said inventory.

Considering on the one hand that the only motives of detention of the Nancy, alleged by Citizen Daumas and his officers, both in the process verbal written at sea, and in their declarations, consist, 1st. That the destination of this vessel was Gibraltar. 2d. That it might be presumed that the supercargo was an Englishman.

That these two motives are destitute of foundation; that without examining the unforeseen consequences of the first motive, it is sufficient to observe that the destination for Gibraltar was assigned to the Nancy in a preceding voyage; after which this vessel had come from Gibraltar to Malaga, and her charter party proves that she went from Malaga to Tangier on a voyage entirely neutral, and from which neither delivery nor sale was to take place with the enemies of the republic; that this same act contains indeed a conditional clause in virtue of which the Nancy might make the same voyage to Gibraltar, in the case provided for in the clause; but that a conditional destination, and for a voyage which concerns only individuals of a neutral nation, as is explained sufficiently in the charter party, cannot give a motive to the lawfulness of the capture of a neutral vessel. That the objection which concerns the supercargo is not better founded, since it is proved by the declaration making part of the instruction, and by written proof that the supercargo was born at Fairfax, in America, and that at fourteen years of age he was bound an apprentice to a merchant.

That the Nancy is furnished with all the papers required by the laws of France for proving the neutrality of the vessel; considering, on the other hand, that the papers relative to her cargo are not in the same situation; that her supercargo has declared that he had on board among other merchandise thirty pipes of Malaga wine, which are not entered on any of the vessel's papers; that the said supercargo has, it is true, produced a bill of lading of them, which was found on board in the drawer of his table, but two days after he was brought into this port by the said privateer, and when it was proved also by the declaration of the said Bartleman that he had returned on board the schooner, after he had been on shore; whence it results that this bill of lading has probably been fabricated on shore after it was too late, and carried on board, and consequently it should be deemed as invalid; that hence, according to the sixth article (not abrogated by any posterior laws) chapter IX, book 3, of the marine ordinance of 1681, these thirty pipes of wine are within the confiscatory clause.

That the objection made by William Bartleman, grounded upon the Ferret's having sailed from the port of Malaga a little after the Nancy, appears to be of no consequence, 1st. Because the rule generally adopted, which establishes an interval of twenty-four hours between the sailing of a vessel and that of an enemy ship going against her, cannot be applied to the respective sailing of vessels of two neutral powers. 2d. Because in the present war upon the ocean, the enemy of the republic being also that of Spain, the rule above mentioned ceases to apply in the ports of the latter Power.

That this last motive in like manner justifies the citizen Daumas in the supposition of the contested fact, that the Nancy might have been taken in the waters of Spain, since the French privateers were free to visit neutral vessels, in order to search them for enemies' property upon the coast of Spain, in the same manner as upon those of the republic, the two Powers being engaged in a common cause.

That nevertheless the single article of thirty pipes of wine being liable to confiscation on board the Nancy, justice requires that this vessel should be put in a situation of pursuing her voyage as soon as possible, with the rest of her cargo.

We declare the thirty pipes of wine found on board the schooner Nancy to be good prize to the profit of the owners and interested in the French privateer Le Ferret, Captain Anthony Daumas; hereby authorizing them to unlade the same and make sale of them provisionally, depositing the proceeds thereof in the chancery of the consulate, subject to the duties due to the marine invalids, those which may become due on account of the said sale, and to conform themselves, moreover, to the laws and regulations relative to the marine, unless the captain or interested in the said schooner and her cargo should prefer having the said thirty pipes of wine estimated at their expense, and by proper persons appointed by them and citizen Daumas in behalf of the owners, and to have the amount thereof deposited provisionally in the said chancery. We, moreover, declare that there is no cause for a longer detention of the Nancy and the residue of her cargo. We order the citizen Daumas to withdraw his crew from the said vessel which we authorize freely to pursue and continue her voyage; without the captain of the Nancy or the interested in her being able to recover any indemnity on account of a detention justified by the want of a bill of lading of the said thirty pipes of wine; and for the same reason they shall pay the expenses of proceedings and of the present judgment, of which a copy shall be delivered and notified to the concerned, and which shall be executed, the entry of any appeal notwithstanding.

Done in the consulate house, and sealed with the national seal of the consulate at Malaga, the 5th Frimaire,

CHAMPRE. Consul of the French republic.

Notified the said day, 5th Frimaire, in the said year, by me, John Baptist Pelieu, chancellor of the consulate of the French republic in the city of Malaga, to Don Joachin Hidalgo, consignee of the schooner Nancy and her cargo, to whom I delivered the present copy of the judgment above mentioned, duly collated with the original, deposited in the archives of this chancery.

J. B. PELIEU, Chancellor.

Extract of a letter from J. Cox Barnet, Consul of the United States at Brest, to the Secretary of State, dated Brest, January 29, 1797.

I have first to premise, that, since my residence at this place, most of my time and attention has been taken up in relieving, or endeavoring to relieve, many of our distressed seamen, who have been brought into this port, taken in British vessels, where they had, in most instances, been impressed, and here made prisoners of war. When any of these had been so fortunate as to have been able to preserve their passports or protection, (proofs of their citizenship) I have, till now, immediately obtained their enlargement, when, on the contrary, they have (from accident, or the violent outrage of the British commanders, who sometimes have totally disregarded them and destroyed them) been deprived of them, I have not met with the same success in my application for them. My further applications of this nature, I am too sorry to find, will no longer be of any avail, in consequence of an order from the minister of the marine and colonies, forbidding the further enlargement of any citizens of the United States, who may have been taken on board British ships, and stating, that they shall, henceforth, be considered and treated as prisoners of war. This information I had two days ago from the ordonnateur of the marine, in reply to my application for five of our citizens, now detained in the prisons of this place as prisoners of war.

Under this cover, sir, I have the honor of enclosing you a copy of the condemnation of the ship Diana of Savannah, taken and sent in here, in October last, by the privateer Le Vengeur, of this port, and condemned by the tribunal of commerce, of this place, on the 28th November last, for want of a sea-letter, together with a copy of the protest of the master of said ship, Nehemiah I. Ingraham, of Boston, to which I beg leave to refer you. We are going on with an appeal in this affair before the tribunal of the department at Quimper, where we hope to meet that justice we believe wanting in the tribunal of commerce.

Respecting this condemnation, I have to observe to you, sir, that the owners of this privateer are citizens of the United States; the husband, Captain John Cooper, of Virginia. The captors endeavoring to make it appear that the register of said ship is a counterfeit, alleged " that all American ships' registers were struck on American manufactured paper, whereas this appears to be of English fabric; that the signature 'Joseph Nourse,' is, in this, done with the pen, whereas, in the original ones, it is done (they say) with a stamp or plate; that this register being No. 8, only, and issued at Bath, near Wiscasset, was another mark of its falsity, there having been more than eight vessels built at Bath since the year 1794, when that register was issued," &c.

These circumstances, however, sir, were not attended to by the judges of the tribunals of commerce, who appear to have grounded the condemnation of this ship on her being deficient in the sea-letter, by virtue of the twenty-fifth article of the treaty of 1778.

No citizens of the United States are resident at this place; the few who are here, are, at this time, owners of, and interested in, French privateers. I do not think I shall expose myself to censure in hazarding the observation, that the privateers of this port which have offered any molestation or vexation to American vessels, are wholly, and in part, owned by citizens of the United States. Of these, I may quote the privateer Bonaparte, (formerly ship Apollo, of Boston) wholly owned by Americans; the privateers Vengeur and Le Hardy, owned principally by Americans, and the latter commanded by John Cowell, of Boston.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. COX BARNET.

P. S. While concluding the above, sir, I am informed by good authority, of the arrival of Captain Cowell of the privateer Le Hardy, at Morlaix, and that he has taken a ship of four hundred tons, of Boston, bound from thence to London, loaded with sugar, coffee, cotton, &c. and ordered her to a French port; I cannot learn her name.

Extract from the Register of Protest of Masters of foreign vessels.

On the 27th Frimaire, in the fifth year of the French republic, one and indivisible, at the national custom house at Brest, appeared Nehemiah I. Ingraham, master of the American ship Diana, belonging to Mr. Edward Swarbrick, of Savannah, in the State of Georgia, in the United States of America, of the burden of about two hundred and eighty tons, furnished with a crew of thirteen men; who, assisted by citizen C. N. C. Langlot, as interpreter, declared, that he sailed from Liverpool with his said vessel, on the 15th of October, 1796, with a cargo of divers merchandises; that at sea, whilst he was pursuing his destination with a favorable wind, on the 23d of October, 1796, in latitude 49 degrees, 31 seconds, and 9 degrees, 30 seconds, longitude, from the meridian of London, his mate came into the cabin very early in the morning, and told him that the wind was favorable, and a vessel was sailing towards them. Having mounted the quarter deck, he was not there long before she fired a gun at the Diana; he immediately hoisted his flag, and pursued his course: another gun was fired at him, the ball of which fell near to his vessel; then he lay to, and when the vessel came alongside of him, they asked, in English, whence he came; he answered, that he came from Liverpool, and was bound for Savannah: they then ordered him to hoist out his boat, and come on board with his papers, which he immediately did. Whilst he was aboard, he perceived she was a privateer, called the Vengeur, Captain Michel, of Brest, whereupon he was astonished seeing that she carried an English flag. His papers being examined, they were found complete. He was then asked whether he had a sea-letter on board: he answered affirmatively. His crew was kept on board the privateer, and he was sent on board his vessel, accompanied by two officers and several men. When he came on board his vessel, he immediately looked into his little trunk to find the sea-letter among his other papers, but not finding it, he was going to search for it in his chest, where it had been put with various other papers and letters, but he was not permitted to come near it; one of the officers who accompanied him, speaking to him in English, and absolutely forbidding him to search in the chest, where the paper they demanded certainly was; and finally, they obliged him to go into the boat, without even permitting him to take his bed, and letting him take only a very few of his clothes: they took from on board his vessel, seven sailors, the cook, and two passengers, who were carried on board the privateer. Several officers of the privateer spoke with the captain, and threatened him, ending the conversation by demanding from him an acknowledgment of his not having a sea-letter: he refused, as was his duty; but they answered, that if he did not sign the acknowledgment, they would put him in irons and confine him in the hold. To avoid this ill treatment, and knowing that an act extorted by violence, and from one who was not free, cannot prejudice him who signs it, he determined to give them the acknowledgment they demanded, because he found himself threatened and surrounded by armed men, a circumstance which must justify him relatively to the writing of the acknowledgment and its form: he adds, that he saw unloaded, and taken out of the Diana, cordage, sail cloth, painter's oil, compasses, fowls, cheese, brushes, brooms, a speaking trumpet, &c.; that he continued on board of the privateer Vengeur, until the 25th of October, when she was captured by the English frigate St. Margaret, which carried her to Cork; and he was informed at London, that his vessel, the Diana, was carried into the port of Brest, which determined him to go there in order to claim his said vessel and her cargo, that he might proceed according to his destination, seeing his neutral and friendly quality, which is proved by his register, or deed of property, the deed of sale, shipping articles, bills of lading and invoices of part of the cargo, and even by a sea-letter, which might be found in his chest remaining on board the privateer.

For all which he protests as well against his arrest as against the distress of his person, and against the violence used towards him in extorting from him the acknowledgment above mentioned, reserving his right to sue for damages and interest against the agents and owners of the privateer Vengeur, and to oblige them to bear all losses resulting from the arrest of his said vessel; reserving his right to extend his protest and to have the present declaration attested to by his crew, in case they should come to France, as he expects to pursue the remainder of his voyage, and has signed on the register with citizen Langlot, his interpreter.

NEHEMIAH I. INGRAHAM, Captain and LANGLOT, his Interpreter.

A copy conformable with the original,

LE TOURNEUR.

I, J. Cox Barnet, consular agent of the United States of America, for the port of Brest, do certify that the above protest is a true copy of the original in my hands, delivered to me by citizen Le Tourneur, collector of the customs of this port.

IN THE NAME OF THE FRENCH PEOPLE.

The Tribunal of Commerce of Brest, Department of Finistere, has rendered the following Judgment.

Extract of the Register of Audience of the Tribunal of Commerce of Brest, Department of Finistere.

The tribunal of commerce established at Brest, exercising the functions attached to it by the decree of the 14th February, 1793, (O. S.) and in execution of the law of the 3d Brumaire last, which gives to it the power of rendering judgment in cases of prize, which had been before given to it by a decree of the committee of public safety, of the 4th Floreal, 2d year, having seen the declarations made before a justice of the peace, of the 8th of last Brumaire, by the prize-master, that citizen Michel, commandant of the privateer Vengeur, being on a cruise, in latitude 50 degrees 30 seconds, and 11 degrees 43 seconds longitude, took the ship Diana, Captain Ingraham, calling himself an American, of the burden of about three hundred tons, laden with divers merchandise, on a voyage from Liverpool to Savannah, having six passengers, under the American flag; the request of citizen Corbet, commissary aux classes, of the same date, to the justice of the peace, to go on board the said vessel and make a summary inventory, and to place the seals; eleven examinations of the persons hereafter mentioned, to wit, George, Mernezie, Cambuzier, of Charleston, three passengers of the vessel called the Sally, put on board the Diana by the privateer Vengeur, Zenard, carpenter of the Diana, James Stanley, mate of the said vessel, Mark John, passenger, Richard J. Wambrick, supercargo, John Miller, tanner, passenger, Petatin, prize-master from the privateer Vengeur, Louis Garandroux, second prize-master, J. B. Laferu, officer of marines; the commission of the said prize-master; the declaration made on board the privateer Vengeur, by Captain Michel, relative to the causes of stopping the ship Diana; the process verbal of the placing of the seals by the justice of the peace, of the 6th of the said month; the act of property or register; the shipping articles; the declaration of Nehemiah I. Ingraham, Captain of the Diana, that the captain of the privateer Vengeur took his papers from him, and that he had no sea-letter; the contract of sale of the Diana by Thomas Agri, formerly of Pittston and at present at Liverpool, to Edward Swarbrick, formerly of Savannah and at present at Liverpool; two invoices of divers merchandise; divers receipts of lighthouse duties of the coast of England; divers declarations respecting merchandise laden on board the Diana; two bills of lading of the said merchandise; a passport of the United States for J. Miller, Esquire; another of the American consul at Liverpool for James Stanley; the act of naturalization in America of Richard Swarbrick; which papers above mentioned have been translated into the French language by the sworn interpreters, Lecointre and Marzin.

The whole being maturely examined, the tribunal considering,

1. That, from the result of divers examinations, and particularly from those of George, Mernezie, Cambuzier, and of divers passengers, there exists a doubt on the quality of the ship Diana;*

2. That it appears, from the said examinations, that papers were thrown overboard at the time of the capture;† that the regulation of the 26th of July, 1778, declares, article 3d, that vessels belonging to neutrals or allies which, under such circumstances, throw papers overboard, shall be good prize;

3. That article 25th of the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, concluded between France and the United States, expressly declares, that the vessels of the contracting parties shall be furnished with sea-letters, or passports, from their respective Governments;

4. That the 27th article of the same treaty declares that, when the vessels of one of the contracting parties shall be met by a vessel of war of the other, or by a privateer, the master of the vessel shall show his passport evidencing the property of the vessel, and that it shall not be free for her to continue her voyage until she has shown this passport;

5. Considering, in fine, that it results from the declaration made by Captain Ingraham, commanding the ship Diana, that he had no sea-letter or passport,

Declares to be good prize the said ship Diana, with her tackle, and her apparel, and her cargo; orders that sale shall be made of her in the accustomed manner, in order that the proceeds may be divided among the owners, officers, and crew of the privateer Vengeur, and that, in consequence, all guardians, sequestrators, and depositaries, shall deliver them up, for doing which they shall be warranted.

Brest, the 8th Frimaire, 5th year of the republic, one and indivisible. Signed on the register, Joseph Duplessis, president, Guilhem, the elder, Binard, the father, Lorans, judges, and Chalands, an assistant to the judges.

Signed and delivered,

HETET, Secretary.

I, J. Cox Barnet, consular agent of the United States of America, for the port of Brest, do certify that the above is a true copy of the original, signed by Hetet, Greffier of the tribunal of commerce of this commune, now in my hands.

J. COX BARNET.

BREST, 28*th January*, 1797.

Extract of a letter from Joseph Iznardi, Consul of the United States at Cadiz, to the Secretary of State, dated CADIZ, 15*th December*, 1796.

I shall now proceed to exhibit, in one point of view, the number and actual situation of the American vessels detained in the ports under the district of this consulate, which are as follow:

Notes by Mr. Barnet.

*A mulatto man, who denies having made a declaration of this kind.

† Declaration made by an Irishman, prisoner, sent in here on board the Diana, and since set at liberty, and entered into the service of the republic.

Mercury, of New York, Captain Brooks.—She was taken by a French privateer, going into Gibraltar for instructions from the owner's correspondents to proceed up the Mediterranean. She is now detained at Malaga, and the judicial proceedings sent to Madrid in order to have the affair settled by the ministers.

Eliza, of Charleston, Captain William Flagg.—She was taken by the same privateer, going also to Gibraltar for instructions to proceed up the Mediterranean. The judicial proceedings of her cause were sent to Madrid, with those of Captain Brooks, to be conjointly arranged. The cargo of this vessel has been landed at Ceuta, and I have opposed its being sold until a determination is agreed to by the ministers at Madrid. The vessel is released and now here.

Elizabeth, of Philadelphia, Captain Garner.—She was taken coming from London, and brought here; and was going to Sevilla to load with fruit, on account of a house at Hamburg. She has no proper sailing documents, but only a certificate that she is American property by purchase in London. I have opposed her being condemned, and wrote to London, demanding the documents wanting. Independent of the difficulties arisen on that account, this admiralty wants to condemn her for not having the passports required by the 17th article of the late treaty of commerce and amity between the United States and the King of Spain; but I have shown to the court she could not possibly be provided with it.

Mary Ann, of Philadelphia, Captain Smith.—She was taken by the Grand Dorade French privateer, going from Saffi to Lisbon, with wheat, and brought in here. Her papers are perfectly right, and the French seem perfectly satisfied on that head, which made me expect her immediate release; when they have suddenly started difficulties, which are nothing but cavilling and chicane. The cargo is on account of a neutral established at Lisbon, and is to be sold, and the amount given security for. This is the vessel I mentioned in my last, which had had the mate and crew taken out on the high sea, and nothing has since then been heard respecting them.

Commerce, of Boston, Captain Langlois, and another American vessel.—Have been taken and carried into Algesiras, going for, and steering towards the Mediterranean. I have wrote to be acquainted with the particulars, and act accordingly.

Extract of a letter from P. H. Philips, Esq. and addressed to the Secretary of State, dated CURACOA, 25th March, 1797.

SIR:

Within a few days past, the following vessels have been sent in here by cruisers under French colors, in consequence of a proclamation done by Victor Hughes, at Guadaloupe, in the last month, and of which, no doubt, you have had notice ere this. The vessels sent in are: Ship Fame, Captain Joseph Brown, belonging to Portsmouth, New Hampshire, from whence she sailed the —— January, bound with a cargo of lumber to Grenada, where she sold her cargo, and received a return cargo of sugar and rum, which she has on board.

Brig Lady Washington, Captain Mayo Garrish,—belonging to Newburyport, sailed from Charleston, South Carolina, the 29th of January last, bound, with a cargo of rice, staves, pork, and shingles, for a market, and sold her cargo at Barbadoes, where he received sugar and rum, which she has on board.

Schooner Two Friends, Captain —— Van Ransley,—(the captain was kept on board the privateer, and is not yet arrived) belonging to New York, sailed from Wilmington, North Carolina, 20th of January, loaded with a cargo of turpentine, pitch, tar, tobacco, and lumber, cleared out for New York, but, by letters, said to be in the possession of the captors, was bound to Martinico.

Extract of a letter from Frederick Folger, Esq. appointed Consul for the United States, at Aux Cayes, to the Secretary of State, dated

FEBRUARY 10, 1797.

"Hearing with pain of the captures made on the vessels of the United States, and brought into the different ports of this island, I endeavored to obtain a list of them; but, as they are carried into ports distant from my residence, it was a long time before I could succeed; however, I have the honor to transmit you one, although imperfect. I wish it may be acceptable; it exhibits a melancholy picture of the hazardous state of our commerce, which, it seems, has been always a prey, under some pretext or other, to the belligerent Powers."

A few remarkable cases of French Captures, extracted from the newspapers.

1. A ship, from Salem, was taken by a French privateer to the windward of Turk's Island passage: a British sloop of war heaving in sight, the Frenchman quitted her, and heaving round under her stern, poured in several broadsides, which wounded four of her men.—See Gaz. U. S. 7th Feb. 1797.

2. The brig Glasgow, Codwise, of New York, being bound from Jeremie to Port-au-Prince, was captured and carried into Leogane. The captain was confined on board his vessel, his crew were excited to assassinate him; and on the fifteenth day of his confinement, having ventured on shore, he was taken up, placed in the fort, and there detained thirty-six hours, without provisions. After a detention of sixty-eight days, seeing no prospect of a trial, he abandoned the vessel, and returned home.—See Ph. Gaz. 18th Nov. 1796.

3. Captain Pierce, who had been carried to Leogane, mentions, that, on his outward bound passage, in the Bite of Leogane, he was boarded by an armed French barge, the master of which beat his supercargo in so unmerciful a manner with his sword, that he died a few days afterwards. The barge robbed captain Pierce of about three hundred dollars worth, and captain Miller, from Norfolk, to the amount of nine hundred dollars worth; also, Captain Boyd, of Philadelphia, to a considerable amount. They afterwards saw the pirate in Leogane, and complained of him to the commandant, who imprisoned him three days, and then liberated him without giving further satisfaction.—See Phil. Gaz. 28th Nov. 1796.

4. The Hirondale, after having captured the schooner Zephyr, captain Breard, of Portsmouth, and carried her into Cabo Raxo, plundered her of all her provisions, leaving captain B. and crew nothing to subsist on. Captain B. went on board the Hirondale to obtain satisfaction for the loss of his property, and to request, if it should not be made, leave to remain on board the privateer until his vessel was tried. The captain refused him any, ordered him on shore, and, finally, threw him overboard, the privateer being then under way, on another cruise.—Ph. Gaz. 5th April.

5. The brig Two Sisters, Captain Worth, from Norfolk for Leogane, was brought to by a French privateer, to the leeward of Hispaniola. Captain Worth was ordered on board, and, when there, the captain of the privateer, offering a paper written in French, ordered Captain Worth to sign it. On his refusing, the pirate drew his cutlass and swore he would cleave his scull if he did not immediately put his name to the paper; but captain Worth persisted in refusing, reasoning on the absurdity of his signing a writing in a language he did not understand. The privateersman then turned to the sailors (two Italians) and commanded them to write their names: they could not write: he then forced them, with threats, and a drawn sword over their heads, to make their marks at the bottom of the paper. He then directly hailed the brig, informing that she was a good prize, as the men had signed a declaration that she was bound to Jamaica. Captain W. was carried to Cuba, in the privateer, and four days afterwards the brig came in. On Captain Worth's observing to the picarooning captain that he could not have her tried and sold at Cuba, he was told that she was already sold; and soon afterwards a Spanish merchant was put in possession of her. Her papers were then sent to Cape François for trial.—Ph. Gaz. 6th April, 1797.

6. The schooner Columbus, Mason, from St. Vincent's, for Kennebunk, was boarded by a French privateer, which detained her six hours, and took out of her sixty gallons of rum, a barrel of sugar, &c. The privateersmen said they would have carried her in, if they had found property enough to engage their attention. They brought fire from the privateer, ordered the boy to kindle it in the caboose, said they were going to burn the vessel, and ordered the crew to put their things on board the vessel, and convey them to the privateer. One of the privateersmen then carried a firebrand to the mast head, another took one into the cabin, while a third conveyed one into the steerage; but on Captain M. declaring he had no money, and refusing to quit his vessel, they desisted, and permitted him to proceed.—Ph. Gaz. 23d May, 1797.

7. The brig Almy, Cutter, was captured off the east end of Jamaica by two French privateers, one of which was the Flying Fish, built at Baltimore, by one John Love, who afterwards sold her to her present owner at the Cape, and then went captain of her. He fired upwards of thirty shot at the Almy without hailing her, although lying to for twenty minutes before, with American colors flying. He then hailed, and ordered the boat on board, which being done, he detained the mate, two seamen, the ship's register and other papers, and sent a prize master and three others, all armed, on board. They then hoisted in the boat and stood for Gonaives. Next day, however, they were re-captured by a British sloop of war.—Ph. Gaz. 3d Jan. 1797.

8. A gentleman from Porto Rico, informs that the American ship Mount Vernon, captured by the French privateer Flying Fish, Captain Paris, had been condemned and sold there. The pretences for her condemnation were various; but on their being principally obviated, judgment was finally given on instructions to the commander of the privateer, sent by the French minister, directing him to make prize of the ship. Paris, captain of the privateer, had been appointed consul at Porto Rico, and sat in judgment on his own cause.—Ph. Gaz. 28th Dec.

9. The schooner Ranger, Brown, was detained three days at St. Martin's, after having been cleared out; and the captain and crew were confined on board a French frigate, under pretence that she had no sea letter. Previous to the Ranger's sailing, a schooner from Baltimore, and another from New York, were condemned under a similar pretext.—Ph. Gaz. 1st Dec.

10. The schooner Friendship, Harlow, was captured and carried into St. Martin's, under a supposition that she had no sea-letter; but upon producing it, she was released.—Ph. Gaz. 24th Dec.

11. The Speedwell, of Alexandria, bound home, was 63 days on her passage; and owing to the hands having been a long time on short allowance, and to the damage she had sustained, she was obliged to bear away for Cape François, where the administration breaking through every tie of humanity, seized and condemned her.—Ph. Gaz. 23d Feb.

12. Brig Neptune, Blanchard, bound to St. Bartholomew's, with lumber, was carried into Guadaloupe, where she was tried and acquitted. Afterwards, she was tried again, in consequence of Victor Hugues's orders, and condemned, because, as it was said, she had no sea-letter; although Captain B. had a certificate from the custom house that there were not any sea-letters at the time she sailed, in that office.—Ph. Gaz. 25th Feb.

13. Ship Charlotte, of Baltimore, was carried into Guadaloupe, with a cargo of flour, tried and acquitted. The supercargo, Mr. Buchanan, in consequence merely of his name was, without examination, put into close prison for several days by Victor Hugues's orders, who afterwards finding himself mistaken in the person, had him released. Ph. Gaz. 25th Feb.

14. Captain Barney, on his passage from France, captured five or six vessels sailing under certificates of property; these he set fire to, and has publicly declared he will do so in every instance, which is poor encouragement for Americans to purchase prizes of them. One of them was a brig belonging to P. & T. Mackie, from Malaga, Andrew Poden, master, who was murdered the second day after they sailed, by the mate and crew, and a considerable sum of money divided among them.

15. The ship Washington, from the Isle of France to Boston, out 153 days, blown off the coast, and in distress, was taken in sight of Deseada, and sent into port for adjudication.—Ph. Gaz. 6th March, 1797.

16. Captain Bright, on his passage from Alexandria to Miraguane, a French port, with a cargo of flour, was captured by a French privateer, off Port de Paix, carried in there, and condemned without a hearing. There were about fifteen sail more of American vessels in that port, the whole of them condemned, though several were bound to French ports. The administration at the Cape had issued orders to capture all Americans bound to leeward of Cape François.—Gaz. U. S. 28th March.

17. Schooner Clara, of Baltimore, with a valuable cargo of dry goods, bound to Leogane, was captured by a French privateer, and re-captured by a British vessel.—Ph. Gaz. 29th April.

18. The sloop Fox, Brooks, from Hartford, for Leogane, a French port, was captured and sent into Port de Paix, where both vessel and cargo were condemned, under the pretence of her being bound to a British port. The owners of the privateer gave the commissaries 100 half joes to condemn the vessel; and the captain had to pay three half joes for his register after the vessel was sold.—Gaz. U. S. 15th May.

19. The brig Peace, Allen, of Providence, was bound from Dover to Surinam, but touched at Cayenne. After she had been there several days, she was seized; and the vessel and cash she had on board, valued at $25,000, were condemned, under the pretence of her being from a British port.—Gaz. U. S. 18th May.

20. Captain John Hall, of the schooner Rebecca, of Baltimore, was plundered of every thing he had by the prize master, and crew put on board his vessel; and part of his crew were put on board a prison ship, and obliged to work in the day time; at night they were put in irons.—Gaz. U. S. 7th Feb.

21. The schooner Elizabeth, Trott, from Demerara, bound to New London, was captured by the French privateer Flybuster, and carried into St. Martin's, where the captain and three of his crew were imprisoned.—Ph. Gaz. 14th March.

22. The Friends, of Norfolk, from London, was captured by a French privateer, and carried into Guadaloupe. The vessel was condemned, and the captain and crew imprisoned. The captain was afterwards, with four others, sent to Martinique, to be exchanged for Frenchmen.—Ph. Gaz. 24th Feb. and 15th March.

23. Captain Church informs, that the French take all American vessels bound to or from English ports, and behave in a most scandalous manner to the captains and crews, by putting them in jail, or turning them on shore without the means of procuring even a meal.—Ph. Gaz. 10th March.

24. Captain Calvert says the treatment of Victor Hugues to the Americans is very cruel. They are thrown into prison, loaded with irons, stripped of their apparel, and scarcely allowed a miserable subsistence.—Ph. Gaz. 25th March.

25. From every one of the unfortunate Americans who were exchanged at Martinique for Frenchmen, accounts were given of the conduct of Victor Hugues towards their countrymen. Americans were dying at Guadaloupe in greater numbers than ever was known on board the Jersey prison ship at New York, during the late American war. Gaz. U. S. April 1.

26. The brig Fanny, Gould, of Biddeford, was cleared out for Leogane, a French port in Hispaniola, with lumber only, with a regular sea letter, register and clearance; nevertheless she was taken by a French national cutter, and carried into Port de Paix. The papers were carried to the Cape, and the vessel and cargo soon afterwards condemned, on the plea, that the vessel was deficient of certificates of her cargo in the usual style from the officers of the port whence she sailed, agreably to treaty. The captain and crew were deprived of their adventures, clothes, &c. thrown into jail among common thieves and murderers, put into irons, and allowed only four ounces of beef, and half a pound of bread per day for their subsistence, in which confinement they were continued for twenty days. The preceding facts were sworn to before justice Barret, of Boston.—See Ph. Gaz. 6th April.

27. Mr. Molay, supercargo of the Ann and Maria, of Baltimore, informs that she was taken on her homeward bound passage from Jamaica, by a French privateer, and carried into St. Jago de Cuba, where (the captain of the privateer having bribed two of the hands to swear she was British property) she was condemned, with her cargo, without even the semblance of a trial; and that her cargo being immediately landed, ports were knocked into her, and she was sent out on a cruise as a French privateer.—Ph. Gaz. 19th Jan.

28. The administration take by force all American cargoes, without any mode of payment whatever, and likewise take all American vessels bound to or from English ports, and condemn them without a hearing.—Extract of a letter from Cape François in the Gaz. U. S. 20th Jan.

29. The Government of this place seems determined to lay every obstacle in the way of American commerce. It now not only refuses paying old debts, but contracts (if it can be so called) new ones, without so much as a promise of ever paying; its armed vessels have sent in all Americans bound to or from any British ports, either in this island, or real English colonies, which have been condemned without so much as even the ceremonies of a trial. Such as have come here of their own accord, have had their cargoes taken by force; some have abandoned their vessels, and gone home, depending, as I suppose, upon the insurers for indemnification; others, whose cargoes have been partly taken, stay, but to no purpose.—Extract of another letter from the same place, ibid.

30. Schooner Phœbe, Webb, was taken on her passage from New London to Jeremie, and carried to Petit Guave, where she was detained ninety days, and the greatest part of her cargo taken, without a trial: they even refused giving a receipt for what property they took, and the commissaries refused Captain Webb provisions to subsist his sick people.—Phil. Gaz. 24th Jan. 1797.

31. There were lying at Petit Guave, on the 10th November, seven American vessels, which had been captured, in pursuance of orders issued by the commissioners at the Cape, making all Americans bound to or from British ports, lawful prize. They had been lying there from two to three months, during which time their cargoes were taken from them, without the form of a trial: more than three-fourths of the men (captains and sailors) fell a sacrifice to the fever, and the remaining fourth were more like walking ghosts than men; most of them destitute of money, and unable to give a decent burial to those who die. A few days before, one Gaston, a mulatto, at the head of the administration of the place, enticed a Philadelphia schooner, lying at Leogane with flour, to come to Petit Guave, by promising the captain, upon his sacred word of honor, that he would take nothing from him. But he had no sooner arrived than Gaston ordered a guard on board the vessel, and took away the flour. There were then lying in the several ports of the Bite fifty-one sail of Americans, which had been brought in by privateers; and at a moderate computation, half of their crews had died.—Phil. Gaz. 15th Feb. 1797.

32. The brig Susan and Polly, of and from New York, bound to Jamaica, was taken by a French privateer, and carried to Port de Paix. She was condemned, with her cargo, without the form of a trial, by Santhonax, who declared it was unnecessary to ask any questions, as the French Directory had given positive instructions to seize every American vessel bound to or from British ports. Thirty-five sail of American vessels were condemned and sold in the same port, in the same manner, within a few days afterwards.—Gaz. U. S. 22d Feb.

33. The snow Endeavor, Freeman, was bound from St. Croix to Aux Cayes, but was forbidden to enter by two British armed vessels. Soon afterwards, she was taken by two French armed boats, and sent into Gonaives, where the crew were insultingly turned on shore without the means of subsistence, and would have suffered but for the assistance they received from their American brethren there. The vessel and cargo were condemned and sold, with scarcely the ceremony of a trial. Some days after being sent on shore, Captain Freeman returned to his vessel, for the purpose of shifting his clothing, which was not only refused him, but threats were uttered against his life: and he found it necessary to leap into his boat, to prevent the execution of their designs. Two of his crew, having afterwards gone on board for a similar purpose, they were mangled in a most shocking manner, and one of them was mortally wounded.—Phil. Gaz. 25th March.

34. "From every American vessel that arrives at Cape François, the cargo is forcibly taken by the administration, who promise payment, apparently without any intention of performing, as cargoes thus forcibly taken remain yet unpaid, though many months have elapsed. When remonstrances are made, nothing but persecution results from it. From Captain Barney, of the Medusa frigate, being a native American, the captains of American vessels had reason to suppose he would rather have wished to alleviate their sufferings; but to persecution he added insult, not only to the American captains there, but to their country, by ignominiously hoisting its flag reversed on board his frigate."

No. 6.

Extract of a letter from Rufus King, Esq. Minister of the United States in London, enclosing the protest of William Martin, Master of the Cincinnatus, of Baltimore, relative to the torture inflicted upon said Martin by a French cruiser; dated April 19, 1797.

"Hitherto the captures in Europe have not been numerous, though several of our valuable ships have been carried into France, and in a few instances the masters and other officers of our vessels have been treated in a barbarous and cruel manner by the French cruisers, who have put them to the torture, in order to compel them to make such declarations relative to the property and destination of their ships and cargoes as were desired. Enclosed I send you the protest of William Martin, master of the Cincinnatus, of Baltimore, who lately arrived here, after having fallen into the hands of a French cruiser, which obliged him to leave his own vessel, and to go on board the cruiser, when he was tortured for more than three hours. Captain Martin's thumbs, which I examined, bear the marks of the screws, and the scars will go with him to the grave.

"It is impossible that these barbarous outrages should be authorized; indeed, the concealment observed by the perpetrators of them, who refused to tell their names, or the port of their equipment, evince that they are not so."

By this public instrument of protest, be it known and made manifest to all people whom it doth or may concern, that on the 26th day of March last, before me, James Gravener, notary and tabellion public, residing in the town and port of Dover, in the county of Kent, by lawful authority admitted and sworn, personally appeared William Martin, master of the ship or vessel called the Cincinnatus, belonging to Baltimore, in America, of the burthen of two hundred and twenty-nine tons, or thereabouts, then and now lying in Dover harbor, and entered a protest in due form; and that on this third day of April, 1797, again personally appeared the said William Martin, together with Eugene Sweeny, mate, and Robert Jackson, mariner, also belonging to the said vessel, and upon their faith and honesty solemnly declared, and for truth affirmed and witnessed, that the said vessel, on the proceed of her present intended voyage from Baltimore aforesaid, laden with a cargo of sundry merchandise, bound to London, met with hard gales of wind and high seas, therein sustained loss and damage, and was obliged to put into Galway road, as by reference to a protest made thereon, and dated the 19th day of January last, more fully appears; that they were detained in the said road repairing and reinstating their loss and damage, and with hard gales of wind unfavorable to proceed on their voyage, until the 15th day of February following, when they got under way, and put to sea with light winds and variable, and prosecuted their voyage with variable, contrary, and stormy winds and weather, without any particular circumstance occurring until the 28th, when they had a hard gale at south by west, in which the said vessel labored very heavily, and was almost constantly under water, and they were obliged to pump every half hour, and the quarter-block strap of the fore yard was carried away; that they proceeded their voyage with southwardly winds, and on the 2d day of March it blew a violent gale at south, in which the said vessel labored excessive hard, and shipped so much water, that the main deck was almost constantly covered therewith, and the said vessel's pumps were obliged to be kept going every quarter of an hour; that on the next day, at six o'clock in the evening, the gale and sea continuing, the said vessel made so much water that they were obliged to pump constantly, and at eight o'clock a sea struck her abaft, stove in one of the dead lights, filled the cabin with water, (so that they were obliged to lade it out with buckets) and carried away part of the quarter boards, and stove the skylight; that on the 4th the weather became moderate, with the wind to the eastward, and from that to the northward, with which they proceeded, meeting no particular occurrence until the 7th, about nine o'clock in the morning, when, being in north latitude about 50° 35′, they were boarded by a French armed brig, under English colors, who took the said master, with five of his crew, from the said ship on board the said brig. And the said master for himself now saith that the officer and crew of the latter vessel examined the papers, respecting his said vessel and her lading, and expressed no doubt that the ship was an American, but insisted the cargo to be English property, and assured him, if he would acknowledge it to be so, his full freight should be paid, and he have a present of one thousand pounds, which overtures the said master would not pay any other attention to than declaring the whole property to belong solely to Aquilla Brown, of Baltimore aforesaid, merchant—Whereupon the French officers thumbscrewed the said master in the cabin of their said brig, kept him in torture to extort a declaration that the said cargo was English property, for nearly four hours, but without having its desired effect; when a vessel heaving in sight he was liberated from the barbarous punishment he had undergone, and shortly afterwards the last mentioned vessel was captured by the said brig, and proved to be the Diana of Lancaster, Captain Derbyshire, from St. Thomas bound to Lancaster; and on the eighth about five o'clock in the evening, the said master with the said five of his crew, together with fourteen of the crew of the said captured vessel were put on board the said appearer's vessel, which was permitted to proceed; but the said master, on being sent from the said brig, requested the captain to give him some provisions to supply the said fourteen men with, but he would allow them only about forty pounds of bread, saying they would soon have a fair wind: the said appearer's vessel was then in latitude 50°, longitude 14°, 27′, and they accordingly proceeded with the wind southwardly. And the said Eugene Sweeney, mate, for himself, now saith, that while the said master was so detained on board the said French brig, the captain and first lieutenant therof, with some of their crew came on board the said appearer's vessel, broke open and plundered the captain's chest of a purse containing several guineas, a gold watch, sextant, great part of his wearing apparel, stole a spying glass, speaking trumpet, eleven bags of coffee, broke open two boxes of sugar, and stole therefrom several bags, and robbed them also of their boat. And further, that the said French captain and lieutenant showed the now attestant a note, as under the hand of the master of his said ship, signifying that he the said master acknowledged the cargo to be English property, and that he the said mate was to do the same; but this he would by no means comply with; and, at the same time, perceived the note to be forged, and violent threats were made use of towards him, the said mate, to produce such acknowledgment, which he persisted in not doing, as contrary to the truth; and the said Robert Jackson, for himself, now saith that while on board the said brig, twenty pieces of gold (which he supposed to be joes) were offered to one of the crew to declare the said vessel's cargo was English property. And all the said appearers again declare that they still prosecuted their voyage, and, on the eleventh, being in latitude 49°, in consequence of the number of men on board, they were reduced to a biscuit a man per day. That, on the twelfth, it was dark and squally weather, and at two o'clock in the afternoon, in a sudden squall, their said vessel was hove down on her beam ends, and the bowsprit carried away, when they were obliged, for the safety of their lives, and preservation of the said vessel, and cargo, to cut away the rigging belonging to the bow-sprit jib boom, and the topsail sheets, by which she fortunately righted, and, then, to clear the wreck and secure the foremast, they were obliged to bear away before the wind, which being accomplished, they, to avoid further damage, were obliged to cut away the bowsprit (the same beating against the said vessel's bows) with all the rigging of their bowsprit and jib boom, and the jib and foretopmast stay sail and sprit sail yard, and endeavouring to secure the foremast, they found the foretopmast and main yard were sprung, in consequence of her having been laid down on her beam ends, as aforesaid, when they immediately used every exertion possible to get down the foretopmast, to rig up a jury one in its stead, and also in rigging out a jury bowsprit, the weather then continuing boisterous. That, on the thirteenth, it blew a gale of wind at east by north, when they finished a temporary bowsprit out of a spare topmast, and a fore topmast out of a spare mizen topmast, and proceeded on the voyage. That, on the fourteenth, they had a hard gale of wind at the last mentioned quarter, attended with a heavy sea, which broke over the said vessel incessantly, and they were obliged to pump every quarter of an hour, and were then still under short allowance. That, on the fifteenth, they spoke a Swedish brig, which supplied them with a bag of bread, two pieces of beef, and a few stock fish, and had then the wind eastwardly, which was contrary, and, on the sixteenth, they were supplied from another brig with two bags of bread, some peas and wine, on payment, and proceeded their voyage, with variable winds and weather, without any particular circumstances happening, until the twenty-second, when, being in latitude 48° 23′, they were boarded by His Britannic Majesty's ship Galatea, the officers of which pressed from the said appearer's vessel the said fourteen men, three passengers, and one of their own crew, and supplied the said appearers with provisions, when they continued the pursuit of the voyage, with the wind southwardly. And, on the twenty-third, had sounding in seventy-five fathoms, and proceeded the channel course, with the wind continuing southwardly, with hazy weather. And, on the twenty-fourth, in the evening, the Lizard lights bore north northeast, distant about five leagues. That, on the twenty-fifth, in the morning, Portland lights bore northeast by east, distant three leagues. And, on the same day, it began to blow hard, which increased to a gale, and, in the afternoon, being off Beachy Head, with the weather continuing very thick and hazy, they, upon consultation on the state and condition of the said vessel, adjudged it most expedient for the safety of their lives, and preservation of her and her cargo, to put into the first port of safety, to refit, that they might be enabled safely to proceed to their place of destination, and accordingly hoisted a signal for a pilot, and assistance to take charge of the said vessel, for the purpose of conducting her to such said port of safety; and, about four o'clock, they procured a pilot and assistance from a cutter which came alongside, whom the said master employed for the purpose aforesaid; but, the weather being hazy, and night time coming on, they laid off and on until the said twenty-sixth at 5 o'clock in the morning, when they bore away for Dover harbor, and at ten o'clok in the forenoon, on arriving at the entrance of the same, the said vessel was, by the strong tide and swell forced against the north Pier Head, whereby the figure head, rails, cutwater, and bow, were damaged; and the anchor hooking the head, and having a long range of the cable, the same run out nearly thirty fathom, which, stopping the said vessel, and she then touching the ground, they were obliged, for the purpose of preventing her laying thereon, to cut the cable the length it had so run out, by doing of which, and with the utmost exertions on board, and assistance on shore, she was hove from the dangerous place she was likely to lay on, and into safety; and, also, the said appearers declare, that they have used their utmost endeavors for the preservation of the said vessel and cargo; that whatever damage or loss the same have already sustained, or may hereafter sustain, was not occasioned by, or through any neglect, or default of them, or any of the crew, or by reason of any defect or default in the said vessel, or her tackling; but merely by means of the circumstances before stated. Therefore, the said master hath desired a protest; wherefore, I, the said notary, at his request, have solemnly protested, and, by these presents, do protest, against the wind, weather, and sea, the officers and crew of the said French brig, (whose names, together with the name of their said vessel, is unknown to these appearers, or to their belief to any of their crew) and every other person and cause occasioning the said vessels damage and loss of, and for all losses, costs, charges, damages, and expenses already and hereafter to be suffered and sustained, to be allowed and recovered in time and place convenient. Thus done and protested in Dover aforesaid, in the presence of Robert Steriker and Thomas Paine, witnesses thereto called and requested.

In testimony of the truth whereof, the said appearers and witnesses subscribed their names in the registry of me, the said notary; and, I, the said notary, have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my notarial seal, dated the day and year second above written.

JAMES GRAVENER, [L. S.]

And I, James Gravener, a master extraordinary in His Majesty's high court of chancery, do hereby certify, that the said William Martin, Eugene Sweeney, and Robert Jackson, were duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists to the truth of the aforegoing protest, at Dover aforesaid, the said 3d day of April, 1797, before me.

JAMES GRAVENER.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 126. [1st SESSION.

ALGIERS.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JUNE 24, 1797.

UNITED STATES, June 23, 1797.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The Dey of Algiers has manifested a predilection for American built vessels, and, in consequence, has desired that two vessels might be constructed and equipped as cruisers, according to the choice and taste of Captain O'Brien. The cost of two such vessels, built with live oak and cedar, and coppered, with guns and all other equipments complete, is estimated at forty-five thousand dollars. The expense of navigating them to Algiers may, perhaps, be compensated by the freight of the stores with which they may be loaded, on account of our stipulations by treaty with the Dey.

A compliance with the Dey's request appears to me to be of serious importance; he will repay the whole expense of building and equipping the two vessels; and as he has advanced the price of our peace with Tripoli, and become pledged for that of Tunis, the United States seem to be under peculiar obligations to provide this accommodation; and I trust that Congress will authorize the advance of money necessary for that purpose.

It also appears to be of importance to place at Algiers a person, as consul, in whose integrity and ability much confidence may be placed, to whom a considerable latitude of discretion should be allowed, for the interest of the United States in relation to their commerce. That country is so remote, as to render it impracticable for the consul to ask and receive instructions in sudden emergencies. He may sometimes find it necessary to make instant engagements for money, or its equivalent, to prevent greater expenses or more serious evils. We can hardly hope to escape occasions of discontent, proceeding from the regency, or arising from the misconduct, or even the misfortunes, of our commercial vessels navigating in the Mediterranean sea; and, unless the causes of discontent are speedily removed, the resentment of the regency may be exerted with precipitation on our defenceless citizens, and their property, and thus occasion a tenfold expense to the United States. For these reasons, it appears to me to be expedient to vest the consul at Algiers with a degree of discretionary power, which can be requisite in no other situation. And, to encourage a person, deserving public confidence, to accept so expensive and responsible a situation, it appears indispensable to allow him a handsome salary. I should confer on such a consul, a superintending power over the consulates for the States of Tunis and Tripoli, especially in respect to pecuniary engagements, which should not be made without his approbation.

While the present salary of two thousand dollars a year appears adequate to the consulates of Tunis and Tripoli, twice that sum probably will be requisite for Algiers.

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JULY 3, 1797.

UNITED STATES, July 3d, 1797.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and
Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The whole of the intelligence which has for some time past been received from abroad, the correspondences between this Government and the ministers of the belligerent Powers residing here, and the advices from the officers of the United States, civil and military, upon the frontiers, all conspire to show in a very strong light the critical situation of our country. That Congress might be enabled to form a more perfect judgment of it, and of the measures necessary to be taken, I have directed the proper officers to prepare such collections of extracts from the public correspondences as might afford the clearest information. The reports made to me from the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War, with a collection of documents from each of them, are now communicated to both Houses of Congress. I have desired that the message, reports, and documents may be considered as confidential, merely that the members of both Houses of Congress may be apprized of their contents before they should be made public. As soon as the Houses shall have heard them, I shall submit to their discretion the publication of the whole, or any such parts of them, as they shall judge necessary or expedient for the public good.

JOHN ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 3, 1797.

Additional report of the Secretary of State to the President of the United States, of the proceedings of the officers of His Catholic Majesty in relation to the posts occupied by his troops within the limits of the United States, the boundary line, and other matters therewith connected.

On Thursday last, the 29th of June, I received further despatches from Andrew Ellicott, Esq. the commissioner of the United States at the Natchez, dated the 10th of May last, of which an extract and copies, numbered 1, 2, and 3, are subjoined. By these it appears that a new motive has been assigned by the commander in chief, Baron de Carondelet, and Governor Gayoso, for still retaining the possession of the posts of the Natchez and the Walnut Hills, and for strengthening the fortifications, viz: to guard against an attack by the British from Canada. This motive being derived from information communicated to the Baron de Carondelet by the Chevalier de Yrujo, the minister of His Catholic Majesty to the United States, it appears necessary again to bring before the President my correspondence with the Spanish and British ministers on that subject. These papers are numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9.

Although the minister declared he had just reasons for suspecting an expedition from Canada was preparing by the British against the upper posts of Louisiana, yet he never mentioned a single fact or reason on which his suspicion was founded. From all the existing circumstances, I ever believed the suspicion to be groundless. And the note of Mr. Liston, the British minister, of the 19th of the last month, declares that no such expedition has been, or is intended, by the British Government.

On the 16th of March last, by the President's direction, I inquired of the minister of His Catholic Majesty whether the Spanish troops had been withdrawn, agreeably to the treaty, from the territory of the United States; and if not, what orders or measures for withdrawing them had been taken. To this the minister answered, on the 17th of April, that not having for some months heard from the Baron de Carondelet, he was "deprived of any information touching the steps taken for the execution of the treaty." Nevertheless he had previously informed the Baron de Carondelet of his suspicions of a projected expedition from Canada; for on the 1st of May it is offered by Governor Gayoso, as a new reason for continuing to hold the posts. These two letters are numbered 10, 11.

On the 24th of June last, the minister of His Catholic Majesty wrote me the letter numbered 12, in which he undertakes to give the substance of two letters from the Baron de Carondelet, and which about a week before he had orally translated to me from the Spanish originals. These letters (as appears by the detail of them now given by the minister) exhibited divers complaints against Mr. Ellicott, whose conduct is assigned as the cause of an alleged misunderstanding between him and Governor Gayoso; and of the delay in commencing the running of the boundary line.

One article, however, the minister has omitted in his recital. The Baron de Carondelet complained, among other things, that Mr. Ellicott had not given him notice of his arrival at the Natchez, as the commissioner on the part of the United States for running the boundary line between their territories and those of Spain. I was astonished at this complaint, as I had then lying on my table a copy of Mr. Ellicott's letter to the Baron, dated the 27th of February, only three days after Mr. Ellicott's arrival at the Natchez, announcing his arrival as the commissioner of the United States for the object above expressed, and two copies of the Baron's answer, dated at New Orleans, the 1st of March, one of the original Spanish, and the other a translation in English, acknowledging the receipt of Mr. Ellicott's letter, and "congratulating him on his arrival in that country in the character of commissioner on the part of the United States, to run the dividing line between the territories of His most Catholic Majesty and the United States." I immediately presented those copies to the minister, in whom the repugnance of fact to assertion excited the natural sensation; but soon recollecting himself, he made this apology for the Baron, that he supposed he did not consider Mr. Ellicott's letter as official! This letter, and the translation of the Baron's answer, have been already laid before Congress and published. I now subjoin the copy of the Baron's answer in Spanish, No. 13.

The facts I have here stated relative to the complaint of the Baron de Carondelet, which the Spanish minister has omitted in his detail, appeared to me important to be laid before you, to be considered together with the other complaints which the minister has recited. As to the complaint that Mr. Ellicott "attempted to get possession of the Natchez fort by surprise, and that the Governor Gayoso has in his power documents which evidently prove the intention of that attempt," I have examined the two gentlemen who have brought Mr. Ellicott's despatches, and they declare that they never heard of such an attempt being made or intended by Mr. Ellicott, and that far from exciting dissatisfaction to the Spanish Government, in the minds of the inhabitants at the Natchez, he uniformly recommended patience and submission, until the Spanish jurisdiction should be withdrawn.

Upon a view of the whole correspondence now and before submitted to the President, it appears that the Governors of His Catholic Majesty on the Mississippi have, on various pretences, postponed the running of the boundary line, and the withdrawing of his troops from the posts they occupied within the territory of the United States; that, after repeated overtures, promises, and appearances of commencing the execution of the treaty between the two nations, in both those respects, their conduct demonstrates that for an indefinite period they mean to avoid doing either; that there is but too much reason to believe Mr. Ellicott's suspicions well founded, that an undue influence has been exercised over the Indians by the officers of His Catholic Majesty to prepare them for a rupture with the United States, those suspicions corresponding with other intelligence recently received by the Secretary of War and by me. Mine is by a private letter from Colonel Sargent, the Secretary of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, of which an extract, No. 14, is annexed.

Whether this plan of exciting the Indians to direct hostilities against the United States, has been contemplated and promoted by any of our own citizens, it may be difficult to say; but that one or more of those citizens have proposed and taken measures to detach the southern Indians from the interests of the United States, and to destroy the influence of the public agents over those nations, and thus to defeat the great objects of their appointment, the chief of which is to preserve peace, is certain. The evidence of this important fact will be laid before you by the Secretary of War. That evidence having a reference to the British minister and his Government, I took the liberty of addressing to him a letter, dated the 1st instant, No. 15, to which I received the answer, No. 16.

As closely connected with this business, I lay before you the copy of my letter No. 17, dated the 27th of April last, to Charles Jackson, Esquire, the district attorney of Georgia, reciting a passage in a letter from the Spanish minister dated the 21st of April, declaring his positive knowledge that the English had made propositions to General Clarke of Georgia, to obtain his influence in that State, in conjunction with some persons who might make a diversion or serious attack against Florida. By Mr. Jackson's answer, from which an extract, No. 18, is herewith presented, it appears that after diligent inquiry, he could not find any person that knew any thing of the business, or that entertained a belief of the kind; and that from General Clarke's known violent antipathies to the English, and other circumstances, he doubted the truth of the report altogether.

On the 30th ult. I received a letter from General Pinckney, dated the 9th of May, which contains the latest intelligence from him, and seems proper to accompany the other papers now laid before you. His letter, No. 15, therein referred to, has not yet come to hand. All which is respectfully submitted.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 1.

Extract of a letter from Andrew Ellicott, Esq. commissioner of the United States, to the Secretary of State, dated

NATCHEZ, May 10, 1797.

SIR:

Since my despatches by Mr. Knox, the whole of the Spanish commission for the purpose of running the boundary lines between the territory of His Catholic Majesty, and that of the United States has arrived; but notwithstanding this circumstance, I see no appearance of getting to business in any reasonable time; various pretences are resorted to by the Baron de Carondelet and Governor Gayoso to justify the delay; but the true reason, I am well persuaded, has never yet been made known to myself, or to the inhabitants of the district of Natchez, who are generally very uneasy, and many of them consider their situations as desperate if not supported in a few months by the United States.

As the arrival of the whole Spanish commission produced no effect favorable to our business, I expected that of Lieutenant Pope with a detachment of about forty troops, which happened on the 24th of last month, would make some change for the better; in this I have been disappointed. Additional laborers were set to work in the fort, and several more pieces of artillery mounted.

On the first of this month, I received a letter from Governor Gayoso, a copy of which, with the answer, you will find enclosed.

On Sunday last, the fort at this place was reinforced by about forty men, and a company of grenadiers are on their way, and hourly expected to join them. Yesterday Mr. Gillimard, the Spanish surveyor, an engineer, and several other military officers, with a boat load of intrenching tools, left this place for the Walnut Hills, where the works are to be immediately put into a complete state of defence. The laborers who were employed, by the direction of Governor Gayoso, to go on the line, are now ordered to the Walnut Hills, to assist in repairing the fortifications.

If the court of Madrid has any design of carrying the late treaty with the United States into effect, the conduct of the Baron de Carondelet and Governor Gayoso is to me altogether inexplicable; all their measures have the appearance of approaching hostility; and from some information which I have lately received from a source to which I cannot avoid giving a degree of credit, but a short period will elapse before we shall be ordered to leave this place, if not the country. I have, in a former communication, mentioned my suspicions, that an undue influence has been exercised over the Indians to prepare them for a rupture with the United States, and to awe into a quiet submission the inhabitants of this district who are at their mercy. I am very sorry that no circumstance has yet occurred to make me change this opinion.

Immediately upon Mr. Pope's arrival, he was joined by Ensign M'Clary, who commands my escort, which consists of about thirty-seven men, and all encamped with me. We now make a respectable appearance—the men are in good health, and well clothed, and the strictest discipline is observed by the whole camp. Lieutenant Pope has hitherto conducted himself in such a manner as to give general satisfaction to the neighboring inhabitants, without incurring the displeasure of the present governor, or his officers, and at the same time steadily supported the honor of the United States; but he has unfortunately been indisposed almost ever since his arrival.

I am, sir, with great esteem, &c.

ANDREW ELLICOTT.

SECRETARY OF STATE, United States.

No. 2.

Manuel Gayoso de Lemos to the Honorable Andrew Ellicott.

NATCHEZ, May 1, 1797.

SIR:

I have the honor to acquaint you, that the Commander-general of this province desires me to inform you that His Majesty's envoy in the United States has given him the intelligence of an attack proposed against our part of the Illinois, by the British from Canada; and as such an expedition cannot take place without passing through the territory of the United States, said envoy did officially communicate what was necessary, to the Secretary of State of the United States, requiring that convenient orders should be issued to have their territory respected and provide for their own safety, which we doubt not but the United States will acquiesce to, in consequence of the treaty and the good harmony that subsists between the United States of America and His Majesty.

The said Commander-general of this province, in consequence of the foregoing information, finds himself under the necessity of putting in a state of defence several points of this river, and particularly Nogales,* to cover Lower Louisiana, in case the British should succeed in their project against Illinois, for which purpose a convenient force shall be sent to Nogales, to repair and defend that post, which, far from being against the interest of the United States of America, will, in case of being agreed to, leave the military posts in that state of defence which it may be found.

As this is a powerful reason in addition to those that offered before to suspend the evacuation of these posts and of running the line; as our attention is entirely drawn towards the defence of the province, the said Commander-general orders me to pass to you this official communication, and, in consequence of the unavoidable delay, to repeat to you, in his name, the proposal of remaining here to go down to Lower Louisiana; or, as he thinks might be preferable to remove to Villa Gayoso, where there are sufficient buildings to accommodate you; this insinuation being an effect of the desire we have to show every degree of consideration as a proof of our disposition to improve the friendship between our nations, assuring you that in any part that you should determine to remove to, or stay, the Commander-general will facilitate every conveniency in his power for your satisfaction.

I have the honor to be, &c.

MANUEL GAYOSO DE LEMOS.

SIR:

Your excellency's favor of yesterday is now before me, but as it principally concerns the commanding officer of the troops of the United States in this quarter, who, I presume, will give you a satisfactory answer, it will therefore be unnecessary for me to make any remarks upon it.

In a former communication you were apprized of my determination to remain at this place until we proceed to running of the line, or recalled by the Executive of the United States.

I am, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, March 2, 1797.

SIR:

Three days ago I declared to you the just reasons which I had for suspecting that an expedition was preparing on the lakes, on the part of the English, the object of which is to attack Upper Louisiana, and take by surprise the posts of St. Louis and New Madrid. The proofs which I have since been able to obtain confirm me in my suspicion that the English troops who meditate this coup-de-main, intend to descend the Mississippi by Fox River, Onisconsin, or by the Illinois or other parts of the territory of the United States. I suppose the Government of this country too jealous of its rights to suffer so scandalous a violation of its territory; but having always in view the interests of the King my master, and the security of his possessions in this part of the world, in his name I request, sir, that in virtue of the information cited, this Government may take the measures necessary for preventing the passage of foreign troops, of what description soever, over its territory. An undertaking in which are united the dignity of the United States, and the security of the possessions of a friendly nation, assures me beforehand that the administration of this country will take the measures which shall be most adapted to this end.

With these reasons, I offer myself to your disposal, and pray God to preserve you many years.

Your most obedient humble servant,

CHARLES MARTINEZ DE YRUJO.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 11, 1797.

SIR:

I have laid before the President of the United States your letter of the 2d instant, mentioning your suspicions, that an expedition is preparing on the lakes, on the part of the English; the object of which is to attack Upper Louisiana, and to take by surprise the posts of St. Louis and New Madrid; and that to accomplish this object, the English troops intend to pass by the routes you mention, or by other parts of the territory of the United States: and you request their Government to take the necessary measures to prevent such a violation of their territory.

First remarking, that the Government of the United States possess no information, nor the knowledge of any circumstances indicative of such a design as that you suspect, I have the honor to assure you that, true to the principles of an impartial neutrality to which the United States have hitherto invariably adhered, their Government will be anxious to maintain the rights of their neutral situation, and on all occasions adopt and pursue those measures which shall appear proper and expedient for that end.

I am, with great respect, &c.

PHILADELPHIA, April 21, 1797.

SIR:

Whilst I possess new reasons for believing that it is intended to carry into effect the expedition against Upper Louisiana, on the part of the English, by violating the territory of the United States, as was manifested to you in my letter of the 2d March last, I must add, that I know to a certainty that the English have made propositions to General Clarke of Georgia, in order to avail themselves of his influence in that State, together with some other persons, for making a diversion or serious attack against Florida; and as, by your letter of the 11th of the last month, you assure me that the United States would take the necessary measures for causing their neutrality to be respected, I do not doubt that, in consequence of this my information, the Executive Government will take the proper steps, in order that Georgia also should not infringe the laws of neutrality to the injury of the possessions of the King my master.

I embrace this opportunity to renew to you my wishes to serve you, and that God may preserve your life many years.

Your most obedient servant,

Timothy Pickering to the Chevalier de Yrujo, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PHILADELPHIA, April 28, 1797.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st instant, repeating your suspicions that it is intended to carry into effect an expedition, on the part of the English, against Upper Louisiana, through the territory of the United States; and adding that you know to a certainty that the English have made propositions to General Clarke, in Georgia, to obtain his influence in that State, with a view to a diversion or serious attack against Florida.

To the first point I have the honor to answer that, although this Government is still destitute of any knowledge of facts or circumstances indicating that an expedition on the part of the English against Upper Louisiana has been projected, yet desirous of living on terms of amity with our neighbors, on one side and the other, agreeably to subsisting treaties, I have communicated to the minister of His Britannic Majesty, for the information of his Government, the suspicions you have expressed of an intended expedition against Upper Louisiana, and the declaration of the President of the United States, that he cannot consent that either should march troops through the territory of the United States to attack the other. The sense of the American Government being thus declared beforehand, we cannot presume that a measure will be undertaken which cannot be prosecuted without a violation of our neutral rights.

With regard to the project of an expedition by the British against Florida, with the aid of General Clarke, and of persons whom he might influence, I have to inform you that orders have been forwarded to the district attorney of Georgia, to inquire into the fact as stated by you, and if discovery should be made of designs to violate our neutral duties, and especially of forming an expedition against the territories of His Catholic Majesty from the territory of the United States, to take the most proper and effectual measures for frustrating such designs; and if the same should be manifested by any overt acts, to cause the offenders to be arrested and brought to condign punishment.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

No. 8.

Timothy Pickering to Robert Liston, Esquire, Envoy Extraordinary, &c. of His Britannic Majesty.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PHILADELPHIA, April 28, 1797.

SIR:

The minister of His Catholic Majesty, early in March last, represented to this Government his suspicions that an expedition was preparing on the lakes, on the part of the English, whose object was an attack on the Spanish posts in Upper Louisiana, by a route through the territory of the United States, and requested the Government to take measures necessary to prevent such a violation of their territory.

In answer to the Spanish minister, after the remark that the Government of the United States had no knowledge of any circumstances indicative of the design he suspected, he was assured that, true to the principles of an impartial neutrality, to which the United States have hitherto invariably adhered, their Government would be anxious to maintain the rights of their neutral situation, and on all occasions adopt and pursue the measures which should appear proper and expedient to that end.

His Catholic Majesty's minister having lately renewed his representation, declaring that he had recent ground to believe that it is intended to carry into effect the expedition before mentioned against Upper Louisiana, through the territory of the United States, I am directed by the President of the United States to make to you this communication, and to declare that, desirous of living on terms of amity with their neighbors, on one side and the other, agreeably to subsisting treaties, he cannot consent that either should march troops through the territory of the United States to attack the other.

The sense and motives of the American Government being thus expressed, I doubt not the same will be duly respected on the part of the British Government; and without judging whether suspicions of His Catholic Majesty's minister are or are not founded, I am persuaded that the declaration now made will be considered as a proof of our good will, by preventing the great expense of preparations for an enterprise which cannot be prosecuted without occasioning a violation of the neutral rights or duties of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. Liston presents his respects to Colonel Pickering, Secretary of State:

When you first mentioned to me the suspicions expressed by the Spanish minister, respecting an expedition supposed to be preparing on the lakes, with a view to attack the Spanish posts in Louisiana, I took the liberty of observing to you that I had no knowledge of any such preparations, and did not believe that they existed.

I have since requested information on the subject from the Governor General of Canada, and from His Majesty's Secretary of State; and I have authority to assure you that no expedition of the nature of that alluded to has been, or is, intended by the British Government. Indeed, the impropriety of violating the neutral territory of the United States is an objection of sufficient magnitude to induce the King's ministers to reject any such plan, were it suggested to them.

SIR:

The second article of the treaty between the United States and His Catholic Majesty stipulated "that, if there should be any troops, garrisons, or settlements, of either party in the territory of the other, (according to the boundaries fixed by the same article) they should be withdrawn from the said territory within the term of six months after the ratification of that treaty, or sooner if it were possible." The United States have no troops, garrisons, or settlements, within the territory of His Catholic Majesty. We do not know whether those of His Catholic Majesty within the United States' territory at the time the treaty above mentioned was made, have been since withdrawn. I am, therefore, directed by the President to inquire, and do request you to inform me, what is the fact; and, if those troops, &c. have not been withdrawn, what orders or measures for their withdrawing have been taken. It is now near eleven months since the ratification and exchange of the treaty took place.

SIR:

Although I received, in due time, the letter which you did me the honor to write to me on the 16th ult. an indisposition, from which I am not yet altogether recovered, prevented me from replying to the inquiry you make relative to the evacuation of the Spanish posts within the new line of demarcation of limits. I now take up my pen to inform you that several months have elapsed since I have received a letter from the Baron de Carondelet, and, of course, I am deprived of any information touching the steps taken for the execution of the treaty.

I offer myself to your disposal, praying God to preserve your life many years.

Your most obedient servant,

CARLOS M. DE YRUJO.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq.

No. 12.

PHILADELPHIA, June 24, 1797.

Eight or ten days ago, I made known to you the information which I had received from the Baron de Carondelet, relative to the occurrences at the Natchez, between the Governor, Don Manuel Gayoso de Lemos, and the commissioner of the United States, Mr. Ellicott; and being desirous, at this time, to avoid all equivocation as to the substance of those letters, I have determined to communicate it to you in writing.

By the 2d article of the treaty with Spain, it is stipulated that the garrisons which are found above the line of demarcation agreed on, shall be withdrawn. Setting out, then, with this principle, it appears that the first operation ought to be to draw this line, in order to know which were the garrisons which were to be withdrawn, according to the article cited; and, although the Natchez and some other Spanish posts are probably situated above the said line of demarcation, the formality and delicacy which one Government owes to another required that Mr. Ellicott should not pretend to take possession of the territory until the said demarcation should be made, and the more so as he had been informed officially that the Spanish engineer, M. Guillemard, was already on his way to fulfil this part of his commission.

Mr. Ellicott, not attending to these just observations, immediately began to wound the feelings of the Spanish commander, by hoisting the American flag on a territory which would not belong to the United States till after having jointly made the astronomical observations for ascertaining the course of the line. Not content with this, he began to exercise an authority which was unlawful, for the same reasons, to wit: that of recruiting for the United States in a place which was then under the jurisdiction of the Spanish Government.

These imprudences, which can admit of no excuse, gave rise to a personal resentment, from which there is little to hope with respect to harmony between those commissioners in future.

In these circumstances, the Governor General of the province, the Baron de Carondelet, made known the just doubts which he had about the delivery of the posts, since, in the 2d article, it is not stipulated that they were to be given up, and it seems that it could never have been the intention of His Catholic Majesty to deliver up any fortifications on which he had expended great sums of money, and which, through political vicissitudes, might, perhaps, be one day prejudicial to his subjects. In this situation, prudence required that the decision of this doubtful point should be left to the two Governments; but Mr. Ellicott, adding imprudence to imprudence, and with a pretext which a quarrel between some drunken Chickasaws and the people of his company afforded him, not only violated a territory then Spanish, by desiring to excite the inhabitants by all imaginable means, but also carried his zeal so far as to attempt to get possession of the fort of the Natchez by surprise. Governor Gayoso says he has in his power documents which prove evidently the intention of this attempt. Such conduct was little calculated to produce the spirit of harmony so necessary in such circumstances, and obliged Governor Gayoso, when he discovered such hostile intentions, to take, on his part, measures necessary for his defence.

This is the true state of things, by which it clearly appears that the inconsiderate conduct of Mr. Ellicott is the only cause of the disagreement at the Natchez; the more so, as the Spanish commanders declared to him that, while the two Governments were deciding on the doubt which occurred to the Baron de Carondelet, about the delivery of the posts, the drawing of the line of demarcation might be begun, when M. de Guillemard, who had already departed from New Orleans for the Natchez, should arrive.

If, in this situation of the business, the commanders changed their ideas or their measures, it could only proceed from the imprudent conduct of Mr. Ellicott. The Baron de Carondelet, desirous of observing religiously the treaty, so far as was not inconsistent with his duty, seeing the personal resentment which exists between Mr. Ellicott and Governor Gayoso, desires that there may be sent to command the detachment of American troops on that frontier a man of judgment and prudence, who, in such delicate circumstances, shall act with moderation, which is of so much importance to the two Governments.

This is what I have had the honor of communicating verbally to you, sir, in my last conference; and I repeat it now; recommending more particularly that there should be sent, on the part of the United States, to that frontier, a person of prudence and sound judgment, leaving to Mr. Ellicott the technical part only: for, while he acts as principal, it is to be feared that we shall not see the agents of the two Governments, which are interested, proceed with that union and harmony which is ever important to us.

I repeat, sir, my wishes of obliging you, and that our Lord may preserve your life many years.

Your most obedient servant,

Extract of a letter from Winthrop Sargent, Esq., Secretary of the Government of the Northwestern Territory, to the Secretary of State, dated

CINCINNATI, June 3, 1797.

General Wilkinson sending off an express, I seize the occasion to transcribe for you some paragraphs from a Western letter.

"The Spaniards are reinforcing their upper posts on the Mississippi considerably. General Howard, an Irishman, in the quality of Commander-in-chief, with upwards of three hundred men, arrived at St. Louis, and is employed in erecting very formidable works. It likewise appears, through various channels, that they are inviting a great number of Indians of the territory to cross the Mississippi, and, for this express purpose, Mr. Larromie, an officer in the pay of the crown, made a tour through all this country last fall, since which time several Indians have been sent on the same errand, and generally furnished with plenty of cash to defray their expenses."

"A large party of Delawares passed down White river, about the 6th of May, on their way to the Spanish side, bearing the national flag of Spain sent them from St. Louis."

"They (the Spaniards) have, above the mouth of the Ohio, on the Mississippi, several row galleys with cannon."

SIR:

Your note of the 19th of the last month, alluding to the suspicions expressed by the Spanish minister, respecting an expedition suggested to be preparing at the lakes, against the Spanish posts in Louisiana, I laid before the President of the United States, who received great satisfaction from your assurance that no such expedition has been or is intended by the British Government.

Will you permit me to inquire whether you can give any information concerning any other project of an expedition against any part of the dominions of Spain, adjacent to the territory of the United States, where or from whence any co-operation was contemplated? I am aware of the delicacy of this inquiry; but the frankness of your verbal answer, formerly, relating to the alleged expedition from Canada, and the assurances in your note above mentioned, lead me to hope that you will not deem the present inquiry improper, and the proofs you have uniformly given of respect to the rights and interests of the United States, authorize the further hope that you will feel yourself at liberty to communicate any information you may possess, which, on this occasion, may concern their tranquillity and welfare; and I beg you to be assured that it is on this ground only that I would make the inquiry. I will add, however, that it is not the result of suspicion, but of information, (in which your name is introduced) that some project of the kind has been contemplated; and that the means disposed to carry it into execution could not but be highly detrimental to the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT LISTON, Esq.,
Envoy Extraordinary, &c. from His Britannic Majesty to the United States.

No. 16.

R. Liston presents his respects to Colonel Pickering, Secretary of State:

I have had the honor of receiving your letter of yesterday. In the course of last winter some persons did actually propose to me a plan for an attack on the Floridas and the other possessions of His Catholic Majesty adjoining to the territories of the United States.

The general outline of the project was, that the expedition should be undertaken by a British force sent by sea, and seconded by a number of men resident within the limits of the United States, who, I was assured, would be willing to join the King's standard, if it were erected on the Spanish territory.

I informed the projectors that I could not give any encouragement to a plan of this nature; and I particularly stated two objections to it—the impropriety of any measure that tended to a violation of the neutrality of the United States, and the inhumanity of calling in the aid of the Indians, a circumstance hinted at in the conversation that had taken place on the subject.

I conceived it to be my duty, however, to mention the business in my correspondence with my superiors: and I lately received an answer, acquainting me that His Majesty's ministers did not think proper to give any countenance to the project. The two objections above alluded to (which I had of course insisted on in my report) are stated sufficient reasons for its rejection.

You must allow me, sir, to decline entering into any further particulars. On the one hand because, although I have all along suspected that the persons, who proposed the plan to me, might not improbably be employed by the enemies of Great Britain to endeavor with sinister views to insinuate themselves into my confidence, yet as these my surmises may be false, I should not be justified in betraying the secrets of men who may have meant me well: and on the other hand because, however loose the principles of these speculators may have been on the subject of the law of nations, (as it regards the duties of neutrality) none of them in their intercourse with me ever expressed sentiments that were in any degree hostile to the interests of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PHILADELPHIA, April 27, 1797.

SIR:

This week I received your letter expressing your acceptance of the office of district attorney for Georgia. I was gratified by the information; and hope your health may be re-established and enable you to continue to hold and exercise it.

Within a few days, the Spanish minister, the Chevalier d'Yrujo, has written me as follows:

"I know to a certainty, that the English have made propositions to General Clarke, of Georgia, in order to obtain his powerful influence in that State, in conjunction with some persons, who might make a diversion or serious attack against Florida; and I doubt not that, in consequence of this, my advice, the Executive Government will take suitable steps for effectually preventing the rights of neutrality being infringed by Georgia, to the prejudice of the possessions of the King my master."

His letter has been laid before the President of the United States, by whose direction I have now to desire you immediately to inquire into the fact asserted by the Spanish minister; and if any discovery shall be made of designs to violate our neutral duties, and especially of forming an expedition against the territories of His Catholic Majesty, from the territory of the United States, in defiance of their laws, and particularly of the act of Congress for the punishment of crimes against the United States, passed on the 5th June, 1794, that you will take the most proper and effectual measures for frustrating such designs; and if the same shall be manifested by any overt acts, to cause the offenders to be arrested and secured, that they may be brought to condign punishment. Independently of the aid, which, if necessary, you will require of the Governor of Georgia, the commanding officer of the Federal troops in that State will be directed by the Secretary of War to afford you all the assistance in his power.

I shall be obliged by your acknowledging the receipt of this letter, and by a communication of the result of your inquiries into the subject of it.

I am, sir, with great respect, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

CHARLES JACKSON, Esq. District Attorney for the State of Georgia.

No. 18.

Extract of a letter from Charles Jackson, Esq. District Attorney of Georgia, to the Secretary of State, dated SAVANNAH, May 22, 1797.

SIR:

Your letter of the 27th ultimo, I had the honor to receive some few days past. It has remained unanswered until the present moment, that I might enable myself to ascertain whether or not the suspicions entertained by the Spanish minister, respecting General Clarke, as expressed in your letter, were well founded. I have made diligent inquiry, and cannot find any person here that knows any thing of the business, or that entertains a belief of the kind. Clarke was concerned in a former expedition against the Floridas, in conjunction with the French, and it is possible, from this circumstance, that he is again suspected. He is a man of strong passions, of warm partialities for the French, and violent antipathies to the English. From these circumstances, and from the matter being unknown to the citizens here, I am led to doubt the truth of the report altogether. It might not be improper to add, that he is far from being the man of influence suggested by the Spanish minister. But should it happen, contrary to my expectation, that Clarke should be daring enough to attempt a violation of the laws of the Union, by accepting a commission, as has been mentioned, no exertions shall be wanting on my part to bring him to punishment, and should it be necessary, I shall direct the marshal to call to his aid the Federal troops. But I have no doubt, on my own part, but the civil authority has sufficient strength in this State to carry into effect the laws of the Union.

ROTTERDAM, May 9, 1797.

DEAR SIR:

Although in the postscript to the original and quadruplicate of No. 15, forwarded to day, I have mentioned the latest intelligence, yet, as I find that the schooner Mary, of Boston, Captain Hall, is to sail from this port to-morrow, I beg leave to mention again, that a summary of some of the articles of the preliminaries of the treaty of peace between France and the Emperor arrived here this morning. "The Emperor cedes Belgium to the French republic; he recognizes the independence of the republic of Lombardy; he admits the extension of the French boundaries, to the limits already prescribed by their Constitution and laws." Therefore, the Meuse, and not the Rhine, is to be the boundary. Bonaparte's flanks and rear were threatened when the preliminaries were agreed upon. The Austrians had recovered the Tyrol, Friuli, and Trieste.

I received accounts to-day, that the Juliana, from Norfolk, in Virginia, is taken, and carried into Havre, and that the Juno, Rainbow, and Charlotte, all three from Charleston, and the Hebe, from Savannah, are captured and carried into Nantz, and in all probability will be condemned for want of a "rôle d'équipage," certified by a public officer, agreeably to the regulation prescribed by France.

I enclosed you in No. 15, (the original of which I sent by Captain Simpson, of the Republican, via Baltimore; the duplicate by Captain Goodrich, of the Lydia, via New York; the triplicate by Captain Harrington, of the Eliza; to Philadelphia; and the quadruplicate to the care of Mr. King) copies of citizen Merlin's letter to Mr. Skipwith, consul general at Paris, in which he says, that when we become just and grateful, and break our incredible treaty with England, France will desist from her present conduct with respect to us. I refer you to the copies transmitted as above, for the particulars of this curious letter; it is now published as official in the "Redacteur."

Major Mountflorence informs me by the letter received to day, "that he had drawn a reply to it, but that it had been judged not proper to be sent: but that in lieu thereof, it had been proposed to inform the minister by a short note, that persisting in the former reclamations, and not authorized by the Government of the United States to enter into a formal diplomatic discussion on the subject therein mentioned, a copy of his letter of the 4th Floreal* should be transmitted to our Secretary of State."

I remain, with real respect, &c.

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY.

Colonel PICKERING, Secretary of the United States.

Report of the Secretary of War to the President of the United States, accompanying the message of July 3, 1797.

WAR OFFICE, June 30, 1797.

The Secretary of War has the honor respectfully to report to the President of the United States, the annexed extracts of letters from Brigadier General Wilkinson and Lieutenant Colonel Hamtramck, relative to certain causes which may have affected the disposition of the Indians on the western frontiers; as also extracts of despatches to Brigadier General Wilkinson, and Captain Guion, respecting the conduct to be observed by the latter officer on his arrival at the Natchez and Walnut Hills, with copies of a correspondence between His Excellency Manuel Gayoso de Lemos, and Lieutenant Piercy Pope, of the corps of artillerists and engineers, and commandant of the advanced guard of the troops of the United States, destined to take possession of those posts, which exhibit the reasons that had prevented his receiving them.

The Secretary further reports a copy of a letter from William Blount, senator from the State of Tennessee, (the original of which is believed to be in his hand writing) addressed to James Carey, interpreter to the Cherokee nation, and assistant to the Indian factory at Tellico, in Tennessee, who had received it, and which had since come to the hands of the principal of that factory.

JAMES M'HENRY, Secretary of War.

No. 1.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Brigadier General James Wilkinson, dated

WAR OFFICE, June 9, 1797.

"Yesterday the Secretary of State received letters from Mr. Ellicott, by which, it would appear, that scruples on the part of Governor Gayoso had retarded the evacuation of the posts.

"These scruples or objections are, 1st: That, in his opinion, the forts ought to be demolished. 2d: That he thought it necessary to continue his force in that quarter till the claims of Spanish subjects to lands should be adjusted by negotiation.

"As to the first, our officer may be instructed to agree to the demolition of the works, if insisted on. As to the second, he will assure the Governor that he is authorized to say, that no person shall be disturbed in his possession or property, till an opportunity has been afforded to apply to Congress, and that they may rely upon their claims being adjusted upon the most equitable principles.

"It is to be presumed, that on receiving these explanations, the Spanish garrisons will be withdrawn. If, however, contrary to expectation, this should not happen, our officer is to take a secure position, but not so near them as to give any cause to the Spanish garrisons to apprehend insult or injury."

No. 2.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Captain Isaac Guion, commanding a detachment of the troops of the United States, destined for the Natchez, dated

WAR OFFICE, June 10, 1797.

"I enclose you duplicate of my letter to Brigadier General Wilkinson, of yesterday's date, for your government, in case he should have left Fort Washington, or by any accident be prevented from communicating to you the contents.

"Having a perfect reliance on your prudence and judgment, I cannot doubt but your command will prove satisfactory to yourself, and advantageous to the United States."

No. 3.

Extract of a letter from the Secretary of War to Captain Isaac Guion, dated

WAR OFFICE, June 15, 1797.

"Should this despatch find you, where I expect it will, at the Natchez, and the Spanish garrison still in possession of the works at that place, you will be pleased to lose no time in communicating to the commanding officer there, the enclosed copy of a message† from the President of the United States to Congress, and to the inhabitants of Natchez, its contents, that both may be fully possessed of the intentions of Government. You will also inform the Spanish commandant, that you are instructed to pay the strictest attention to the engagements the United States have entered into by the treaty with His Catholic Majesty; to permit the demolition of the works; to use your utmost endeavors to preserve a continuance of the pacific dispositions of the Indians within our limits, towards the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, or his Indians; and to prevent their commencing hostilities (of which there is no appearance) against either, conformably to the fifth article of the said treaty. That you flatter yourself, after these candid assurances, that you will have the immediate pleasure to announce to the President, a full compliance with the treaty on the part of the commander of His Catholic Majesty's forces within the United States."

* April 23. † June 12, 1797.

No. 4.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General James Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, received 22d instant, dated

FORT WASHINGTON, June 2, 1797.

"Lieutenant Colonel Howard, of the regiment of Louisiana, an accomplished Irishman, has arrived at St. Louis with four hundred regular troops; he is strengthening the works of that place, and organizing the militia; and I have information, through a confidential channel, that it was determined, as early as September last, not to give up the posts on the Mississippi."

No. 5.

Extract of a letter from Brigadier General James Wilkinson to the Secretary of War, received 22d instant, dated

FORT WASHINGTON, June 4, 1797.

"Letters from all quarters announce the discontents and menacing aspect of the savages; two white men have been recently murdered on the Ohio, below the Cumberland, and the savages beyond the Mississippi, and those who pass Massac, make no hesitation to avow their purpose of war; the Shawanese, at the old Tawa towns, are our nearest neighbors; they profess friendship, but are making no preparations for a crop, which is a certain indication of their intention to change ground."

"The enclosed extract of a letter from Colonel Hamtramck is corroborated by information from Kaskaskias, St. Vincennes, and Massac."

"At the same time, Colonel Howard is strengthening his works at St. Louis, and organizing the militia, who are taken into pay at nine dollars per month."

No. 6.

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant Colonel Hamtramck to Brigadier General James Wilkinson, dated

DETROIT, May 21, 1797.

"The departure of the fourth regiment, and now of the artillery, makes us very weak; it has reduced our guards from officer's guards to non-commissioned officer's, and our strength does not admit of three relieves.

"I have had, for a long time past, a large number of Indians; I do not know well their intentions; but I think it would be prudent not to weaken the garrison more than it is; and I am pretty sure that both the French and Spaniards have emissaries amongst the Indians. I have it from indubitable authority, that a large belt from the Spaniards is now travelling through the different nations."

Extract of a letter from Lieutenant Piercy Pope to the Secretary for the Department of War, received 29th June, dated

CAMP, May 9, 1797.

SIR:

I arrived at the Walnut Hills on the 13th of last month. Previous to my arrival at that place, orders were lodged with the commandant of that post, not to suffer my troops to come any lower down until further orders. At this place I remained for eight or ten days, when I received a letter from Governor Gayoso, informing me, that he should be happy to see myself and detachment arrive. I immediately embarked all my troops, and moved on to Natchez, at which place I arrived the 24th April, was received extremely well, and every thing appeared to go perfectly right for several days; the evacuation appeared to be going on with great life, when all at once the military stores were immediately ordered back, their troops busily engaged all night taking back and remounting the cannon. This kind of conduct, I assure you, appeared, and still appears strange; they are strengthening the garrison here, detachments of troops daily arriving; the whole of which are both day and night working and fortifying themselves; I cannot say against what. Reinforcements are daily going up to the Walnut Hills, for no other purpose but strengthening that place. The militia is ordered to be embodied—this, however, is a report, though I believe a very just one, which has alarmed the inhabitants extremely, who are respectable and numerous. I am also informed, this evening, that what is called the Mexican regiment are now on their way to garrison this place and the Walnut Hills. There have been several attempts made to draw on the Indians upon my troops. I have fully ascertained this fact, and demanded of the Governor to have a principal actor immediately brought to punishment, or sent out of the country. He has been sent for, and is now on board of one of the galleys, which is now about descending the river.

NATCHEZ, March 25, 1797.

SIR:

By Mr. Philip Minor I am informed that you was preparing to come down the Mississippi to take possession of the posts on the east bank of this river, to the north of 31 degrees latitude. Not long ago, General Wayne sent a message to Baron Carondelet, General-in-chief of this province, inquiring when it would be convenient and agreeable to him to order the said posts to be evacuated. His excellency the Baron has answered, and the answer cannot yet have produced the determination you have taken to anticipate the time appointed. Depending on the friendly arrangements that the two generals had entered into, neither Nogales or this place is yet evacuated, though the necessary steps are taken to verify it within one month; therefore, I request that you will encamp your troops in the first convenient place on either bank of this river, nigh the place where this may be delivered to you, by my adjutant, Captain Stephen Minor. I shall with pleasure see your condescension, as this will be a proof of the good harmony that subsists between our nations, which is more particularly recommended to us by the King. The presence of the troops of the United States, while the evacuation of this place is carrying on, would have an appearance of compulsion, which would not be decent to the decorum due to His Catholic Majesty, when so intimately allied to the United States of America.

As soon as the military stores are embarked, I shall do myself the honor to acquaint you with it, and then will be very happy to see you here, and to be personally acquainted with you.

I am, with the highest consideration, sir, &c.

NATCHEZ, April 1, 1797.

SIR:

Since I addressed you by Major Minor, I have received orders from his excellency Baron Carondelet, General-in-chief of this province, to suspend the evacuation of the posts within my jurisdiction, until our court has settled with the United States of America some difficulties, which can be levelled only by our respective ministers. The perfect peace and harmony subsisting between the two nations do not allow us to doubt but we shall shortly receive intelligence concerning the results of this suspension. It is my duty to inform you of this circumstance, and at the same time to offer you any assistance that you may be in need of at the Walnut Hills, and give you every proof of our disposition to keep up a good understanding and sincere friendship with the United States.

Notwithstanding I have already given the necessary orders to the commandant of that post to prepare convenient accommodations for your troops, I reiterate them by this opportunity; being anxious that you may meet with every possible conveniency at that place.

I am, with consideration, sir, &c.

WALNUT HILLS, April 13, 1797.

SIR:

I have this morning, with attention, perused two letters from Governor Gayoso, mentioning a message from General Wayne to Baron Carondelet, General-in-chief of this province, to know when it would be convenient to him to have the posts evacuated. I could not know or anticipate the answer to General Wayne's message; but on my arrival at Fort Massac, was informed by the commanding officer at that place that the posts were ready to be evacuated. Agreeably to my orders, and in consequence of this information, I am now coming forward with my detachment, for the purpose of taking possession of the lowest post on the Mississippi—the Natchez post.

It is my wish, as well as that of the United States, to promote harmony and a friendly exchange of good offices between the United States and the subjects of His Most Catholic Majesty.

I am, with respect, &c.

SIR:

Your letter of the 25th of March, and the other of the 1st instant, were both delivered me by the commanding officer at Nogales yesterday. I was extremely sorry that my indisposition was such as prevented an answer. I am not unacquainted with the circumstance of General Wayne having sent a message, inquiring when it would be convenient to evacuate the posts. I am unacquainted with the answer to this inquiry, nor did I anticipate the time appointed for their delivery; for the first information received by me on this subject was at Fort Massac, which, together with my orders or instruction, induced me to suppose a delay for receiving the posts would be improper. I have, agreeably to your request, encamped my troops on the east side of the Mississippi, immediately above Nogales. I assure you it is with pleasure I have to acknowledge the polite treatment and attention my troops have received, since their arrival at this place, from the commandant; and rest assured that nothing shall be wanting on my part to cultivate that present interesting harmony which is between the two nations. Nothing will give me more pleasure than to be personally acquainted with you, when convenience will permit.

NATCHEZ, April 17, 1797.

SIR:

By the commandant of that post I am informed of your arrival there, with the troops under your command; and he has also sent me the letter that you wrote to him, acknowledging the reception of my two.

The particular reasons that, for the present, have suspended the evacuation of the posts, do not affect the treaty in any other respect; and these will soon be settled between His Catholic Majesty and the United States of America, they being of a nature that only wants an explanation: therefore, it has been my most earnest wish to keep the settlements in peace and quiet until that political change takes place.

As I expected you might come down before an information of this incident could reach you, I provided the most convenient barracks that I could for your troops at that post, wishing to show the United States the greatest attention to their troops; and, in consequence of this disposition, having conferred with the Honorable Andrew Ellicott, we have agreed that you should remove to this place, to encamp in its vicinity, where you may be assisted with every thing more conveniently. By this opportunity, I forward the correspondent orders to the commandant of that post, who will do every thing necessary to facilitate and expedite your descent, which I hope will be speedy, as I flatter myself with the prospect of much satisfaction in forming your acquaintance.

I have the honor to be, &c.

NATCHEZ, May 1, 1797.

SIR:

I have the honor to acquaint you that the Commander General of this province desires me to inform you that His Majesty's envoy in the United States has given him the intelligence of an attack proposed against our part of the Illinois by the British, from Canada; and as such an expedition cannot take place without passing through the territory of the United States, said envoy did officially communicate what was necessary to the Secretary of State of the United States, requiring that convenient orders should be issued to have their territory respected and provided for their own safety; which we doubt not but the United States will acquiesce to, in consequence of the treaty and the good harmony that subsist between the United States of America and His Majesty.

The said Commander General of this province, in consequence of the foregoing information, finds himself under the necessity of putting in a state of defence several points of this river, and particularly Nogales, to cover Lower Louisiana, and in case the British should succeed in their projects against Illinois; for which purpose a convenient force shall be sent to Nogales to repair and defend that post, which, far from being against the interest of the United States of America, will, in case of being agreed to, leave the military post in that state which it may be found.

As this is a powerful reason, in addition to those that offered before, to suspend the evacuation of these posts, and of running the line, as our attention is entirely drawn towards the defence of the province, the said Commander General orders me to pass you this official communication; and, in consequence of the unavoidable delay, to repeat to you, in his name, the proposal of remaining here, to go down to Lower Louisiana, or as he thinks might be preferable, to remove to Villa Gayoso, where there are sufficient buildings to accommodate both you and your troops; this insinuation being an effect of the desire we have to show every degree of consideration, as a proof of our disposition to improve the friendship between our nations, assuring you that, in any part that you should determine to remove or stay, the Commander General of this province will facilitate every conveniency in his power for your satisfaction.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Captain P. S. POPE.

No. 14.

Lieutenant Piercy S. Pope to Don Manuel Gayoso de Lemos.

CAMP, May 2, 1797.

SIR:

Your letter of yesterday was delivered me by your adjutant, Captain Stephen Minor. The Governor General has, as appears from your letter to me, requested that I should be informed of a proposed attack, on your part of the Illinois country, by the British force of Canada, and that such an expedition cannot take place without passing through the territory of the United States. I have not a doubt but that the United States have made such arrangements as will secure to them the respect due the nation; and that, at the same time, every preparation has been made to carry into effect, with firmness, the late treaty between His Most Catholic Majesty and the United States.

The second part of your letter more particularly concerns me, as a longer delay of the evacuation of the Walnut Hills and Natchez I cannot possibly consider in any other light than an indirect violation of the late treaty.

The landing of any troops for the purpose of fortifying or reinforcing Nogales, or any other post, above a due east and west line, to be drawn 33′ and 46′ south of Mr. Ellicott's present encampment, will be highly improper, and no doubt considered as a direct attack upon the honor of the United States, as well as the liberties of the citizens, and an invasion of a part of our territory; there being no war between the United States and Great Britain, the latter Power would have every reason of complaint, should such a measure be suffered. I now proceed to the third and last part of your letter, and cannot suppose the reasons offered for a longer detention of the posts within the United States, and running the line, sufficient. The fortifying or remaining in force against your enemies within the territory of the United States, when holding the opposite side of the Mississippi, where you may, with equal ease, oppose your enemies, may be productive of disagreeable consequences to both our nations.

I have the honor to return you my sincere thanks for your friendship and polite attention to myself and troops, and at the same time to inform you that my present eligible situation supersedes the necessity of a removal.

I am, with due respect, &c.

Don Manuel Gayoso de Lemos to Lieutenant Piercy S. Pope, dated

NATCHEZ, May 3, 1797.

SIP:

Yesterday, by Lieutenant John M'Clary, I received your answer to my communication of the day before. I am sorry to find the construction you give to such an official communication, which leaves no room of doubt.

The project of an attack from the British in Canada is positive; and, in consequence thereof, it is the duty of the Commander General of this province to oppose it by every means in his power, though the probability is that they will not be able to carry their plan into execution, as we rely on the friendship of the United States, who certainly will not voluntarily permit such an armed force to pass through their territory, to attack the dominions of His Majesty; but as, when such an expedition was proposed, the British knew very well that to accomplish it they must necessarily pass through the territory of the United States, they certainly have had it in view either to pass the posts by surprise, or some other combination that secured to them the means of reaching Illinois. It is to prevent the effect of such an event that the said Commander General takes every measure to obstruct their success at their first approach, or a continuation of it, if fortune should favor them in Upper Louisiana.

We are far from acting in a manner so as to alter the good understanding that happily subsists between our nations. Political reasons have caused a suspension of the evacuation of these posts—reasons that are to be settled ministerially, and that are out of my line to controvert. My duty is to comply with the superior orders of my General-in-chief, which are positively to keep the best harmony with you, and attend to every other object concerning the safety of this province.

There is no reason to apprehend that the treaty between the United States of America and His Majesty will not take place in every point; the delay, experienced with regard to one part of it, is not a violation of the treaty, and is only referred to the regular ministerial procedure, which, when settled, will be exactly complied with; in the mean while, no alteration can take place, nor can any part of His Majesty's dominions be considered alienated, delivered in a solemn and regular manner; and, until that period, the dominion of His Majesty does not cease.

The communication, that the Commander General of this province has ordered me to impart to you, is a striking proof of the good understanding that he is desirous to cultivate, by informing you of an important circumstance that concerns both our nations, without expecting that you would offer any objections to the indispensable dispositions that he finds necessary for the safety of the province.

As your answer is of a nature that requires the immediate communication of it to my General-in-chief, I request you to inform me further, if you have positive orders to make the objections that you have signified to me, as it must necessarily influence the conduct of the King my master towards the United States of America; and as, likewise, this is a necessary step to justify that I have not been negligent in requiring this important intelligence.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Lieutenant Piercy S. Pope to Don Manuel Gayoso de Lemos, dated

CAMP, May 5, 1797.

SIR:

I received your letter by Captain Minor, requesting of me to be informed whether I had positive orders for the objections I made in reply to your letter of the 1st instant. I have no official information from the United States of any pending negotiations that respects the late treaty, and consequently have every reason to suppose that the United States consider the treaty carried into effect, as far as respects the evacuation of the posts on the east side of the Mississippi, above the 31st degree north latitude, and therefore conclude that any reinforcements, or additional works, will have a tendency to disturb that harmony which at present happily prevails between the two nations, and which I am directed to cultivate.

You told me yesterday that you had received information from a gentleman, that I intended to attack the garrison at this place. I now request that you will discover the author, that he may have it in his power to acquit himself of this assertion, or be brought to that just tribunal a crime of so heinous a nature merits as the informer has been guilty of.

SIR:

I received your letter dated the 5th instant, delivered me by Lieutenant John M'Clary, in reply to mine of the 3d, by which, and by your conferences, I am persuaded of your disposition to cultivate that good harmony that is justly due to our nations. On my part, I pledge my honor to you that I shall invariably continue considering you, not only as I do every individual of your nation, but yet more particularly under the sacred view of its representatives, as likewise every person under your command, and under the direction of the Honorable Andrew Ellicott.

I do assure you, likewise, that my conduct shall be such as not to merit the reflection of your nation, nor expose mine to any contest on account thereof, being answerable by my duty, and by my honor, to act with such propriety as will justify me in my public capacity.

With regard to the person that gave the information that, in my familiar conversation, I communicated to you, he must be despised, and others discountenanced both by you and by me, as our situations are sacred, and only subject to the alterations unanimously agreed upon by our nations.

I have the honor to be, &c.

COLONEL KING'S IRON WORKS, April 21, 1797.

DEAR CAREY:

I wished to have seen you before I returned to Philadelphia, but I am obliged to return to the session of Congress, which commences on the 15th May.

Among other things that I wished to have seen you about, was the business Captain Chisholm mentioned to the British minister last winter, at Philadelphia.

I believe, but am not quite sure, that the plan then talked of will be attempted this fall, and, if it is attempted, it will be in a much larger way than then talked of; and if the Indians act their part, I have no doubt but it will succeed. A man of consequence has gone to England about the business, and if he makes arrangements as he expects, I shall myself have a hand in the business, and probably shall be at the head of the business on the part of the British. You are, however, to understand, that it is yet not quite certain that the plan will be attempted, yet you will do well to keep things in a proper train for action in case it should be attempted, and to do so will require all your management; I say, will require all your management, because you must take care, in whatever you say to Rogers, or any body else, not to let the plan be discovered by Hawkins, Dinsmoor, Byers, or any other person in the interest of the United States or Spain.

If I attempt this plan, I shall expect to have you and all my Indian country and Indian friends with me; but you are now in good business, I hope, and you are not to risk the loss of it by saying any thing that will hurt you until you again hear from me. Where Captain Chisholm is, I do not know; I left him in Philadelphia in March, and he frequently visited the minister, and spoke upon the subject; but I believe he will go into the Creek nation by way of South Carolina or Georgia. He gave out he was going to England, but I did not believe him. Among things that you may safely do, will be to keep up my consequence with Watts, and the Creeks and Cherokees, generally, and you must by no means say any thing in favor of Hawkins, but as often as you can, with safety to yourself, you may teach the Creeks to believe he is no better than he should be. Any power or consequence he gets will be against our plan. Perhaps Rogers, who has no office to lose, is the best man to give out talks against Hawkins. Read the letter to Rogers, and if you think it best to send it to him, put a wafer in it, and forward it to him by a safe hand, or perhaps you had best send for him to come to you, and speak to him yourself respecting the state and prospect of things.

I have advised you, in whatever you do, to take care of yourself; I have now to tell you to take care of me too, for a discovery of the plan would prevent the success, and much injure all the parties concerned. It may be that the commissioners may not run the line as the Indians expect or wish, and, in that case, it is probable the Indians may be taught to blame me for making the treaty.

To such complaints against me, if such there are, it may be said by my friends, at proper times and places, that Doublehead confirmed the treaty with the President, at Philadelphia, and received as much as five thousand dollars a year, to be paid to the nation over and above the first price; indeed, it may with truth be said, that though I made the treaty, that I made it by the instructions of the President; and, in fact, it may with truth be said, that I was by the President instructed to purchase much more land than the Indians would agree to sell. This sort of talk will be throwing all the blame off me upon the late President, and, as he is now out of office, it will be of no consequence how much the Indians blame him. And, among other things that may be said for me is, that I was not at the running of the line, and that if I had been, it would have been run more to their satisfaction. In short, you understand the subject, and must take care to give out the proper talks to keep up my consequence with the Creeks and Cherokees. Can't Rogers contrive to get the Creeks to desire the President to take Hawkins out of the nation; for if he stays in the Creek nation, and gets the good will of the nation, he can and will do great injury to our plan: when you have read this letter over three times, then burn it. I shall be at Knoxville in July or August, when I will send for Watts, and give him the whiskey I promised him.

I am, &c.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

REPORTED DECEMBER 26, 1797.

Mr. SEWALL, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the President's speech which relates to the protection of commerce, and the defence of the country, beg leave to report, in part, of the subjects which, under this authority, require their attention:

That the unauthorized depredations which interrupt the commerce of the United States are rendered more extensively destructive by certain regulations which originated with the act of June the 5th, 1794, made in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States. That act prohibits, among other things, the fitting and arming, within the United States, any ship or vessel with intent to employ the same in the service of any foreign prince or state, for hostile purposes. The instructions immediately afterwards given by the Executive to carry that law into full effect, appears in a letter from the Department of War, circulated to the Governors of the several States, under date of July 21st, 1794, a copy of which is herewith submitted. The committee would more especially refer to that part of the letter which prohibits citizens from arming their vessels, unless in some special cases, reserved for the decision of the President.

The alarming increase of injurious depredations since occurring, gave rise to attempts by our citizens to arm their vessels, and when refused permission, to very earnest claims of their right: and the question was submitted to the Treasury Department, and answered therefrom, by a circular letter to the collectors of the customs, under date of April 8th, 1797; a copy of which is herewith submitted. It is thereby directed, that the sailing of armed vessels, not bona fide destined to the East Indies, be restrained, until otherwise ordained by Congress. It is understood that the exception has been since extended in favor of vessels bound to the coast of Africa. This restraint appears to have originated on the part of the Executive of the United States, solely in the wish to prevent collusions with the Powers at war, contravening the act before mentioned, and not from any doubt of the policy and propriety of permitting our vessels to employ means of defence while engaged in a lawful foreign commerce.

Your committee are of opinion, that legislative provisions ought to be established in lieu of the Executive directions herein referred to. The law before mentioned has not provided for any examination, or directed to any circumstances or stipulations by which the case of the lawful equipment of a vessel of the United States may be distinguished from that of an unlawful arming for hostile purposes. From this defect has arisen the necessity, if there be any, of the existing restraint which has operated to render the vessels of the United States defenceless against every attack, however lawless and unauthorized, and an easy prey to the most inconsiderable force. It is observable, also, that the exceptions from this restraint, admitted in favor of vessels undertaking for a voyage to the East Indies, or to the coast of Africa, are without any guard upon the conduct of those vessels abroad, and that these pretences may be falsely assumed with impunity.

Upon these considerations the committee have prepared a bill, as supplementary to the act of June, 1794, providing against abuses which may be attempted or practised under color of equipping vessels for defence, in case that right should be generally exercised by the citizens of the United States.

All which is submitted, by order of the committee.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 21, 1794.

SIR:

Some doubts having arisen in several of the States as to the circumstances of equipment in any vessel belonging to the belligerent nations, which may be deemed an unlawful increase, or augmentation of force, it has been judged advisable, in order that a uniform principle may prevail upon the subject, to give the following explanations:

The mounting additional guns, or changing or altering the calibre or size of the guns, in any manner whatever; the making of new gun carriages, or the cutting of new port holes in any part of a vessel, are each adjudged to be an unlawful augmentation of force, and therefore to be prevented.

This construction had its full operation upon the British letter of marque, ship Jane, which arrived in the port of Philadelphia in the month of July, 1793. New gun carriages were made, additional guns mounted, which had been brought in the hold of said vessel, and new port holes were cut in her sides and stern. Each and every one of these acts being deemed unlawful, she was obliged to re-land the new gun carriages, dismount the additional guns, and dismantle, and effectually close up the new port holes.

Although this rule has been hitherto considered as applicable to the belligerent Powers only, yet, in order to prevent any abuse or national responsibility from the subjects of other neutral nations, fitting out or equipping vessels in our ports, for the use of one of the warring nations, it is extended to all vessels, belonging even to neutrals.

The United States being also a neutral nation, the vessels of their citizens, in most cases, do not require to be armed; the arming such vessels, therefore, raises a presumption that it is done with a hostile intent, and contrary to the prohibitions of the act of Congress. Some special cases, indeed, may occur, in which arming may be proper and necessary, but these cases ought always to be well examined and ascertained, lest they should cover collusions with some of the belligerent Powers. To guard against such an abuse, no vessel belonging to any citizen of the United States is to be permitted to be armed, and to sail, until all circumstances concerning her shall have been transmitted to the President, and his decision thereon made known.

I have the honor to transmit, herein enclosed, a new rule as to the sailing of vessels of war of the belligerent nations from the United States, and also an act entitled "An act in addition to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States."

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. KNOX.

His Excellency the Governor of ———

Circular to the Collectors of the Customs.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 8, 1797.

SIR:

The depredations to which the commerce of the United States is at present exposed have given rise to a question, which, being of general concern, is therefore made the subject of a circular communication.

The question is, Whether it be lawful to arm the merchant vessels of the United States for their protection and defence, while engaged in regular commerce?

It is answered—That no doubt is entertained, that defence, by means of military force, against mere pirates and sea rovers, is lawful. The arming of vessels bona fide engaged in trade to the East Indies is, therefore, on account of the danger from pirates, to be permitted, as heretofore; but as the arming of vessels destined for European or West India commerce raises a presumption that it is done with hostile intentions against some one of the belligerent nations, and may cover collusive practices, inconsistent with the act of Congress of June, 1794, unless guarded by provisions more effectual than have been hitherto established, it is directed that the sailing of armed vessels, not bona fide destined to the East Indies, be restrained, until otherwise ordained by Congress.

Information has been received that some vessels are arming by strangers for the purpose of capturing the vessels of the United States. The utmost vigilance on the part of the collectors to prevent the progress of this evil is enjoined; where there is reasonable ground to believe that vessels are equipped for the purpose of being employed against the commerce of this country, they are to be arrested, and the circumstances stated to this Department.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

OLIVER WOLCOTT.

SPAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 23, 1798.

UNITED STATES, January 23*d*, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate and
Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

At the commencement of this session of Congress, I propose, in the course of it, to communicate to both Houses further information concerning the situation of our affairs in the territories of the United States, situated on the Mississippi river, and its neighborhood; our intercourse with the Indian nations; our relations with the Spanish Government, and the conduct of their officers and agents. This information will be found in a report of the Secretary of State, and the documents attending it, which I now present to the Senate and House of Representatives.

JOHN ADAMS.

REPORT

OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

In observance of your directions I have revised the communications from Mr. Ellicott, the commissioner of the United States at the Natchez, since my report of the 3d of July last, which, with the documents therein referred to, you, on the same day, laid before Congress; and now respectfully submit to you a statement of whatever appears therein to be material.

The last letter from Mr. Ellicott, of which a communication was made to Congress, bore date the 10th of May last. His next, dated the 27th of that month, I received the 24th of August. In this he mentions that reinforcements were sent from New Orleans to the post at Walnut Hills, and that repairs were made on the fort at the Natchez. That he had received very satisfactory accounts from both the Chickasaws and Choctaws that, for more than eight months past, they had been tampered with by the Spanish agents and traders, to prevent the late treaty between His Catholic Majesty and the United States from being carried into effect, though Mr. Ellicott thinks, without success. On the 11th of May, he wrote to Governor Gayoso, desiring a definitive answer as to the time he would be ready to proceed to the determination of the boundaries between the two nations, as specified in the treaty, to which he received an unsatisfactory answer. On the 16th he addressed to Governor Gayoso a retrospective view of their correspondence, and of that with Lieutenant Pope, exhibiting the repeated promises and demonstrations of running the boundary line and evacuating the posts; the non-performance of those promises, and the varied pretences for the delay. To this detail of unfulfilled engagements and contradictory measures, the Governor answered Mr. Ellicott on the 17th, "That he should not trouble him with justifying the motives which had caused some disagreement in his (the Governor's) communications;" adding, however, that "they were far from being insincere."

In his next letter, dated the 4th of June, Mr. Ellicott mentions that "the citizens of the United States who are trading on the Mississippi are frequently treated with great insolence at the Spanish posts, and their property taken for the use of His Catholic Majesty, when wanted, and always at a reduced price." He instances the case of a Mr. M'Cluny, from whom a large quantity of flour was thus taken at the Walnut Hills; and of Francis Baily, who was compelled to receive as cash, in payment for goods sold, a species of paper which was passing at a discount of twelve per cent.

With this letter Mr. Ellicott transmitted a copy of a proclamation by the Baron de Carondelet, Governor General of Louisiana, bearing date at New Orleans the 24th of May, and ordered to be published. In order to dissipate reports which had alarmed the inhabitants of the Natchez, the Baron therein declares, "that the suspension of the demarcation of the limits, and the evacuation of the forts, which will be comprehended on the other side of the line, is, at present, only occasioned by the imperious necessity of securing Lower Louisiana from the hostilities of the English, who, (he says) without regard to the inviolability of the territory of the United States, have set on foot an expedition against Upper Louisiana, which they cannot, however, attack, without traversing the aforesaid territory." But he suggests, that, if they made themselves masters of the Illinois country, they would then attack Lower Louisiana. This fabulous expedition of the English from Canada is thus made the pretence for the non-execution of the treaty on the part of Spain. "We have thought proper (says the Baron) to put the post of Walnut Hills in a respectable but provisional state of defence, until the United States, informed of these motives, by the minister plenipotentiary of His Majesty, to whom we have communicated them, provide against these inconveniences; and, by taking the proper steps to cause the territory to be respected, shall put in our power to fulfil, without danger, the articles of the treaty concerning limits."

In this proclamation, the information of the English expedition is represented as having been communicated by the Baron de Carondelet to the Spanish minister in the United States; but, in his next proclamation, one week afterwards, (May 31st) he sets forth that he had received, from that minister, information of the expedition from Canada, and, therefore, "had judged it necessary, for the surety and tranquillity of Lower Louisiana, to suspend the evacuation of the post of Natchez, and of the Walnut Hills." And, as early as the first of May, Governor Gayoso, in a letter to Mr. Ellicott, published with the other documents laid before Congress at the last session, assigns the information, before that day, received by the Baron from the Spanish minister, of the above pretended expedition as the reason for holding the posts, and putting them in a state of defence, particularly the Walnut Hills. In the same proclamation (of which a copy No. 1, is annexed) the Baron affects to consider the march of a detachment of American troops from the Ohio to the State of Tennessee, while it has been intimated, as he says, to the militia of Cumberland, to hold themselves ready to march at the first notice, as an evidence of a hostile attack intended, even by the United States, on Louisiana.

The pretences for holding the posts in question, and delaying to run the boundary line, having varied from time to time, it may be proper to present them in one view.

In the month of March.

1st. That it was uncertain whether the forts, when evacuated, were to be demolished or left standing.

2d. That it was necessary to secure the real property to the inhabitants. And both these points, it was said, must be adjusted by a negotiation between the two Governments of Spain and the United States, prior to the evacuation of the posts.

3d. That they must be retained until the Spanish officers were sure the Indians would be pacific.

On the 24th of May.

4th. The English expedition from Canada, which could not proceed without violating the territory of the United States.

But, in the proclamation of this date, the putting of the principal post, that of the Walnut Hills, in a state of defence was declared to be only provisional, and until the United States should cause their territory to be respected.

5th. On the 31st of May, the Baron's second proclamation repeats the same pretence, the English expedition, and adds a new one, that the United States were marching troops, and preparing the militia to take the Spanish dominions by surprise. Further motives are also assigned—anterior menaces by the commissioner, Mr. Ellicott, and of Lieutenant Pope, and the expected rupture between the United States and France. And new conditions are now mentioned to be performed by the United States, viz: that they should, as a necessary evidence that they have no hostile intentions against the Spanish provinces, either leave the post of the Natchez, or the Walnut Hills, in posession of Spain, as "the only bulwark of Lower Louisiana to stop the course of the British;" or give to the Spaniards "security against the article of the treaty with Great Britain, which exposes Lower Louisiana to be pillaged and destroyed down to the capital. Then (says the Baron) we will deliver up the said posts, and lay down our arms, which they (the United States) have forced us to take up, by arming their militia in time of peace, and sending a considerable body of troops by roundabout ways to surprise us."

Pretences more frivolous, or more unfounded and unwarrantable, were perhaps never urged as reasons to excuse a violation of the faith of treaties. Never, perhaps, was conceived a more absurd idea, than that of marching troops from the Ohio to the State of Tennessee, and thence to the Natchez, in the whole a tedious, difficult, and expensive route of many hundred miles, chiefly through a wilderness; when, if the United States had any hostile views, they had only to collect their troops to the Ohio, and suffer them to be floated down that river and the Mississippi, almost without labor, with great expedition, and at small expense, to the country to be attacked. But the suggestion is as false as it is absurd.

Neither does any article of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, (the Baron doubtless means the treaty of 1794) nor the explanatory article of 1796, give to Great Britain any new right respecting the navigation of the Mississippi, and consequently do not expose, more than it was before exposed, Lower Louisiana to be pillaged and destroyed by the British. But this question having been fully discussed in my letter of the 17th of May last to the Spanish minister, and his reasoning demonstrated (as I conceive) to be utterly unfounded, it would be a waste of time to add any further observations upon it.

If the posts of the Natchez and Walnut Hills "are the only bulwarks of Lower Louisiana, to stop the course of the British," as the Baron asserts, and if, therefore, Spain is justifiable in holding them, she may retain them, without any limitation of time, for her security in any future war, as well as in that which now exists. But this, like all the other reasons which have been before advanced, is merely ostensible. The true reason is doubtless developed by the Baron in his proclamation of the 31st of May. The expectation of an "immediate rupture between France, the intimate ally of Spain, and the United States."

The Spanish minister having resumed this subject in his letter to me of the 11th of July, his own printed translation of it, and my answer of the 8th of August, are hereto annexed, together with his letter of the 19th August, acknowledging the receipt of that answer, and his two subsequent letters of the 9th of October and 21st of November. With the last it seems proper to lay before you a paper signed VERUS, which appeared in the Aurora, printed by Benjamin Franklin Bache, on the morning of the 23d, containing, in substance, his letter of the 22d, which I received the preceding evening, and some additional expressions which the minister himself deemed too gross to be addressed to the Government under his proper signature; but which, under the circumstances here mentioned, must necessarily be ascribed to him.

In his next letter, Mr. Ellicott gives an account of an insurrection of the inhabitants of the Natchez. A minute detail of the circumstances which gradually tended to produce this event, he says, would fill a volume. The following relation is extracted from his letter of June 27th: "The delay (says he) on the part of the Spaniards, to carry the late treaty between His Catholic Majesty and the United States into effect, gave great uneasiness, which was daily increased by the Spaniards reinforcing and repairing the fort at this place and the Walnut Hills. The people considered those preparations as a determination on the part of Spain to retain the country, notwithstanding the late treaty. A disposition was frequently manifested to resist the laws of Spain; but they were, nevertheless, submitted to without a direct opposition, until Friday the 9th instant, when a Mr. Hannan, a preacher among the Baptists, was taken on some trivial pretence, and confined by his legs in a small building within the fort. This was considered as an attack upon the privileges of the citizens of the United States (Mr. Hannan being one) and a determination, at all events, to enforce the laws, civil and religious, of Spain, with rigor. Under this impression the inhabitants flew to arms, and the Governor and the principal officers of Government took refuge in the fort. Thus in less than ten hours, by an unnecessary exertion of power, the authority of the Governor was confined to the small compass of the fort."

Saturday, the 10th, the opposition to the Spanish Government had extended almost over the district. Sunday, the 11th, a number of enterprising opposers of the Spanish Government called upon Lieutenant Pope and myself, and declared their determination of commencing hostilities, in consequence of the imprisonment of Mr. Hannan, and a proclamation of the Baron de Carondelet (that of the 31st of May before mentioned) which they considered as a declaration of war against the United States: To oppose them directly would have put an end to our influence in the country; and to encourage them, in my opinion, would have been improper, as the United States had not extended their jurisdiction to this district. I, therefore, on my part, resolved to do neither; but, to divert their attention from immediate acts of hostility, proposed to them, to make a formal declaration of their being, by the late treaty, citizens of the United States, that they might have some claim to protection; but at the same time not to lose sight of their personal safety, and act on the defensive only. This had the effect I expected. On the evening of Monday, the 12th, Mr. Pope and myself received a verbal message from Governor Gayoso, by his adjutant, Major Minor, to the following purport: "Gentlemen, Governor Gayoso requests the favor of an interview with you, all as private gentlemen: the interview to be without the fort, to see if some plan cannot be devised to quiet the present disturbance in the country." To this message I replied, that "I had no objection to the proposed interview; that I approved of peace, and would join in any measures for that purpose, consistent with the honor and safety of the people, who generally considered themselves citizens of the United States." Mr. Pope's answer was very different, and to the following effect: "You will please to inform Governor Gayoso that I will not agree to the interview, nor have any correspondence with him but what shall be official; and I will repel, by force, any attempts that are made to imprison those who claim the privileges of being citizens of the United States." As the message was jointly to Mr. Pope and myself, and Mr. Pope would not attend, I informed Major Minor that I should not attend alone. All my address was now exerted to avert the storm, and bring it to a favorable issue; and I could see no mode so likely to answer the purpose, as measures apparently decided. Under this impression, about ten o'clock in the evening, after Major Minor had been with us, I entered my approbation to a letter written by Mr. Pope to a large number of the inhabitants of this district, assembled at a Mr. Belt's, about nine miles from this place.* On the morning of the 13th, I received a letter (No. 2) from Governor Gayoso, to which I immediately returned an answer (No. 3.) The ensuing evening, about eleven o'clock, I received a verbal message, by Mr. George Cochran, contractor for the United States at this post, from Governor Gayoso, requesting a private interview with me at the house of Mr. Cochran (which is in the neighborhood of the fort) at nine o'clock the next morning: to this I had no objection, as I supposed the object of the interview was to fall upon some plan of an accommodation. The next morning, being the 14th, I met Governor Gayoso, according to his request. He appeared much agitated at first, but soon became calm, and we entered upon the subject of the tumult in the country: he was desirous to know upon what terms the people would be willing to disperse. I proposed the outlines of an accommodation, to which he acceded. In order to prevail on Mr. Pope to consent to an interview with Governor Gayoso, I spoke to Mr. Cochran and several other of his friends, whose influence prevailed, and the interview took place at the Government house, about five o'clock in the afternoon; when, after some discussion, the Governor proposed the terms (No. 4) on which he was willing to accommodate with the people: Mr. Pope had some objections, but at length withdrew them. On Wednesday morning the Governor published the proclamation, (No. 5) founded in part upon the terms which were agreed upon at our interview. But this proclamation had not the desired effect; in some places it was torn to pieces. The words "candid repentance" rendered the whole obnoxious. The people considered themselves not only citizens of the United States, but supporting a virtuous and honorable cause; and, therefore, in no need of "repentance." As soon as I discovered that the proclamation had no effect, I gave the information to the Governor's adjutant, Major Minor. The business now put on a very serious aspect, and hostilities appeared inevitable. By this time the opposition to the Spanish Government had assumed some form; a number of respectable militia companies had elected their officers, and were ready to take the field. Friday, the 16th, it was agreed that a meeting of the principal inhabitants of the district should be held at Mr. Belt's on Tuesday, the 20th. In the mean time both sides continued their preparation. Companies of militia were forming and organizing in the country; and the Governor exerted himself by strengthening and reinforcing the fort. He called to his aid every person who would join him, either through attachment or fear: he was, nevertheless, too weak to attempt any offensive operations. On Saturday, the 17th, about ten o'clock at night, a Spanish patrole fell in with a patrole from our camp, and fired upon it: the fire was returned, but I believe that there was no damage done. On Sunday evening, the 18th, I received a verbal message from the Governor, by his adjutant, Major Minor, requesting a private interview with me the next morning, at the house of his adjutant; to which I consented without any hesitation. The next morning he left the fort and rode by a circuitous route to the adjutant's place, where I joined him. Our conversation immediately turned upon the state of the country; he assured me that he was very desirous of coming upon some terms of accommodation; and as he understood that I intended to attend the meeting the next day at Mr. Belt's, he requested that I would be so good to use my influence to bring about a compromise. I told him that was my object; and that a plan had already been agreed upon by Colonel Hutchins and myself, to check, and finally put an end to the present disturbance; but no terms could now be expected that were not honorable for the people: they had felt their strength, and would only agree to return home by being admitted to enjoy a state of neutrality, so far as it respected military operations, till the late treaty between His Catholic Majesty and the United States should be carried into effect. To this privilege I thought them entitled; but to go further would be impolitic, and probably attended with ruin to individuals, if not to the district. As the Governor did not appear dissatisfied with my observations, I took it for granted he would agree to a qualified neutrality. On Tuesday, the 20th, I attended the meeting at Mr. Belt's, which was large and respectable.

Here it was concluded that a committee should be appointed to take the situation of the country into consideration, and make arrangements with the Governor for restoring peace and tranquillity; which arrangements should, as a greater security to the people, be ratified by the Governor General, the Baron de Carondelet. Seven gentlemen were accordingly elected as the committee, and Mr. Pope and myself were requested by the same meeting, unanimously, to attend with them. The committee immediately wrote a note to the Governor, informing him of their election; to which the Governor returned a polite reply, expressing his happiness that this salutary measure was adopted: "On Wednesday, the 21st, the committee met and proceeded to business; and after much deliberation, and several interviews with the Governor, the propositions, (No. 6,) on the 22d, were agreed to, and confirmed by the parties. On the same day Mr. Pope and myself presented the Governor our engagement, (No. 7,) to co-operate with the committee, in preserving peace and good order in the country. On the 23d, the Governor's proclamation, (No. 8,) embracing the four propositions, was published, which gave general satisfaction, and once more restored tranquillity to the district. Thus ended this tumult without a single act of violence having been committed during the suspension of the government and laws, for the space of two weeks. From the Baron de Carondelet's proclamation of the 31st of May, it would appear that I had menaced the Spanish Government of Louisiana. This is wholly a misrepresentation, and calculated to answer the worst of purposes. Ever since I came into this country I have been a cultivator of peace and harmony between the Spanish and American Governments, for which I have been frequently censured by many citizens of the United States, who have come on to this place since the ratification of the late treaty between the United States and the King of Spain. But, when the late tumult began, I could not hesitate as to the part I should take; and, in taking the part I did, peace was my main object. If my endeavors have had the least share in bringing about the honorable compromise between the Governor and the people, I shall think myself amply rewarded for the trouble and anxiety I have experienced on that occasion."

* This letter from Lieutenant Pope has since been transmitted by Colonel Anthony Hutchins, of the Natchez, to the Department of State, and is as follows·

"NATCHEZ CAMP, June 12, 1797.

"Fellow-citizens of the district of Natchez:

"Having received information that a number of you will be collected at my friend Belt's, in conformity to an indirect invitation sent to you for that purpose, I have now positively to make the declaration to you that I have made this evening to Governor Gayoso, that I will at all hazards protect the citizens of the United States from every act of hostility; I mean all such as reside north of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, or within thirty-nine miles due south of the Natchez. I now, therefore, call on you, in the most solemn manner, to come forward, assert your rights, and you may rely on my sincere corroboration to accomplish that desirable object.

"I shall expect your assistance to repel any troops or hostile parties that make an attempt to land for the purpose of reinforcing this garrison, or other purposes detrimental to the inhabitants of this country.

"PIERCY S. POPE, Commanding U. S. troops, Natchez."

From the present alarming situation of this country I fully approve of Captain Pope's letter of this date to his fellow-citizens assembled at Mr. Belt's.

ANDREW ELLICOTT, Commissioner United States.

June 12, 1797.

The agreement between the committee and Governor Gayoso was, in due time, ratified by the Governor General, the Baron de Carondelet.

Mr. Ellicott, in his letter of September 12th, (which was received the 16th of November,) mentions that Governor Gayoso had succeeded the Baron de Carondelet as Governor and General-in-chief of Louisiana, and gone to New Orleans, and had committed the government of the Natchez district to Major Stephen Minor.

His communications relative to the Choctaw nations show their friendly disposition towards the United States, and determination to remain at peace. It appears that there is an unhappy dissension among the inhabitants of the Natchez; one party blaming, and the other decidedly justifying, the conduct of Mr. Ellicott, as uniformly calculated to maintain the tranquillity and happiness of the settlement. At the head of the former is Colonel Anthony Hutchins.

Mr. Ellicott pointedly denies the charge of the Spanish minister, that he intended to get possession of the Natchez fort by surprise; of which the minister, said Governor Gayoso, possessed the proofs; and far from evading an inquiry, desires Governor Gayoso to furnish the minister with all the evidences he possesses to substantiate the charge.

In his next letter, dated the 24th of September, Mr. Ellicott encloses a resolution, (No. 9,) of the permanent committee manifesting their confidence in him, and requesting him to represent the present situation of the district to the President of the United States, and also all the measures which, from his knowledge of the circumstances of the country, acquired by his residence there, he shall deem to be conducive to its future welfare, "in the event of the late treaty between His Catholic Majesty and the United States being carried fully into effect."

Mr. Ellicott has accordingly expressed his opinion, founded on very cogent reasons, that the form of government established for the Northwestern Territory will be the most proper for the Natchez district; with the exception respecting slaves, which was admitted when the same form of government was given to the territory south of the river Ohio, now the State of Tennessee. His information in this letter respecting the titles to the lands held in that country by the inhabitants will be useful when the introduction of a government there, under the authority of the United States, shall be contemplated.

By the communications in this despatch, it appears that the permanent committee, which are considered as an important part in the present administration of the affairs of the Natchez district, were chosen freely by the inhabitants, assembled with the consent of the Governor, and that they have his approbation for their steady zeal in promoting the peace of the country.

On the 28th of November I received Mr. Ellicott's letter of the 7th of October, at which time no change had taken place in affairs at Natchez.

He encloses the copy of a letter from Governor Gayoso, dated at New Orleans the 14th of September, in answer to one from Mr. Ellicott of the 6th, in which he referred to the representations of the Spanish minister, in his letter to me of the 24th of June last, (which, with other documents, was laid before Congress on the 3d of July) criminating Mr. Ellicott's conduct at the Natchez; particularly that he intended to possess himself of the Natchez fort by surprise; and desired the Governor to furnish the minister with those proofs which the minister had asserted to be in his possession. In the Governor's answer of September 14th, he says to Mr. Ellicott: I am sure the proofs in my possession, that the chevalier de Yrujo refers to, are the remainder of the copies of your letters to me which he then had not, but long before this must have received. You may be assured I never made any other construction upon your expressions than that which may be conceived by every person in the United States."

In the same letter, of September 6th, Mr. Ellicott says: "So far as I can judge at present, all the obstacles which occasioned the delay on your part, in ascertaining the boundary lines between His Catholic Majesty's provinces of East and West Florida, and the territory of the United States, are now removed: I therefore wish to be informed when you can, with convenience, proceed to the running of the lines above mentioned."

The Governor, in his answer of the 14th, says: "Those difficulties which alternatively have caused a suspension in the execution of that part of the treaty between His Majesty and the United States, in which we have the honor to be concerned, subsist yet; and the conduct of the Spanish officers is completely justified to the world by the publication of Mr. Blount's letter, and the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Liston. Until the King my master has those assurances which are necessary from the United States to secure the safety of this province, you cannot reasonably expect that I should be authorized to act in a different manner than hitherto. As soon as I receive orders, removing the present obstacles, I shall cheerfully proceed to the running of the boundary lines."

To this Mr. Ellicott replied, and recited the obstacles to the execution of the treaty which, at different times, had been presented by the Spanish Governors, and which he conceived to be completely removed by the declaration of the President in his message to Congress on the 12th of June, the uniform conduct of the United States in respect to the Indian nations, and the exhibition of facts respecting the pretended expedition of the English from Canada, and the navigation of the Mississippi.

Mr. Ellicott's next letter is dated at the Natchez the 27th of October, and was received the 5th instant. He says that country "is in great confusion," owing to the intrigues which have produced two parties among the people. He adds: "Congress at their last session, by not coming to any decision relative to this territory, has weakened the interest of the United States among the inhabitants more than you can conceive. It has been artfully propagated, from that circumstance, that the treaty, in all probability, will not be carried into effect, and the country remain, as heretofore, under the jurisdiction of His Catholic Majesty;" which belief is producing its natural consequences.

He represents the permanent committee as unwearied in their endeavors to promote peace and good order, and the characters of its members as among the first in that country for respectability; which is confirmed by the certificate (No. 10,) of the temporary Governor, Major Minor; which also shows that they are acknowledged, as an authorized body, by the Spanish Government.

His next letter is dated at the Natchez, the 14th of November, and was received the 4th instant. He details the different facts and circumstances which have led him to think that designs are carrying on in the district unfavorable to the interests of the United States.

Colonel Anthony Hutchins presented to the temporary Governor an application dated the 9th of August, setting forth that, although the inhabitants, in general, in their present state of neutrality, are well disposed, and submit "to the presiding authority and the prevailing laws that are now executed with mildness;" yet conceiving and firmly believing that the treaty between the United States and Spain will be carried into effect, "and that there is more than a probability that the United States will avail themselves of the claim of dominion to the 31st degree of North latitude; under which consideration they conceive it expedient to appoint a man of some abilities, with the appellation of Agent, to address Congress on important occasions, and that there may be also a committee of safety who may correspond with such agent, and, from time to time, communicate to him the sense and will of the people:" he, therefore, "in behalf of a very respectable number of the inhabitants of the Natchez, and, at their request, solicits for permission that elections may be held in the several districts, within that province and in the town of Natchez, to elect such agent and such committee of safety and correspondence, on the second of September," in the manner described by Colonel Hutchins in his application. This required that the alcaldes (or justices) should hold the elections, or, in their default, certain assistants, whom he names; and that the alcaldes and assistants should not be eligible; it also proposed to admit as voters all the inhabitants settled and residing in the district who were "not less than eighteen years of age."

To this request of Colonel Hutchins, the temporary Governor acceded, as appears by his act (No. 11,) dated the 16th of August.

"Immediately upon this being made public (says Mr. Ellicott) it excited considerable alarm, and was generally considered, by the well disposed inhabitants, as an artful measure, calculated to divide the people between the two committees, which, if effected, would, in all probability, end in a breach of the neutrality by one or other of the parties, and thereby produce the re-establishment of the Spanish Government." Under this impression, six of the ten subdivisions of which this district is composed, protested against the election; of course there were but four elections held agreeably to the permission. Among the reasons assigned in the protests against this proposed election, were these: 'Because (say the protesters) we dread the effect of such a precedent, which appears to us to involve the seeds of anarchy, and an open contempt of the authority invested in the committee, our only legal representatives.' 'Because, by the mode of election, not less than thirty of our most intelligent and respectable citizens are rendered incompetent to serve either as the said agent, or in the committee.' 'Because it is calculated to introduce a direct innovation in the principles of election, by admitting to the privilege of voting, persons of the age of eighteen.' And 'because neither the powers of the agent nor committee are properly defined.'

Mr. Ellicott states that the four persons elected in the other four subdivisions, "with Colonel Hutchins at their head," proceeded to business. Afterwards, another member was added by the nomination of ten voices in one subdivision, and a sixth was appointed by the subscription of fewer than thirty persons. The committee thus constituted, produced a very long "petition and memorial," addressed to the "House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled," of which Mr Ellicott has transmitted a copy, but of which it does not seem necessary to anticipate the presentation to Congress by the agent to whom it may, for that purpose, be committed. One object of the memorial seems to be to criminate the conduct of the American commissioner, Mr. Ellicott, and the commander of the troops, Captain Pope. But proofs accompany Mr. Ellicott's communications, that this part of the long memorial was concealed from many who subscribed it, and other testimonies in vindication of those officers. The exhibition of these documents, I have thought, might also be suspended until the "petition and memorial" were presented to Congress. It may, however, be proper to remark, that the memorial, as well as the proceedings of the regularly appointed permanent committee, view the actual establishment of a government at the Natchez, under the authority of the United States, as to take place only when its present state of neutrality shall cease; that is, when the Spanish jurisdiction shall be withdrawn. But, as this may happen when Congress is not in session, and, if in session, much time must elapse in the ordinary course of doing business, before the form of government proper to be introduced at the Natchez may be agreed on; considering, also, the further lapse of time before it can be organized and put in operation, in a country so remote from the seat of the General Government; it appears highly expedient that the subject should now be taken up, and the necessary arrangements made, to prevent the inconveniences and mischiefs which may result from leaving a population of five thousand persons, for any length of time, without the powers of government.

It remains for me to make a few remarks on the letters of the Spanish minister, of the 9th of October and 21st of November.

The principal object of the former appears to be to introduce some evidence to show that Mr. Ellicott and Lieutenant Pope had conducted, towards the Spanish Government, in a manner irregular, provoking, insulting, and, in some degree, hostile. He adduces, as proofs, the documents enclosed in his letter, and numbered from one to six.

The declaration that Governor Gayoso had positive advice that, in the camp of Lieutenant Pope, scaling ladders and arms were preparing, having for their object an assault on the Natchez fort, is perfectly new. I have never received an intimation of it from any other quarter. Besides, this charge rests only on "positive advice," not positive proof, and is, doubtless, without any proof.

Governor Gayoso, in his letter of the 13th of June to Lieutenant Pope, says he is informed that some of the inhabitants intended to attack the fort, and at his instigation, and asks whether he had stirred up the people to take the fort? or incited them to other hostile acts? To each of which questions Lieutenant Pope positively answers, no. To similar questions, put to Mr. Ellicott, he also peremptorily answers in the negative. The documents which the minister himself has furnished contain these questions and answers, and should have prevented the insinuation here noticed.

The other charge, in the same paragraph, that Mr. Ellicott and Lieutenant Pope, discouraged, by the firmness and vigilance of Governor Gayoso, from attempting to take the forts at the Natchez and Nogales (Walnut Hills) by force or surprise, they availed themselves of some profligate people to excite an insurrection, is alike void of foundation. The rise, progress, and issue of the insurrection is satisfactorily exhibited in Mr. Ellicott's letter of June 27th, from which copious extracts have been hereinbefore given. And, with respect to the fort at Walnut Hills, they could never have entertained the remotest idea of taking it in one way or the other, its situation being about one hundred miles from the Natchez, up the Mississippi, and its garrison composed of a force probably two or three times superior to that under the command of Lieutenant Pope.

The minister considers, as an insult towards the Spanish Government, the following expression of Mr. Ellicott, in his letter of the 13th of June, to Governor Gayoso: "The people cannot with propriety be censured for recurring to that conduct which will ultimately secure their felicity." "This (says he) is clearly an indirect attack upon the Spanish Government, as unjust as improper, on the part of an agent of a friendly nation."

It may be pertinent here to remark, that, when Mr. Ellicott was commissioned as the agent of the United States, nothing less was expected than that he would be obliged to enter upon a tedious controversy with the Spanish officers, on subjects really foreign to the business of his mission—that of running the boundary line between the territories of the two nations. If, after waiting several months to begin that operation; if, after being repeatedly promised that it should very soon be commenced; if, after repeated violations of these promises, and others relative to the evacuation of the forts, and procrastinations resting on a succession of pretences frivolous, unreasonable, and unfounded, Mr. Ellicott should have felt some irritation, and been provoked to some indiscreet acts, it would not be surprising. Whether, however, any part of his conduct merits the character of indiscretion, may be determined by the documents now and formerly exhibited; for he has not sought concealment.

But if the inhabitants thought what Mr. Ellicott expressed, that a change from the jurisdiction of Spain to that of the United States "would ultimately secure their felicity," it may be accounted for by a few facts, which will justify both one and the other.

It is well known that the inhabitants of the Natchez district consist chiefly of persons who were formerly British subjects, and their descendants, and of emigrants from the United States. All these, born and educated under forms of government so essentially different from that of an absolute monarchy, and especially in all criminal and civil causes accustomed to a mode of trial peculiarly dear to the inhabitants of England and of the United States, and which the constitutions of the latter have so formally and scrupulously guarantied—the trial by jury—the inhabitants also being nearly all protestants, and, in the United States, persons of all persuasions enjoying the most perfect religious as well as civil liberty, they could not be indifferent to, it is impossible that they should not prefer, a jurisdiction which would perfectly secure to them both their civil and religious rights. I need not remark, that, under the Spanish Government, trial by jury is unknown, and, at the Natchez, the Governor was the legislator and the judge, and regulated and restrained their civil and religious rights. As an instance, might be cited Governor Gayoso's proclamation of the 29th of March, 1797, numbered 15, in the documents which were laid before Congress on the 12th of June last. By that act he suspends the collection of debts, and restrains, to private meetings, the exercise of any other than the Catholic religion. These are his words: "This being the season in which the planters are employed in preparing for an ensuing crop, none shall be disturbed from that important object on account of their depending debts." "Liberty of conscience is hereby positively explained to be, that no individual of this Government shall be molested on account of religious principles, and that they shall not be hindered in their private meetings; but no other public worship will be allowed but that generally established in all His Majesty's dominions, which is the Catholic religion."

The minister also complains that Mr. Ellicott and Mr. Pope interfered in political matters; because they engaged themselves to co-operate with the committee appointed to preserve the peace, and to obtain the due execution of justice, and approved of the propositions presented to Governor Gayoso. But a recurrence to the foregoing narrative, extracted from Mr. Ellicott's letter of the 27th of June, and the documents he refers to, will show that both were requested to interfere, and that they were called on by the Governor to be consulted on the means of putting an end to the insurrection, and that the result of that consultation was a plan of accommodation—a proposal of measures which (as asserted in another document not before quoted*) "through the influence of Mr. Ellicott and Captain Pope, were adopted."

A few words on the Spanish minister's letter, of the 21st of November, will conclude this report.

Referring to his letter of the 6th of May, and to my answer of the 17th, (which are among the documents laid before Congress, on the 17th of May) he says, "His Catholic Majesty has not observed, in the said answer from you, any reason to induce him to change his opinion concerning the injuries resulting to his subjects, from the stipulations of the English treaty, compared with those of the treaty with Spain, as well on the subject of the articles of contraband, as on the principle adopted in ours. "That free ships shall make free goods," &c.

"But what has most astonished His Majesty, and confirmed him in the justice of his pretensions, is what you have said, in your answer, with regard to the navigation of the Mississippi."

It is much to be regretted that difficulties should be raised, and persevered in, on questions so plain and easy to decide. Without entering again into a particular discussion of this subject, a single fact, which, on the 17th of May, I supposed probable, and which I am now authorized to assert, is sufficient to obviate all the objections and arguments which have been adduced by the Spanish Minister. It is this: That when the treaty between the United States and Spain was negotiated by Mr. Pinckney with the Prince of Peace, the latter was furnished with an entire copy of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and Great Britain: consequently it is, to the last degree, preposterous for the Spanish Government now to complain that the treaty with Great Britain rejected the principle that "free ships made free goods," or that it extended the list of contraband. With a perfect knowledge of the articles of the British treaty, on these points, if the Spanish Government had any objections to make, that was the time; and to have refused to enter into different stipulations with the United States; but having, notwithstanding, voluntarily entered into them, it cannot now offer and insist on such objections, without a manifest departure from the principles of candor and good faith.

The same observations will apply to the question concerning the navigation of the Mississippi.

In the first place, the Spanish Government, when its treaty of peace with Great Britain was concluded, at Paris, on the 3d of September, 1783, by which West Florida was ceded to Spain, well knew that by the provisional treaty between Great Britain and the United States, concluded at Paris, the 30th of November, 1782, the articles of which constituted the definitive treaty of peace between these two Powers—it was stipulated that "The navigation of the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, shall forever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States." And yet, even this stipulation, which was inviolably binding on the United States, by the provisional articles before mentioned, nine months before West Florida was ceded to Spain, is now strangely objected to by the Spanish minister, and as a reproach to the United States!

In the next place, when our treaty with Spain was concluded, on the 27th of October, 1795, the Spanish Government possessed the like perfect knowledge, that eleven months preceding, viz: on the 19th of November, 1794, in the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and Great Britain, the above stipulation of 1782 and 1783 was recognized in these words: "The river Mississippi shall, however, according to the treaty of peace, be entirely open to both parties." And, on this occasion, the Spanish Government did object; it wished the United States to enter into a mutual stipulation with Spain for the purpose of excluding Great Britain from the navigation of the Mississippi: but the minister of the United States explicitly refused to do it; and, in writing, assigned the reason: that it would violate the good faith of the United States previously pledged to Great Britain: and the Spanish Government gave up this objection, or the minister of the United States would not have concluded the treaty. How truly astonishing it is, after all this, that the United States should be reproached for the stipulation with Great Britain, respecting the navigation of the Mississippi! And as having thereby offended and insulted Spain! And how long is our patience to be abused by such unfounded charges?

But although the Chevalier de Yrujo, in his argument, upon this point, refers alike to our treaty of peace with Great Britain, in 1783, to our treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, in 1794, and to the explanatory article of the latter, concluded on the 4th of May, 1796; yet, in the end, as if conscious that his observations, as applied to the two former, were impertinent, he confines his charge to the latter, and says that, "His Catholic Majesty has just motives for being offended with the explanatory article, signed on the 4th of May, 1796." But neither does this explanatory article contain any new stipulation. It recognizes the principle, that a subsequent treaty cannot annul any stipulation of a prior treaty, and declares that the subjects of His Britannic Majesty, and the citizens of the United States, and the Indians, dwelling on either side of the boundary line between the two Powers, "shall remain at full liberty freely to pass and re-pass, by land or inland navigation, into the respective territories and countries of the contracting parties, on either side of the said boundary line; and freely to carry on trade and commerce with each other, according to the stipulations of the said third article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation:" Thus recurring to, and resting upon, the treaty of November 19, 1794; which, as above observed, the chevalier himself finally abandoned, as affording no cause of complaint, and without which the explanatory article itself would be a nullity.

NEW ORLEANS, May 31, 1797.

The Government being informed, by His Majesty's ambassador to the United States of America, that an expedition assembled on the lakes was intended to attack the Illinois, has judged necessary, for the surety and tranquillity of Lower Louisiana, to suspend the evacuation of the posts of Natchez and the Walnut Hills, being the only posts that cover it; the possession of which will put the English in a situation to disturb and ravage the country, in case they render themselves masters of Upper Louisiana, with so much more facility, as by an article of the treaty, concluded posteriorly with Great Britain, the United States acknowledge that the English may freely navigate and frequent the posts, belonging to the said States, situated on the rivers in general, lakes, &c.; being a manifest contradiction with the treaty concluded with Spain, which it appears to annul; because, by this, the United States acknowledge that no other nation can navigate upon the Mississippi without the consent of Spain.

Notwithstanding the legitimacy of these motives, the suspension has been represented to the Congress of the United States, with all the necessary veracity, and intimated by our orders to the commissary of limits, as well as to the commandant of the detachment of American troops, now at Natchez. We are now informed that a detachment of the army of the United States, cantoned on the Ohio, are on their way by Holstein towards Natchez, while the militia of Cumberland are intimated to hold themselves ready to march at the first notice.

These hostile dispositions can naturally only concern these provinces, because the United States are in peace with all the savages. The anterior menaces of the commissary of limits and the commandant of the detachment of Americans now at Natchez; the immediate rupture (and if the American gazettes are to be believed) already effected between France, our intimate ally, and the United States, engage us to be on our guard to defend our property with that valor and energy which the inhabitants of these provinces have manifested on all occasions, with the advantage and superiority which a knowledge of our local situation will procure, and with that confidence which right and justice inspires. If the Congress of the United States had no hostile intention against these provinces, they will either leave the post of Natchez, or the Walnut Hills, the only bulwarks of Lower Louisiana to stop the course of the British, or if that they give us security against the article of the treaty with Great Britain, which exposes Lower Louisiana to be pillaged and destroyed down to the capital, we will then deliver up the said posts, and lay down our arms, which they have forced us to take up, by arming their militia in time of peace, and sending a considerable body of troops by round-about ways to surprise us.

Governor Gayoso de Lemos to Andrew Ellicott, Esquire.

NATCHEZ, June 13, 1797.

SIR:

By repeated informations, and by every appearance, it seems past a doubt that a number of the inhabitants of this Government, subjects of His Majesty, are at present in a state of rebellion, with the hostile design of attacking this fort.

I am informed that yesterday several of the said insurgents were riding through the country soliciting subscribers to a list that already contained the names of several persons who declared themselves citizens of the United States of America, though they are actually under oath of allegiance to His Majesty, and under whose dominion and protection they have lived and enjoyed the benefits thereof, and the bearers of this list declare themselves commissioned by you for that purpose.

I cannot prevail upon myself to believe that you have either authorized or encouraged such proceedings, as a conduct of that nature would unavoidably produce the most disagreeable and fatal misunderstanding between our nations, and the total destruction of this district.

Therefore I request you to give me such a positive answer as will enable me to inform the Commander General of this province for the intelligence of His Majesty, of the part you take in these transactions. And should you take such an active part as it is represented you do, from this moment I protest, in the name of the said Commander General, against such conduct, and make you answerable for the fatal consequences that may ensue. I repeat the request of a positive answer on this subject.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 3.

Andrew Ellicott, Esquire, to Governor Gayoso de Lemos.

NATCHEZ, June 13, 1797.

SIR:

In order to answer your letter of this day, that (from the spirit of it) denies the existence of that principle which has been the object of a long train of discussion between us, I must refer to your letter dated the 12th of March last. In that letter you admit not only that Daniel Clarke's will be about the point of demarcation, but that the commissioner of His Catholic Majesty would, in all probability, meet me at that place. As the treaty itself was a fact notorious, so likewise ought to be all the transactions attending it either in direct performance or open violation. The people, therefore, became acquainted with those circumstances that were the result either of my observations, or the acquiescence of the Spanish Government. They were matters that involved their felicity, and could not from duty or decency be withheld. If on the present occasion, the people have thought proper to act in conformity to the intelligence received, which intelligence had the combined sanctions of the agents of both Governments for its support, is my agency to be ascribed, or my conduct to be called to account with regard to the effects? A little inquiry into the human heart would have enabled you, sir, to have discovered a more powerful cause than any operation of mine on the present occasion. The people considered themselves citizens of the United States; they had a right to consider themselves so; and they have lately come forward individually to express their wishes and intentions.

After this short detail of what is the real cause of the present disturbance, I might flatter myself with a complete acquittal on your part, did not the first paragraph of your last letter compel me to form a different conclusion. On what principle do you still retain the idea, that the citizens of this country are subjects of His Catholic Majesty? Is there not a compact deliberately entered into by the two nations to the contrary of your opinion? Have not you acknowledged me to be the agent of the United States to carry that compact into effect? And have you not repeatedly pledged your word to co-operate with me in that desirable object? Here I might with propriety ask, What human assurances could have gone further than those that have been made on your part? Do all solemn obligations between nations depend upon chance, or caprice? Or is there such a principle universally acknowledged among different nations as the law of nature and nations? If your excellency admits that there is such a principle as national law, I assert that the inhabitants of this country cannot be considered as any wise subjects of the Spanish monarchy. If you deny the existence of the principle, I have only to observe that the people cannot, with propriety, be censured for recurring to that conduct which will ultimately secure their felicity.

I have thus far proceeded by way of argument in answer to your communication, from the whole of which you will readily infer a very natural conclusion, that the delay on your part in carrying the late treaty into effect, added to the invariable nature of the human heart, have produced the evils of which you complain.

But since you demand a positive reply to the general question, whether I am concerned in measures destructive of His Catholic Majesty's interest, or in an attempt to attack the fort, I give you my honor that I am not. You have assisted me in confirming the sentiment that this territory belongs to the United States; and I do now, therefore, on the part of the said United States, as their agent, most solemnly and pointedly protest against the landing of any troops, or the reparation of any fortifications in this territory above the 31st degree of north latitude, as I shall consider all such conduct as a violation of the treaty, and an immediate attack upon the honor and dignity of my country.

I shall now finally observe that, from your verbal message by your adjutant, Major Minor, I expected that your excellency would have proposed some scheme of accommodation that would have been consistent with the justice and sentiment of the countries we have the honor to serve.

Should you have any proposals to make for an accommodation, I assure you that I feel every wish to enter into a discussion for that purpose. I am, &

Statement of the principles on which I find myself disposed, according to my duty, to put in practice for the tranquillity of the country.

1st. That all the people in general now collected or are collecting in bodies, shall disperse and return to their farms, and continue peaceably their domestic business.

2d. That, by so doing, it is warranted to them that they shall not be prosecuted for the present disturbance.

3d. That, as an explanation, to banish some doubtful apprehensions that perhaps has given rise to the present disturbance, I assure the public there are no preparations against them; that the detachment of troops coming up the river is not intended for this place, and are to proceed to their destination; nor have I ordered any troops from Nogales to reinforce me.

4th. That no Indians have been called, that no roads have been or shall be stopped.

5th. That there is no war declared between His Catholic Majesty and the United States; on the contrary it is the intention of His Majesty to continue the best harmony between the two nations, in consequence thereof I have not the least idea of acting in a hostile manner against any force or persons belonging to the United States; and whilst this good intelligence subsists between the two nations, no alteration shall be made on these principles; on the contrary, I shall employ my greatest exertions to make every resident of this Government as happy as possible; further I declare that they shall not be embodied as militia, but against an invasion of this country; and if military bodies shall be wanted out of this district, they shall only be formed by volunteers.

Don Manuel Gayoso de Lemos, Brigadier in the Royal Armies, Governor Military and Political of Natchez and its Dependencies, &c. &c. &c.

NATCHEZ, June 14, 1797.

Whereas the confusion in which the country is at present involved threatens the entire destruction of its inhabitants; it is our duty to employ every means to save them from certain ruin, which will be inevitable if they do not listen to the salutary advice which the voice of humanity dictates to our constant attention to the welfare of every individual of this Government; lenity in its greatest extent accompanies the obedience that is required, and general forgiveness will be the fruit of a candid repentance, and the exact compliance with the following conditions.

From the day after the publication of the present proclamation, all persons collected in bodies, or are collecting for any purpose not sanctioned by us, will immediately disperse, and every individual retire to the place of his residence, attend to his farm, or other occupation, in a peaceable manner, and consider himself in the same light as before the present disturbance, never to assemble again upon the same principles as the present, nor consider themselves as bound to do it, when called upon similar purposes, whilst under the Government and laws of His Majesty.

Any persons who from attachment to the Government and laws of His Majesty, and with a view to prevent the impending calamity, should have assembled in bodies, are likewise to disperse.

No person shall ever be upbraided on account of his differing in opinion with any other, which, when not carried to excess, is allowed to every man, when it is not injurious to the Government, and consequently to the community in general.

By so complying a general forgiveness is warranted to every person who has been concerned in the present disturbance, and no inquiry shall be made for their names.

It has been represented to us that the present commotion has partly arisen from the following apprehensions:

That a war might be actually declared between His Majesty and the United States of America.

That forces were accumulating here to treat with rigor those inhabitants who have manifested a partiality for the Government of the United States, and that Indians had been called upon for their assistance.

That the roads and water communications were stopped; and that the inhabitants were to be compelled to embody into military corps.

To banish these unfounded apprehensions, and finally tranquillize the minds of the people, we do hereby assure them that no war exists between His Majesty and the United States; but on the contrary the most friendly intercourse is recommended to both nations. No forces are accumulating here, and those for Nogales* are for the sole purpose of opposing an actual enemy. No Indians have been called. No interruptions have or shall be put to land or water communications; and under the present situation of this country, no corps of militia shall be formed; but if any should be wanted, out of the district, volunteers only shall be called for, except in case of an invasion, either by water or by land within the extent of this Government; in which case natural defence and general safety admits of no exceptions.

The alcaldes in each district, or persons commissioned for the purpose of promulging this proclamation are hereby ordered to make it public with all possible expedition, that it may produce the desirable good effect.

Given under my hand and the seal of my arms, and countersigned by the Secretary of this Government.

Don Manuel Gayoso De Lemos, Brigadier General in the Royal Armies, Governor Military and Political of Natchez and its Dependencies, &c.

NATCHEZ, June 22, 1797.

SIR:

The following propositions being unanimously agreed to by us the underwritten (being a committee appointed by a very numerous and respectable meeting of the inhabitants of this district) and A. Ellicott, a citizen and commissioner of the United States, and P. S. Pope, commanding the United States' troops on the Mississippi, are submitted to your excellency, with a request that you may accede to and transmit a copy of the same to the Baron de Carondelet, and obtain his concurrence, in order to restore tranquillity to this district.

1st. The inhabitants of the district of Natchez, who, under the belief and persuasion that they were citizens of the United States, agreeably to the late treaty, have assembled and embodied themselves, are not to be prosecuted or injured for their conduct on that account, but to stand exonerated and acquitted.

2d. The inhabitants of the Government aforesaid above the 31st degree of north latitude, are not to be embodied as militia, or called upon to aid in any military operation, except in case of an Indian invasion, or for the suppression of riots during the present state of uncertainty, owing to the late treaty between the United States and His Catholic Majesty not being fully carried into effect.

3d. The laws of Spain, in the above district, shall be continued, and, on all occasions, be executed with mildness and moderation, nor shall any of the inhabitants be transported as prisoners, out of this Government, on any pretext whatever; and, notwithstanding the operation of the law aforesaid, is hereby admitted, yet the inhabitants shall he considered to be in an actual state of neutrality during the continuance of their uncertainty, as mentioned in the second proposition.

4th. The committee aforesaid do engage to recommend it to our constituents, and to the utmost of our power endeavor to preserve the peace and promote the due execution of justice.

We are your most obedient and humble servants,

A. HUTCHINS,
BERNARD LINTOT.

NATCHEZ, June 22, 1797.

Whereas the threatening calamities to which the inhabitants of this district have been lately exposed, did awake the zeal of every individual, and rouse them to seek the most efficacious means of re-establishing good order and that tranquillity which, for many days, was lost; the good sense of a number of the inhabitants dictated to them the necessity of a convention, in which they chose persons of the most notorious probity and intelligence as a committee to co-operate with us towards the re-establishment of the public peace and tranquillity; and the members of the said committee having met at Natchez, after due deliberations and consultations, stated and presented us the following propositions, in the terms and form here expressed, to wit. [Then follow the propositions No. 6.]

Being always desirous of promoting the public good, we do join in the same sentiment with the committee, by acceding to their propositions in the manner following. [See the propositions No. 6.]

JOSEPH BERNARD, Chairman.

COMMITTEE ROOM, September 14, 1797.

The Hon. ANDREW ELLICOTT, Esq.
Commissioner of the U. S. for running the boundary line, &c.

Resolved, 1. That the 5th resolve of the 29th ultimo be rescinded, and that Mr. Ellicott, whose inclination for the interest and happiness of this country we have a convincing proof of, in his former communications to the General Government, published since, and now in our hands, and who, from his residence for several months amongst us, is well acquainted with the circumstances of this country, be requested to represent our present situation to his excellency the President of the United States, and likewise all the measures which he shall deem to be conducive to the future welfare of this country, in the event of the late treaty between His Catholic Majesty and the United States being carried fully into effect.

No. 12.

The Chevalier de Yrujo, Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, &c. &c. to Timothy Pickering, Esq. Secretary of State.

SIR:

Your additional report to the President of the United States of the proceedings of the officers of the King of Spain, in relation to the post and the running of the boundary line, which I find published in all the newspapers, obliges me to trouble you with this letter. If your discussion of facts had been as correct and impartial as there was reason to expect, I should not have been under the necessity of undertaking this task; but the construction which you are pleased to put upon every act of the Spanish officers in general, and especially upon those in which I am personally concerned, compels me to observe upon several expressions, which I have noticed in your said report.

You begin, sir, with saying, "that although I had declared I had just reasons for suspecting an expedition from Canada was preparing by the British against the upper parts of Louisiana, yet I never had mentioned a single fact or reason on which my suspicion was founded." In my letter of the 2d of March, I pointed out to you the probable route which the expedition would take, and in our conference of the 27th of February, I gave you information that a corps of three hundred and fifty men had been raised at Montreal, and marched towards the lakes, where, after the evacuation of the American forts, there was no ostensible object for them. I also told you that I knew that the British agents had treated with some of the Indian nations in that country, concerning the intended expedition, and I added, that I had received those advices from a person who might be depended on, who had seen those new levies passing through Johnstown, on their way to the westward. But, even supposing that I had not entered into any particulars, even supposing that my information at that period was not complete, yet did not the interest and dignity of this Government, did not its friendly connexion with Spain, require that it should have taken every proper means to prevent the attempt we were threatened with, by giving suitable orders to General Wilkinson, or to the commanding officers of the military force on those frontiers? The absolute silence in this particular of the documents which accompany the report of the Secretary of War, your never having communicated to me any determinate disposition on this point, as you do in your answer to my letter, which in the publication is marked No. 7. afford me sufficient grounds to fear that these precautions were omitted. You add, sir, with a degree of candor difficult to be conceived, that from my not having given to you detailed information respecting the expedition, and from the answer which you received on the 19th ultimo, from the British minister, you believed my suspicions to be groundless. Is it possible, that any one will candidly imagine, that if the English intended to violate the territory of the United States, in order to effect a coup de main, they would be as ingenuous in answering, as you were in asking their minister the question?

I shall not enter into all the observations which suggest themselves to my mind from your having communicated to Mr. Liston the contents of my letters. I expected that the American Government would have watched his motions, and taken the means which I have already mentioned to prevent the success of a similar enterprise; but I never could have imagined that you would have given to the British minister a piece of advice, which might enable him to alter his plan, by letting him know that the former one was discovered. By the line of conduct which you have pursued in this business, I am convinced, that had I communicated to you more particular details respecting this transaction, you would, with the same good natured frankness, have given information of them to Mr. Liston.

But, if you did believe that asking this question of the British envoy was the most efficacious means to prevent the violation of the neutrality of the United States, and the invasion of the Spanish territory, let me ask why you was so remiss in this measure, that, although I had communicated this project to you verbally, on the 27th of February, and on the 2d of March, in writing, yet, in a manner obviously so urgent, you only wrote to the British envoy on the 28th of April, that is, two months afterwards?

I shall not quit this subject, without taking the liberty of making to you one observation which is intimately connected with it. By the date of the letter I have just mentioned, it evidently appears that I gave you advice of this intended expedition on the second of March, and that three days before, I had given you the same information verbally. I imagined from your known attention to business, and the importance of the subject, that you would have submitted it immediately to the consideration of the President of the United States. On the 9th of March, I had the honor of speaking to Mr. Adams, at his lodgings at Francis's hotel, and mentioned this subject as a matter that I supposed him already fully informed of; and, it was with no small surprise I heard him say, that he knew nothing about it. I produced the map, which I had in my pocket-book, and he listened with great attention to all that I had to say to him. It was no doubt, to this conference with Mr. Adams, that I was indebted to your answer of the 11th of the same month. I shall entirely abstain from putting any construction upon the reasons which induced you to omit making this communication to the President; but they must have been very powerful motives which could oblige you to remain so long silent on a matter of such importance.

You say, in the third paragraph of your report, that on your asking me what measures Spain had taken in order to carry into execution that part of the treaty which relates to the withdrawing the garrisons, I answered you on the 17th of April, that I had been for some months without receiving letters from the Baron, and consequently "was entirely ignorant of the steps which had been taken for the execution of the treaty." From this expression, which, in order to draw attention, you place between inverted commas, you insinuate an inference which, in my opinion, is very far from being true, when you add, immediately afterwards: "Nevertheless, he had previously informed the Baron of his suspicions of a projected expedition." What is this to prove, sir? That the Baron indeed had received my letters, but not that I had received his. The irregularity and uncertainty of navigation easily shows that your logic on this point is extremely false.

In the fifth paragraph, after giving an account of my letter of the 24th ultimo, and of its object, you observe that I have omitted to mention, among the other complaints of the Baron, that of Mr. Ellicott's not having given him notice of his arrival at Natchez. Permit me, sir, to represent to you, that you have entirely mistaken what I had the honor of telling you on that occasion, for I simply mentioned, not as a complaint, but as a mere observation, that the Baron, in the rigor, might not have considered Mr. Ellicott as an American commissioner, for not having given him, on his arrival, official notice of his appointment, having merely informed him of it in the way of a confidential communication. You cannot be ignorant, sir, that there are certain requisite formalities when nations treat with one another of their mutual concerns, which are not required between individuals. The Baron, when he speaks in this manner, clearly points out his meaning, that, besides the confidential letter, the communication of which you consider as so important, no doubt he expected another official one, including his commission, authority, or some other document, to ascertain the identity of the person, and the object of his mission. When, on my arrival in this country, I had not yet presented my credentials to the President, although I had delivered to you a copy of them, you might, in the rigor, not have recognized me as the envoy extraordinary of the King my master, for want of having complied with that necessary requisite of the established etiquette. I do not mean to say that in the present case it was absolutely necessary to go through a similar formality; nor did the Baron mention this but as a mere matter of observation, which was not to affect the object in question, although you, thinking that it affords you a victorious argument, are pleased to give to this circumstance an importance which it does not deserve. Besides, sir, I might observe to you, that when, after a mixed and desultory conversation upon various subjects, I had collected and methodized my ideas, and committed them to writing, your answer and observations ought to have been confined to the written communication, clothed with all the necessary formalities; but neither do I wish to make of this an object of discussion.

The proof which you give in the sixth paragraph of your report, to show that it is not certain that Mr. Ellicott intended to get possession of Natchez by surprise, and that, for that purpose, he had endeavored to gain over the inhabitants, is merely negative. From your examination of the two persons you mention, you had very little to expect: the circumstance alone of their being the bearers of Mr. Ellicott's despatches, points out that they were both in his confidence; and it may be presumed, without temerity, that being his friends, or employed under his orders, they would hardly make a denunciation that might be prejudicial to him. Governor Gayoso declares that he has proofs of the fact in his power. I shall not fail to apply to him for them, and perhaps I may one day speak to you more positively on this business.

After having discussed the history of these transactions with all the force and accuracy which result from these observations, you assure, with a very ill grounded confidence, that upon a view of the whole it appears that His Majesty's governors on the Mississippi have, on various pretences, postponed the running of the boundary line and the evacuation of the posts. But I appeal to that candor which you have so generously shown to the British minister, that you may tell me, whether it can be called a pretence, that the Baron de Carondelet, who was intrusted with the safety of Louisiana, refused to carry into execution a pretension that was not stipulated for by the treaty? By the second article, it is only agreed that the garrisons shall be withdrawn; and as I had the honor of representing to you in my letter of the 24th ultimo, it is not to be presumed that it could ever have been the intention of His Catholic Majesty to deliver up fortifications, which, besides that they have cost him considerable sums of money, may, by the effect of political vicissitudes, be one day prejudicial to his subjects. If not to do what was not stipulated for, and the execution of which would be contrary to the interests of Spain, is a pretence, we must confess that it is a very plausible one.

With respect to the line of demarcation, it appears by the correspondence and letters of the Baron de Carondelet, which are in my possession, that although he entertained the same doubts which were suggested by Governor Gayoso respecting the posts, yet he was consenting that the astronomical observations should be begun upon, for which purpose the engineer Mr. de Guillemard had already arrived at Natchez, with all the instruments and apparatus. Such was the situation of things when my communications respecting the intended expedition got to hand; and from that moment imperious necessity, and the great principle of self defence, made His Catholic Majesty's officers turn their thoughts to objects of a more urgent nature. Mr. Blount's letter, and the late detected conspiracy, evince how far their conduct in this respect was necessary; and you, sir, possessed as you were, of all the facts, when you laid the facts before the President, ought to have been one of the last to have stigmatized the motives with the epithet of pretexts. So palpable an attempt to make groundless and unfair impressions on the public mind is well calculated to defeat its own ends, and appears still more extraordinary when we consider that the American Government is in every way anxious, by its own confession, to maintain peace and harmony with Spain.

Nor do your ill-founded insinuations stop here; sentiments and expressions still more violent flow from that same hasty pen. You say, in another part, that there is but too much reason to believe Mr. Ellicott's suspicions well founded, that an undue influence has been exercised over the Indians by the officers of His Catholic Majesty, to prepare them for a rupture with the United States. Fortunately, sir, you have told us the source whence you derived all those dreadful conjectures of yours; otherwise, perhaps, the weight and authority which your high official character stamps upon whatever you write or say, might make an undue impression on the public. You acknowledge, sir, it was a private letter of Mr. Sargent's (Secretary of the Northwestern territory) that gave rise to your surmises: we shall now see what the letter says.

Extract of a letter from Winthrop Sargent, Esq. Secretary of the Northwestern Territory, to the Secretary of State, dated

"CINCINNATI, June 3, 1797.

"General Wilkinson sending off an express, I seize the occasion to transcribe for you some paragraphs from a western letter.

"The Spaniards are reinforcing their upper posts on the Mississippi considerably. General Howard, an Irishman, in quality of Commander-in-chief, with upwards of three hundred men, is arrived at St. Louis, and employed in erecting very formidable works. It likewise appears, through various channels, that they are inviting a great number of Indians of the territory to cross the Mississippi; and, for this express purpose, Mr. Lorromie, an officer in the pay of the Crown, made a tour through all this country last fall, since which time several Indians have been sent on the same errand, and generally furnished with plenty of cash to defray their expenses.

"A large party of Delawares passed down on White river about the 6th of May, on their way to the Spanish side, bearing the national flag of Spain, some of them from Saint Louis.

"They (the Spaniards) have above the mouth of the Ohio, on the Mississippi, several row galleys with cannon."

Now, sir, what inference can be drawn from that letter? Why, that the Spaniards have fortified San Luis, and availed themselves of every means of defence that the country afforded. But let me ask you, sir, against whom it is that they were thus preparing to defend themselves? Surely the documents which you have laid before the President, and the momentous business which now engages the attention of Congress, and agitates the public at large, afford a complete and satisfactory answer.

I mentioned to you, in my letter of 2d March, that the object of the British was to attack Upper Louisiana, and take San Luis and New Madrid by surprise. It will not be questioned but that prudence required of us, at that juncture, to fortify the threatened points. This, sir, was all we did; and this, sir, you knew many months past: yet Mr. Sargent's letter, which in substance says no more, fills you all at once with fears and self-created apprehensions, and makes you declare, in the face of the American people, "that the Spanish officers are exciting the Indians to a rupture with us." No one will say, that preparations for our self-defence were not necessary on our part. The assurance given you by the British minister, with all the appearance of a confidential communication, but without any signature, did not inspire the servants of His Catholic Majesty with the same blind confidence which it produced in you. We know from daily experience, how religiously the British nation observes the rights of neutrality. Witness the American sailors! Witness the republic of Genoa, in whose port they attacked and made prize of the French frigate La Modeste, as she lay at anchor there. Witness the inhabitants of Trinidad, when the British, though then in amity with them, entered their capital, with drums beating and colors flying, in pursuit of a few French who had taken refuge there. These, and other instances of the sort, too numerous to be recapitulated, make us less credulous on the score of Great Britain's respect for the rights of neutrality than you appear to have been.

As to those tender considerations which actuated the British minister to reject the plan, on account of the inhumanity of calling in the aid of the Indians, I did expect that such vague, unauthenticated declarations would have been appreciated as they deserved by you, sir, who fought in the glorious cause of American independence, who witnessed the humanity of their conduct in the course of that war, and who cannot be ignorant of what has happened since.

Your ascribing hostile views to the preparations for our self-defence cannot, sir, have been matter of much surprise to me, after having heard a certain member of Congress, who is known to be the organ of the will of administration, declare, in that House, that he ascribed to the same motives the preparations we were making for the defence of Florida, though probably he was not ignorant, at that very time, of their real object. Thus, then, sir, according to your mode of reasoning, and that of the gentleman I have just alluded to, though we were certain of being attacked, and though we were not certain that the American Government had taken the proper measures for protecting its neutrality, yet we were to adopt no measures for our defence, but tamely suffer His Majesty's forts and possessions to be taken, and all this for fear of creating ill-founded suspicions in your minds!

If you have not been very successful, sir, in the solidity of your reasonings, you appear not to be more so in the method of following them. After having denounced us to the whole American nation as stirring up the Indians against the United States, and preparing them for a rupture, you fall into the most glaring inconsistency in the following paragraph: Whether this plan of exciting the Indians to direct hostilities against the United States has been contemplated and promoted by any of our own citizens, it may be difficult to say; but that one or more of those citizens have proposed and taken measures to detach the Southern Indians from the interests of the United States, and to destroy the influence of the public agents over those nations, and thus to defeat the great objects of their appointment, the chief of which is to preserve peace, is certain.

I again appeal here, sir, to your generous candor: how is it possible to reconcile such evident contradictions? On the one hand, the Spanish officers are those who excite the Southern Indians against the United States, and, on the other, you quickly follow, presuming, with sufficient foundation, in my opinion, that it may be some citizens of the United States. But, although you might entertain any doubts yourself on the subject, which I am sure no person in America will, after reading Mr. Blount's letter, did not this very same doubtful case and uncertainty require, in your situation, more circumspect language? And, if even in this case you appear to have gone beyond what sound policy, the tranquillity and interest of the United States required, how much more unjust are your insinuations against Spain, when the public possess, in Mr. Blount's letter, a document by which they can see that, if the manœuvres with the Indians were not favorable to the United States, they were precisely combined to attack the Spaniards? From this method of reasoning of yours, it appears as if the Spaniards were, jointly with Mr. Blount, stirring up the Indians to attack themselves.

Respecting the last article of your report I have only to observe, that, although you have constantly assured me that Government had not the least information respecting the subject of my representations, and although the letter of Mr. Jackson, of Georgia, appears to coincide with your ideas, nevertheless, time has shown that I have complied with my duty, by not reposing on such assurances. The plot is discovered, and nobody any longer doubts that the expedition was to have taken place.

After having followed you step by step through the various points of your report to the President, I shall make a short compendium of such as arise from this letter; from which it results—

1. That, on the 27th of February, I gave you sufficient particulars respecting the intended expedition, to have attracted the attention of this Government.

2. That, although to this verbal communication I added another in writing on the 2d of March, the President had not the least knowledge of it on the ninth of the same month; and that, without doubt, you must have had very powerful motives to prevent you from communicating it to him.

3. That it does not appear, by the documents presented by the Secretary of War, that Government had given orders to the military commanders to cause the territory and neutrality of the United States to be respected.

4. That you made to the English minister a communication, which, in my opinion, you ought not; and that, even if you thought it necessary, you delayed doing it for two months, that is, from the 27th of February to the 28th of April, although it respected a most urgent and important object.

5. That the Baron de Carondelet could very well have received my letters, without its necessarily following that his had come to hand.

6. That the Baron did not represent Mr. Ellicott's not writing to him officially as a complaint, but as an observation; and that, in fact, he never has done it in those terms.

7. That the proofs you allege to exculpate Mr. Ellicott, respecting his intentions of taking the fort of Natchez by surprise, are purely negative.

8. That it is not merely pretences, but very powerful reasons, which have impeded the evacuation of the posts, and the running of the boundary line.

9. That the insinuations with which you are willing to persuade the American people that our arming is directed against them are unjust, as well as unfounded; as by Mr. Blount's letter it is clearly demonstrated to be a precaution for the mere purpose of defence.

10. That you evidently contradict yourself, when, on one hand, you are pleased to attribute to us the movements of the Indians, and in the very next paragraph you show it might proceed from American citizens, as it actually does, according to Mr. Blount's letter; and that he acted with the knowledge and intelligence of the very same British minister, in whose private notes, without signature, and perhaps not of his own hand writing, you place such implicit confidence.

11. That, although in all your official communications, you have always manifested to me that the American Government knew of nothing which indicated any foundation for my suspicions, Mr. Blount's letter clearly proves that I was perfectly in the right.

I have thus fulfilled a very disagreeable duty. Always desirous to contribute to strengthen the bands of friendship which unite Spain and America, and to which their situation, their wants, and resources invite them, I have seen, with the most profound grief, that the language and tenor of your communication to the President is not, in my opinion, calculated to promote so desirable an object to us all. For my part, although I shall leave nothing undone to cement the union and harmony with a nation which I respect, neither shall I ever suffer the interests of the King, my master, in any case whatever, to be sacrificed to an unjust partiality. I pray God to preserve you many years.

Your most obedient, humble servant,

CARLOS MARTINEZ DE YRUJO.

PHILADELPHIA, July 11, 1797.

No. 13.

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to the Chevalier de Yrujo, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty to the United States of America.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PHILADELPHIA, August 8, 1797.

SIR:

I duly received your letter of the 11th of the last month, to which my other engagements have till this time prevented an answer.

My additional report to the President of the United States, on the 3d of July, in relation to Spanish affairs, has offended you, and is mentioned as the cause of your writing to me on the 11th. If, sir, I were now to make the just remarks and recriminations which your letter obviously suggests, I am afraid you would be still more offended. I am not sure, indeed, that I can possibly frame an answer that will escape your displeasure; but I shall endeavor that it be expressed not in a style indecorous, unusual, and unbecoming a diplomatic correspondence, while it contains a fair exposition of facts and arguments, in opposition to errors and actual misrepresentations.

In respect to your suspicions of an expedition preparing on the lakes by the British, for an attack upon Upper Louisiana, I have said that you never mentioned a single fact or reason on which your suspicions were founded. In contradiction to this assertion, you say that "in our conference on the 27th of February, you gave me information that a corps of three hundred and fifty men had been raised at Montreal, and marched towards the lakes, where, after the evacuation of the American posts, there was no ostensible object for them;"—"that you knew that the British agents had treated with some of the Indian nations in that country concerning the intended expedition; and that you added that you had received those advices from a person who might be depended on, who had seen these new levies passing through Johnstown, on their way to the westward." To this, sir, I answer, that I have not the slightest recollection that you mentioned either of these circumstances; that the Secretary of War happened to come into my office while we were conversing, at which you expressed your satisfaction, and repeated your suspicions: and he says you then mentioned no fact or reason as the ground thereof; and that, when I mentioned the subject to the President, (certainly within ten or twelve days after this conference) I perfectly remember making to him this remark: That in your letter of March 2, you said you had three days before declared to me the just reasons you had for suspecting that the English were preparing the expedition in question; whereas, you had offered me no reason at all. Hence, I am obliged to conclude that you might have held such a conversation with some other person, and by mistake have applied it to me. The English raising three hundred and fifty men, marching them through Johnstown, and tampering with the Indians to promote the expedition, were circumstances which appeared perfectly new to me when I received your letter of the 11th instant. I remember, also, that the conference ended by your saying you would write to me on the subject; which evidently implied that your written representation was to be the basis of any act of mine or of the Government. In that letter, sir, if you possessed any grounds for your suspicions, you ought to have stated them; for, contrary to the opinion you have now expressed, I have no hesitation in saying that the Government of the United States was not bound to take notice of the vague and unsupported suspicions of any minister; at least, not to incur expense by its military arrangements, to prevent an imaginary expedition, such as was the object of yours. When you made a formal statement of your suspicions, but without any fact to show that they were founded; when the Government of the United States possessed no other information, nor the knowledge of any circumstances indicative of the expedition; and when, in itself, it appeared destitute of even the shadow of probability; it was an act of complaisance to assure you that it "would be anxious to maintain the rights of their neutral situation, and on all occasions adopt and pursue those measures which should appear proper and expedient for that end." What these measures should be, and when to be taken, the Government itself would judge.

It was an act of greater complaisance, when, on the 21st of April, you renewed the declaration of your suspicions, but still without assigning any reasons, for the Government to resolve on, and to communicate to you, what you are pleased to allow to be a "determinate disposition on this point."

In the next sentence, as in many others, you misrepresent my expressions, and misunderstand my meaning. I do not say that "from your not having given me detailed information respecting the expedition, and from the answer which I received from the British minister on the 19th of June, I believed the expedition to be groundless:" but, after remarking that you never mentioned a single fact or reason to support your suspicions, I say, "From all the existing circumstances, I ever believed the suspicion to be groundless." If proofs had existed, you would have produced them; for, although intrigues and conspiracies for the purpose of a military expedition may long be concealed, yet the preparations for an expedition (and such, you suggested, were making) must be visible to many, especially "on the lakes," where every movement for such a design would be unusual, and, therefore, attract the more attention; and satisfactory proofs of such preparations would have been attainable: but you produced none.

Another material circumstance I must notice. That troops of the United States were stationed at Niagara, on the Miami, at Detroit, and Michilimackinack; and consequently, in situations well calculated to protect our territory, as well as to discover, or get information of, any warlike preparations so considerable as such an expedition would require: and the officers commanding on those stations could not have failed to communicate such discoveries or information to the Department of War; yet no such communications were made.

But it was also well known that they had not on the lakes a force adequate to the enterprise in question. I considered also the great difficulties that would attend the transportation of troops, equipage, provisions, cannon, and stores, by either of the routes suggested; if either could have been taken without violating the territory of the United States.

These were circumstances abundantly sufficient to discredit naked suspicions; and the declaration of Mr. Liston, in his note of the 19th of June, was mentioned only as confirming the justness of the opinion which I had at first formed in March, and which I continued to entertain, of your suspicions. I might add that, at that early period, Mr. Liston assured me that he had no knowledge of such an expedition; and his inquiries of the Governor General of Canada, of the British Secretary of State, have enabled him positively to assert, in the above note, that no such expedition was ever intended. And this fact repels your suggestions that I had been "remiss" in not doing, for two months, what, on my own principles, was proper to have been done. But you think I ought not to have communicated your suspicions of this expedition to the British minister, although "his motions were to be watched." You think, on the contrary, that the President should "have given suitable orders to General Wilkinson, or to the commanding officer of the military force on those frontiers," but have kept a perfect silence towards the British—have let them complete their preparations, (if any had been making) and collect their army on the lakes—have let them move forward, until they should enter upon the territory of the United States; and, seeing the President could not know beforehand whether they would prosecute their march by "Fox River and Ouisconsin, or the Illinois," we may suppose your ideas of the "suitable orders" to the military to be, that, at a great expense, the troops of the United States should be drawn into that country and divided into corps, to be posted on those rivers, to have fought the British army, and thus have defeated the enterprise. Sir, this is not the only instance in which, after having desired the American Government to do some act interesting to your own, you have then presumed to dictate how it should be done.

"But (you say) you never could have imagined that I would have given to the British minister a piece of advice which might enable him to alter his plan, by letting him know that the former one was discovered." And what, sir, was the plan of the British, to defeat which you desired the American Government to interfere? Why, according to your suspicions, it was to march an army through the territory of the United States against Upper Louisiana. If, then, the communication of your suspicions to Mr. Liston would induce him to "alter his plan," it would, by a word or a letter, instead of an army, defeat the expedition: for it was not possible it should go forward except through the territory of the United States; and, consequently, the communication, instead of disappointing, would have perfectly accomplished what you requested.

In your 5th paragraph, you are pleased to mention what you consider as another omission of duty, that, although, on the 2d of March, you wrote your suspicions, and, three days before, you mentioned them verbally, yet, on the 9th, I had not laid the matter before the President. I will take the trouble to show with how little reason you have made this remark. The 2d of March was the day next preceding the dissolution of Congress; and, at the close of a session, the President is overwhelmed with business that cannot be postponed. On the 3d, the then President's term of office expired. On the 4th, the inauguration of the succeeding President was celebrated. The 5th of March was Sunday. The five following days were not unoccupied; and, on the 11th of March, the answer to your letter of the 2d was given. And, although you attach much importance to your suspicions, the details I have given prove that they were then destitute of probability; that they were, in fact, unfounded, and consequently of no importance: that as such I then justly considered them; and, therefore, needed no "very powerful" motives to remain silent five days.

I cannot but regret that my reasoning is so often not understood. When reciting my inquiry, whether the posts occupied by the troops of Spain within the territory of the United States had been evacuated, and your answer that, not having for some months heard from the Baron de Carondelet, you "were deprived of any information touching the steps taken for the execution of the treaty:" I put these last words between inverted commas not, as you say, "in order to draw attention," but because they were an exact quotation from the translation of your letter. And when I added, in my report, "nevertheless he (the minister of His Catholic Majesty) had previously informed the Baron de Carondelet of his suspicions of a projected expedition from Canada;" it was not to prove either that the Baron had received your letters, or that you had received his; but, as that very information was assigned by the Baron as a reason for still retaining and reinforcing the posts, the obvious conclusion was, that you wrote and transmitted to him the information with that view; and hence, that, instead of disclaiming all knowledge on the subject, candor should havei nduced you to answer me, that, although you had not received any late letters from the Baron, and therefore you could not say what steps had actually been taken for the evacuation of the posts, yet that, on account of the suspected expedition from the lakes, of which you have informed the Baron, you presumed (or you advised, and probably you did advise) that he would still hold possession of them, "to cover Louisiana." This "logic," sir, I hope, is intelligible, and, at any rate, not "extremely false."

I cannot omit noticing your observations on the 5th paragraph of my report. If, as you were obliging enough to promise, you had favored me with copies of the Baron de Carondelet's two letters, (of which you undertook to give me an oral but literal translation) instead of their "substance," I might have been more correct in reciting his assertion, that Mr. Ellicott had not given him notice of his arrival at the Natchez, as the commissioner of the United States for running the boundary line. Whether this was a complaint,, or an "observation," as you choose to call it, every reader of your letter will see to be of no consequence. But whether the assertion was founded or unfounded was material; seeing, in the same letter, Mr. Ellicott is charged with having "carried his zeal so far as to attempt to get possession of the fort of the Natchez by surprise;" and an assertion follows that "Governor Gayoso says he has in his power documents which prove evidently the intention of this attempt." This accusation against Mr. Ellicott I considered as injurious, not to him only, but to the Government; for which, in the character of commissioner, he was appointed to act. If other circumstances induced me to doubt its correctness, the other complaint or "observation," which I knew to be unfounded, could not but increase my doubts. It was important, therefore, and my duty, to present them together to the President's notice. I have not "entirely mistaken" this matter. In my report to the President, I did not undertake to recite what you "mentioned," but what you translated from the Baron de Carondelet's letters: you repeated the charge in question; and it was not till then that I handed you the copies of the Baron's and Mr. Ellicott's correspondence, showing the repugnance of fact to assertion, and it was then that you blushed; as I had before been astonished. And your remark, afterwards, was what I have stated in my report, "that you supposed the Baron did not consider Mr. Ellicott's letter as official." You then made no distinction between a complaint and an "observation," nor used the phrase "in the rigor," nor any other qualifying words, except those which are stated in my report.

Besides, the Baron had no right to expect any other evidence of Mr. Ellicott's appointment than his letter, until they should meet for the purpose of commencing the business of their appointments; when, of course, they would mutually exhibit their commissions. And, from the Baron's answer, of the 1st of March, it is plain that he expected no other notice: for he therein recognizes Mr. Ellicott as the commissioner of the United States.

In the last sentence of your paragraph on this subject, you say "that when, after a mixed and desultory conversation upon various subjects, you had collected and methodized your ideas, and committed them to writing, my answer and observations ought to have been confined to the written communication." This observation, sir, is inaccurate. It may, however, be applied to a former part of your letter.

You say that, in our conference on the 27th of February, you mentioned to me the raising of three hundred and fifty men at Montreal; that your informer saw them pass through Johnstown; and that you knew the British agents had treated with some of the Indian nations concerning an expedition preparing on the lakes. But, in your letter of the 2d of March, in which you were "to collect and methodize your ideas" on the subject of your suspicions, you do not introduce one of those suspicions; of course, on your own principles, I ought, if they ever had been mentioned, to have considered them as nullities.

In the eighth paragraph of your letter you observe, that my proof obtained from Mr. Ellicott's messengers, that he did not attempt to get possession of the Natchez fort by surprise, is merely negative. I offered it only as such. But the negative testimony of two men of good characters against a fact which they were likely to be acquainted with, if it existed, and whose existence other circumstances rendered improbable, and the assertion of which is mingled with assertions, by the same person, of other facts, of which some, or even one, is known to be unfounded, merits consideration. There is, however, further evidence applicable to this case. In the letter dated at the Natchez, the 5th of May, from Lieutenant Pope to Governor Gayoso, you will see that the Governor had made the like accusation against the lieutenant. "A gentleman had informed him (the Governor) that the lieutenant intended to attack the garrison at that place." Lieutenant Pope, justly hurt by the groundless assertion, desires the informer may be named, and required to acquit himself of his assertion, or be punished as a false accuser. The Governor answers the next day, speaks of the information as communicated to Lieutenant Pope in familiar conversation; and adds, that the informer was to be despised. Yet, from the pointed manner in which Lieutenant Pope made the demand, it is evident that the information was presented to him as a serious accusation. After this detail, will it not be conjectured that the Governor's "documents" respecting Mr. Ellicott's "attempt" are of a piece with his "familiar conversation" with Lieutenant Pope concerning his "intended attack?"

In the ninth paragraph of your letter you say that, "after having discussed the history of these transactions, with all the force and accuracy which result from these observations, I assure, with a very ill-grounded confidence, that, upon a view of the whole, it appears that His Majesty's governors on the Mississippi have, on various pretences, postponed the running of the boundary line, and the evacuation of the posts." I must here also complain of misrepresentation. I did not, in my report, draw my conclusions from the history of these transactions, that is, of the transactions which you have previously mentioned in your letter, and which I have already noticed in this answer, but "upon a view of the whole correspondence then and before submitted to the President." This correspondence I will now examine, to see whether the causes assigned by the Spanish Governors, for postponing the running of the boundary line and evacuating the posts, merit the name of reasons, or of pretences.

Governor Gayoso being informed of Mr. Ellicott's descending the Mississippi, wrote to him on the 17th of February, desiring him to leave his escort at Bayou Pierre, sixty miles above the Natchez. Yet the treaty prescribed a military escort on each side to attend the commissioners in running the boundary line; and the Natchez as the place of their first meeting. The chief reason offered for this request was, that, if the troops of the two nations were brought together, "misunderstandings" might arise between them. Yet the treaty required their coming together to attend the commissioners when they were jointly running the boundary line. And the only reason the governor assigned for not evacuating the posts was, "the want of vessels," but which he expected would soon arrive.

On the 25th of February Governor Gayoso and Mr. Ellicott fixed on the 19th of March to proceed down the river to Clarkesville, near which it was supposed the boundary line would commence.

On the 9th of March, Governor Gayoso informed Mr. Ellicott that the Baron de Carondelet could not attend the running of the line, in person, and that the whole business had devolved on him, the Governor; but he feared he should not be ready by the 19th. And then he endeavored to draw Mr. Ellicott from his proper station at the Natchez, by proposing a visit to the Baron at New Orleans.

March 12th, the Governor again endeavored to draw Mr. Ellicott from the Natchez, and recommended Loftus' Cliffs, near Clarkesville, as the point of re-uniting; and by way of inducement, said the geometer and other officers, to be employed on the boundary line, would stop at Clarkesville.

On the 15th of March the principal part of the artillery was taken out of the fort, and every appearance made of a speedy evacuation; but on the 22d they were carried back to the fort, and immediately remounted. A similar movement took place at the latter end of April, after the arrival of Lietenant Pope and his troops at the Natchez. "The evacuation (says he) appeared to be going on with great life; when, all at once, the military stores were ordered back, their troops busily engaged all night taking back and remounting the cannon." Here he very naturally expresses his surprise: "This kind of conduct (says he) appeared and still appears strange."

March 23d, the Governor mentions that orders had been given by the General-in-chief of the province to demolish the post at the Walnut Hills; because their treaty with the Indians required it; but as he (Gayoso) had since been informed of their unsettled dispositions, he had sent counter orders to prevent the fortifications being injured; suggesting, at the same time, that the moving of the stores, &c. was suspended only until the arrival of the American troops to take possession of the post.

In this letter the Governor informs Mr. Ellicott that Lieutenant Colonel Guillemard was far on his way up; and, on his arrival, the running of the boundary line should begin. The Governor adds this assurance, "that there is nothing that can prevent the religious compliance with the treaty."

On the 28th and 29th of March Governor Gayoso issued two proclamations, both bearing date the 29th, taking new ground for retaining the post, viz: until the right of the inhabitants to the real property is ascertained. The Governor is pleased to say that a negotiation was then carrying on between the King of Spain and the United States to secure to the inhabitants of the Natchez the right to their real property; that that right could not be secured but by an additional article to the late treaty; and that he should keep possession of the country until that article should be officially communicated to him; and until they were sure that the Indians would be pacific. This last reason particularly warrants my assertion, that the Governors meant for an indefinite period to avoid an evacuation of the posts: for, while a tribe of Indians existed in that quarter, the Governors could not be sure that they would be pacific. And, as to their real property, seeing the great body of the inhabitants appear not to desire the patronage of the Spanish Government to secure it; as the Government of the United States must be at least as anxious as that of Spain to protect the inhabitants in their rights, when become citizens of the United States; I believe there can be no difficulty in deciding whether this is a reason or a pretence. Besides, the negotiation mentioned by the Governor, about the real property of the inhabitants, has never existed; nor even been proposed or hinted, either to or by the Government of the United States. I hope, therefore, it will not be deemed harsh, or unbecoming, in a letter of this kind, to say that this motive for suspending the evacuation of the posts—that a negotiation was then on foot to secure the real property of the inhabitants—does not merit the title even of a pretence.

So soon as the Governor discovered that his proclamations, instead of quieting the minds of its inhabitants, produced a contrary effect, he sent two gentlemen of the settlement to inform Mr. Ellicott that he, the Governor, had received directions from the Baron de Carondelet to have the artillery and military stores expeditiously removed from the forts, which were to be given up to the troops of the United States immediately on their arrival. As this information did not remove suspicions, Mr. Ellicott wrote the Governor on the 31st of March, stating divers circumstances which still kept those suspicions alive. The Governor answered, on the same day, in direct contradiction to the information given by the gentlemen, his agents, to Mr. Ellicott, and confirming the declarations made in his proclamations. He added also a new motive for retaining the posts, viz: that the treaty left it doubtful whether, when the posts should be evacuated, the works were to be left standing, or to be demolished; concerning which the Governor-general found himself obliged to consult His Catholic Majesty; and had given the Governor positive orders to suspend the evacuations of the posts until the matter should be amicably settled between the two Governments.

On the 1st of May another motive is assigned for retaining the posts. The envoy of His Catholic Majesty in the United States had informed the Governor-general of an attack proposed against the Spanish part of Illinois (the upper part of Louisiana) by the British from Canada, and, therefore, the posts at the Walnut Hills and the Natchez must be kept for the defence of Lower Louisiana.

This last motive is also offered as a reason why the running of the boundary line is postponed; as all their attention was drawn towards the defence of the province, against an invasion which, as I have already shown, was never contemplated.

To all these facts, I have to add the declaration of General Wilkinson, in his letter of June 2d, to the Secretary of War: "I have, (says he) information through a confidential channel, that it was determined, as early as September last, not to give up the posts on the Mississippi." If this information be correct, no other proof is necessary to show, that all the reasons, from time to time suggested, for not evacuating the posts, were mere pretences.

I have here brought into one view the most material facts relating to the question between us, which are scattered throughout the reports made by me to the President of the United States, on the 10th of June and 3d of July, and by the Secretary of War on the 30th of June, and the documents accompanying them, as they have been published. And, from this brief recital, it evidently appears, as I have said in my report, "That the Governors of His Catholic Majesty, on the Mississippi, have, on various pretences, postponed the running of the boundary line, and the withdrawing of his troops from the posts they occupied within the territory of the United States; and that, after repeated overtures, promises, and appearances of commencing the execution of the treaty between the two nations, in both these respects, their conduct demonstrates that, for an indefinite period, they meant to avoid doing either."

You controvert this conclusion only on one ground. You say that the treaty stipulated merely that the Spanish garrisons should be withdrawn, not that fortifications which might one day be prejudicial to the King's subjects, should be delivered up: and hence you infer that the necessity, urged by the two Governors, of delaying to withdraw the garrisons until this question is decided between the two Governments, is not a pretence, but a substantial reason. Here I must observe, that the Governors had already demolished the post at the Chickasaw bluff: and it appears in the foregoing recital, that they were going to demolish the post at the Walnut Hills: and the reason assigned is, that the treaties with the Indians required the demolition: and the Governor Gayoso assigns but one motive for suspending that operation—that he had been informed of the unsettled disposition of the Indians; yet, afterward, this reason (that their treaties with the Indians required the demolition of the posts) is forgotten, and their destruction, or their delivery, with all the fortifications and other works standing, is, by the governors, made to depend entirely on the issue of a negotiation between the governments of Spain and the United States! Can any further proof be wanting to justify me in calling this a pretence? But you seem to rely on this your construction of the treaty relative to the posts: you have urged it in your letter to me of the 24th of June, and, therefore, I will consider it.

The second article of the treaty having described the boundaries between the territories of the United States and Spain, thus proceeds, "And it is agreed, that if there should be any troops, garrisons, or settlements of either party, in the territory of the other, according to the above mentioned boundaries, they shall be withdrawn from the said territories within the term of six months after the ratification of this treaty, or sooner, if it be possible; and that they shall be permitted to take with them all the goods and effects which they possess." But to justify your retention of the posts, you say that the demarcation of the boundary line should precede the withdrawing of the garrisons: yet you suppose it probable, and His Catholic Majesty's Governors well know, that the Chickasaw bluff, the Walnut Hills, and the Natchez, are within the territory of the United States.

Governor Gayoso speaks of the boundary line as being near Clarkesville, a place many miles below the Natchez; and he also knew the result of Mr. Ellicott's astronomical observations on the spot, which ascertained the Natchez to be about thirty-nine miles north of the south boundary of the United States.

There being, then, not a shadow of doubt with respect to the position of these posts, that they are all within the territory of the United States, there was no necessity previously to run and mark the boundary line: which, besides, if set about in good earnest, it would take at least a year to accomplish, through a wilderness of many hundred miles in extent; and, therefore, it never could have been contemplated as necessary, to precede the evacuation of the posts, which was to be effected in six months, or sooner, if possible. Yet fifteen months have elapsed, and you still keep possession.

But you suggest that it is at least doubtful, whether by the treaty it was intended to leave the fortifications standing when the garrison should be withdrawn. You say, "It is not to be presumed that it could ever have been the intention of His Catholic Majesty to deliver up fortifications, which, besides, that they had cost him considerable sums of money, may, by the effect of political vicissitudes, be one day prejudicial to his subjects." I feel much reluctance to attempt the refutation of a construction so obviously erroneous. It is probably the first time that, to "withdraw," or retire from a place, has been imagined to intend its destruction. If, at the formation of the treaty, the demolition of the posts had been intended, it would assuredly have been expressed. But, doubtless, the idea never occurred, until it was found convenient to make it a pretence for holding the posts. The phrases "to withdraw a garrison," to evacuate a post or country, have as determinate a meaning as any in the English language; and their meaning is ascertained by frequent use in treaties; and to destroy a country, or a fortified place, from which it was stipulated to "withdrew" an army or a garrison, would be such an act of barbarism as ought never to take place among civilized nations. One of the latest treaties made by the United States (that with Great Britain) has the same phrase. "His Majesty will withdraw all his troops and garrisons from all posts and places within the boundary lines assigned, by the treaty of peace, to the United States. This evacuation shall take place on or before the first day of June, 1796." And these expressions are used in the same treaty as equivalent to "the delivery of the said posts." The British treaty was, in this manner, accordingly carried into effect—the British troops were withdrawn, and the works left standing. The British officers were even careful not to expose the works to accidental destruction: for, as the American troops did not reach the posts by the first of June, small British guards were left to preserve the works from injury until the American troops arrived.

By the treaty concluded at Versailles the 3d of September, 1783, between Great Britain and Spain, it was agreed, "That the king of Great Britain should cause East Florida to be evacuated three months after the ratification of that treaty, or sooner, if it could be done." The evacuation took place, but no demolition of fortifications.

In the preliminary articles of peace between England, France, and Spain, signed the 3d of November, 1762, it was stipulated, "that as soon as possible after the ratification of these preliminaries? France should evacuate Cleves, Wesel, and Guelders, and generally all the countries belonging to the King of Prussia." Were those places demolished, or the country laid waste, when the troops withdrew? Or were there any subsequent negotiations to remove any doubts on the subject?

But I have dwelt too long on a point which really required no elucidation.

On this, as well as on another occasion, you have thought fit to upbraid me with showing to the British minister a degree of candor and confidence which you insinuate he does not deserve, and which you seem to think I have withheld from you. Yet, sir, all the declarations made to me by that minister, verbally, and in writing, touching the points in controversy between you and me, have been verified. As I have already said, you declared to me that you had just reasons for suspecting that an expedition was preparing on the lakes by the English, in order to attack Upper Louisiana. The British minister, in the first instance, assured me that he had no knowledge of it; and his subsequent inquiries enabled him further to assure me, that no such expedition had been, or was, intended by the British Government. And I have, in another place, offered other reasons which confirm the truth of these assurances. Yet you tell me, that the assurance given me by the British minister, but without any signature, did not inspire the servants of His Catholic Majesty with the same blind confidence which it produced in me. I shall take no other notice of this remark, than to put you right in point of fact. The note of the British minister, containing the assurance to which you refer, is not "without a signature:" This (like other official notes from that minister) has his signature—his name written with his own hand—at the head of it.

You declared to me "that you knew to a certainty that the English had made propositions to General Clarke, of Georgia, in order to avail themselves of his influence in that State, together with some other persons, for making a diversion, or serious attack against Florida." The British minister informed me, that although he knew nothing of General Clarke, or his expedition from Georgia, a proposition had been made to him (the British minister) for an expedition against the Floridas; but that he told the projector that he had no power to authorize it; and besides, that there were, among other objections to the plan, two of great weight—one that the Indians were to be employed, the other, that it would violate the neutral rights of the United States. The British minister has since shown me an original letter from Lord Grenville, dated the 8th of last April, in which he informs the minister, that if there were no other objections to the plan, the two mentioned by him, viz. that it could not be executed without employing the Indians, and without violating the rights of the United States, would be sufficient to induce the British Government to reject it. This proves, sir, that Mr. Liston's declarations on this point, were not "vague and unauthentic," as you pronounce them, but in strict conformity with truth.

As to General Clarke, of Georgia, the British minister declared he had never even heard of him; and the extract of the letter from Mr. Jackson, the district attorney of Georgia, respecting General Clarke, and any expedition forming there, in behalf of the English against the Floridas, will incline every candid inquirer at least to doubt whether such a project has ever been proposed to him. We shall afterwards see that Mr. Blount's plot does not appear to have any connexion with an expedition under General Clarke.

Thus, you see, sir, that I have not blindly placed a confidence in the British minister: for aught that has yet appeared, he was entitled to the credit he has received.

I return to your letter. You mention your communications to the Baron de Carondelet respecting the intended expedition from Canada; from that moment, you say, imperious necessity, and the great principle of self defence, made His Catholic Majesty's officers turn their thoughts to objects of a more urgent nature than running the boundary line. And here you introduce "Mr. Blount's letter, and the late detected conspiracy, as evincing how far their conduct in this respect was necessary." It is wonderful, sir, that you should attempt to make it be believed that Mr. Blount's letter and the late detected conspiracy had any connexion with the expedition which you suggested was preparing on the lakes of Canada, against Upper Louisiana. All that is yet discovered of Mr. Blount's project or conspiracy, proves that it was to have been formed in one of the States south of the river Ohio; and that it was destined against the Floridas, and perhaps Lower Louisiana. I therefore feel myself, for this and the other reasons before exhibited, still warranted in considering the suspected Canada expedition among the pretexts for delaying to evacuate the posts, and to run the boundary line; and, consequently, that your charge, that I have in this instance "palpably attempted to make groundless and unfair impressions on the public mind," is alike unfounded and unbecoming your public character to suggest.

In your next paragraph, you thus address me: "Nor do your ill founded insinuations stop here; sentiments and expressions still more violent flow from that same hasty pen." This passage is in perfect correspondence with the general strain of your letter. Whether your charge is correctly made is now to be examined.

I am ready to confess that my report, thus stigmatized, was, from the pressure of business, written in haste; but a revision of it satisfies me, nevertheless, that it is not inaccurate in its statements.

You quote the passage in my report which has called forth this reproach; it is in these words: "That there is but too much reason to believe Mr. Ellicott's suspicions well founded; that an undue influence has been exercised over the Indians by the officers of His Catholic Majesty, to prepare them for a rupture with the United States." And then you say, that I mention the source of these "dreadful conjectures," to be a private letter from Mr. Sargent, Secretary of the Northwestern Territory. Here you are extremely incorrect, as usual, when you undertake to recite my conclusions, and the facts and circumstances upon which they are formed. It is from "a view of the whole correspondence" referred to in my reports of the 10th of June and 3d of July—on the intelligence received by the Secretary of War, and the private letter from Colonel Sargent, that I drew the conclusion you have quoted.

Mr. Ellicott formed his suspicions on the spot, from what was passing before him; and he is not a careless or undiscerning observer.

General Wilkinson says, "letters from all quarters announce the discontents and menacing aspect of the savages; two white men have been recently murdered on the Ohio, below the Cumberland; and the savages beyond the Mississippi, and those who pass Massac, make no hesitation to avow their purpose for war." And then he refers to a letter from Colonel Hamtramck, who commands the United States troops at Detroit, in which the colonel says: "I am pretty sure that both the French and Spaniards have emissaries among the Indians. I have it from indubitable authority, that a large belt [by which is meant a speech] from the Spaniards is now travelling through the different nations;" meaning the nations within the territories of the United States.

Colonel Sargent writes, it is true, a private letter, but it is to a public officer; and his situation as secretary, and governor for the time, of the Northwestern Territory, would render it his duty to be vigilant for its safety; and his character vouches for the accuracy of his information; and you do not question the truth of any part of his statement.

After mentioning that the Spaniards were reinforcing their upper posts on the Mississippi, that upwards of three hundred men had arrived at St. Louis, and were erecting formidable works, he adds, "it likewise appears, through various channels, that they are inviting a great number of Indians of the territory (meaning of the United States northwest of the Ohio) to cross the Mississippi: and for this express purpose, Mr. Loramie, an officer in the pay of the crown, made a tour through all this country last Fall; since which time, several Indians have been sent on the same errand, and generally furnished with plenty of cash to defray their expenses." "A large party of the Delawares passed down White River about the 6th of May, on their way to the Spanish side, bearing the national flag of Spain, sent them from St. Louis."

Lieutenant Pope, in his letter of May 9th, to the Secretary of War, says: "There have been several attempts made to draw on the Indians upon my troops. I have fully ascertained this fact, and demanded of the Governor to have a principal actor immediately brought to punishment, or sent out of the country. He has been sent for, and is now on board of one of the galleys which is now about descending the river." And, sir, if you inquire, you will find that this "principal actor" (Rapelje, by name) was one of Governor Gayoso's agents.

These, sir, are the grounds on which I expressed the opinion, that there was but too much reason to believe Mr. Ellicott's suspicions well founded—that the officers of Spain had exercised an undue influence over the Indians, to prepare them for a rupture with the United States.

This detail, sir, strikingly shows how little you have understood, and how entirely you have misrepresented my reasoning on this subject. I leave you to reconcile your reflections on the British minister and his nation, for their inhumanity in employing the Indians in the American war, with your justification of the Spanish officers at this time, in securing the aid of the Indians in your war with the British. "The Spaniards (you say) have fortified St. Louis, and availed themselves of EVERY MEANS OF DEFENCE which the country afforded;" meaning by the ingenious expression every means of defence which the country afforded, the employing of the Indians.

You are pleased next to charge me, in your customary style, with "falling into the most glaring inconsistency," because I remark, that, although "it may be difficult to say, whether this plan of exciting the Indians to direct hostilities against the United States has been contemplated and promoted by any of our own citizens, yet it is certain, that one or more of those citizens have proposed and taken measures to detach the Southern Indians from the interests of the United States, and to destroy the influence of the public agents over those nations, and thus to defeat the great objects of their appointment, the chief of which is to preserve peace."

Having quoted this passage from my report, you ask, "how is it possible to reconcile such evident contradictions? On the one hand, the Spanish officers are those who excite the Southern Indians against the United States, and on the other, you quickly follow presuming, with sufficient foundation, in my opinion, that it may be some citizens of the United States." Allow me, sir, to ask in my turn, how it was possible for you not to see that here there is no contradiction? Is it not very possible that the Spanish officers might be courting the Chickasaws, who live above the Natchez, with large presents, and be preparing the Choctaws, who dwell along the Natchez district, and the Delawares, Shawanese, Miamies, and other tribes dwelling in the territory northwest of the Ohio, for war against the United States, while Mr. Blount and his agents were detaching the Southern tribes of Cherokees and Creeks from the interests of the United States, and eventually to aid the British in an enterprise against the Floridas? The Cherokees and Creeks, you might have seen, were the only Indian nations mentioned in Governor Blount's letter. And is it not very possible, if these two nations should thus be led to war against the Spanish possessions, that they might not be excited to direct hostilities against the United States? And, therefore, that although Mr. Blount might contemplate the former, he might abstain from the latter? And is not, then, my cautious manner of speaking of this latter perfectly correct?

I am happy to arrive at your last observation. And I wish it was not, like the rest, exceptionable and incorrect. These are your words: "Respecting the last article of your report, I have only to observe that, although you have constantly assured me that Government had not the least information respecting the subject of my representations, and, although the letter of Mr. Jackson, of Georgia, appears to coincide with your ideas, nevertheless time has shown that I have complied with my duty by not reposing on such assurances. The plot is discovered, and nobody any longer doubts the expedition was to have taken place."

The expression that "you complied with your duty in not reposing on such assurances" may mean that you thought the assurances deceitful, and, therefore, not meriting belief. Perhaps you did not intend this. Perhaps you meant no more than that the Government had been "remiss" in its duty in not pursuing, with eagerness, the trains of your various suspicions. But I must show you that here, as in all other instances, your criminations are void of foundation in either point of view.

The last article of the report respects General Clarke, of Georgia, to whom you said "you knew of a certainty that the English had made propositions, in order to avail themselves of his influence in that State, with some other persons, for making a diversion or serious attack against Florida;" and you add that "you do not doubt that, in consequence of your information, the Executive Government will take the proper steps that Georgia also should not infringe the laws of neutrality." Here you confine your requests to Georgia, that she might not infringe the laws of neutrality; and my letter to Charles Jackson, Esq., the district attorney of that State, shows that the Government took prompt measures to defeat the project of General Clarke and his associates, if such a project existed. I suppose none did exist. You acknowledge that the letter from Mr. Jackson coincides with my ideas. Your "certain knowledge" of an intended expedition in favor of the English from Georgia against Florida, under General Clarke, you have never supported by a shadow of evidence. If you possessed any evidence of the fact, it would be easy to produce it. What you call your "certain knowledge" could rest only on information, or the testimony of others, which might be as false, or as vague, and inconclusive, as the information about the Canada expedition, which I hope I have proved, to your conviction, never to have existed, even in idea. Yet you declared to me that you had "just reasons for suspecting that expedition was preparing on the lakes;" and, hence, how can I avoid concluding that your "certain knowledge" in one case, like your "just reasons" in the other, were without a sufficient foundation.

But you say "the plot is discovered, and nobody any longer doubts that the expedition was to have taken place." Strange remark! Just the reverse of it should have been made: for, although there is a discovery of Mr. Blount's plot, its extent is by no means ascertained; and, far from nobody doubting, probably every body doubts whether the projected expedition was to have taken place. It was not to be undertaken but in conjunction with a British force; and, on the proposal of the expedition to the British Government, it was totally rejected. Even Mr. Blount, who, if the project was adopted, expected to be at the head of it, ventures no further than to say he believed that the plan would be attempted, but, if attempted, that it would not be till the "fall;" and, consequently, your zeal in March and April, for which, at the expense of decency towards the American Government, you take to yourself so much credit, had then no just object. This zeal of yours is displayed in the information you gave to the Baron de Carondelet, in March or April, of the expedition supposed to be preparing in Canada against Upper Louisiana: yet, you would now attempt to justify this zeal by the plot of Mr. Blount, although this plot and the Canada expedition were wholly distinct and unconnected.

I shall conclude this long letter with your eleven positions, which you state with as much serious formality as if they were all of them important, and all of them supported by facts or just reasoning; but the details I have given demonstrate that these positions are either unfounded, or simple propositions of not the smallest consequence.

These are your positions addressed to me in your own words—

"1st. That, on the 27th of February, I gave you sufficient particulars, respecting the intended expedition, to have attracted the attention of this Government."

Answer. I have offered reasons to prove that you gave me no particulars, but only mentioned your suspicions, and that you promised to give me your representations in writing: for which, of course, it was proper for me to wait.

"2. That, although to this verbal communication I added another in writing on the 2d of March, the President had not the least knowledge of it on the 9th of the same month; and that, without doubt, you must have had very powerful motives to prevent you from communicating it to him."

Answer. I have accounted for the delay in a satisfactory manner. I have shown that I had abundant reason to conclude your suspicions to be wholly unfounded, and for attaching no sort of consequence to them. The event demonstrates that I was right; and that, instead of very powerful motives, none were needed for a delay of only four or five days, or for a much longer period; and that to notice your naked suspicions at all was not an act of necessity, but of complaisance. I might, with justice, complain of your delay to answer my letter of the 16th of March, on a subject of very high importance to the United States—I mean the evacuation of the posts. I will not say that you were negligent, or "remiss;" but I will say that, for a whole month, you omitted to give me your short and unsatisfactory answer. The indisposition which you assign as the cause of the delay did not prevent you from writing on other subjects, nor long from going abroad.

"3. That it does not appear, by the documents presented by the Secretary of War, that Government had given orders to the military commanders to cause the territory and neutrality of the United States to be respected."

Answer. I have shown that none were necessary to be given.

"4. That you made to the English minister a communication which, in my opinion, you ought not; and that, even if you thought it necessary, you delayed doing it for two months—that is, from the 27th of February to the 28th of April, although it respected a most urgent and important object."

Answer. On the 28th of April I informed you, by letter, that I had communicated to the British minister your suspicions of an expedition preparing by the English against Upper Louisiana; and as, for upwards of two months, you expressed no dissatisfaction on account of this communication, I might well conclude you did not think it improper: nay, in your letter of July 11, which I am now answering, you refer, with apparent approbation, to this very communication, connected with the declaration which accompanied it to the British minister, that the President could not consent to the march of any troops, either British or Spanish, through the territory of the United States; and you consider it as a "determinate disposition" of the American Government on this point. I have also shown that, admitting this communication to Mr. Liston to be proper, I did not delay doing it for two months, nor two weeks, although it respected at best but an imaginary project.

"5. That the Baron de Carondelet could very well have received my letters, without its necessarily following that his had come to hand."

Answer. I have shown that you did not understand my reasoning on this point; which went to prove that your answer of the 17th of April to my letter of the 16th of March, about the evacuation of the posts, was wanting in candor.

"6. That the Baron did not represent Mr. Ellicott's not writing to him officially as a complaint, but as an observation, and that in fact he never has done it in those terms."

Answer. I have shown that whether the Baron's assertion should have been called a complaint or an observation as perfectly immaterial; I meant to show it was unfounded, and this you yourself admit.

"7. That the proofs you allege to exculpate Mr. Ellicott respecting his intentions of taking the fort of Natchez by surprise are purely negative."

Answer. I offered them only as negative proofs. Yet when one complaint or assertion against Mr. Ellicott was known and acknowledged not to be true, the negative testimony of gentlemen likely to be well informed, would be deemed sufficient to bring another, and in its nature very improbable, complaint or assertion of the same person into discredit.

"8. That it is not merely pretences, but very powerful reasons which have impeded the evacuation of the posts, and the running of the boundary line."

Answer. The point of view in which I have now exhibited the conduct of the Spanish Governors relative to the evacuation of the posts, and the running of the boundary line, I should suppose might convince you that the causes which they have offered for the delay are mere pretences: the American citizens, to whom you have appealed, have been convinced only by reading the printed documents, without any comments.

"9. That the insinuations with which you are willing to persuade the American people that our arming is directed against them, are unjust as well as unfounded, as by Mr. Blount's letter it is clearly demonstrated to be a precaution for the mere purpose of defence."

Answer. The grounds of my suggestions, which you call "insinuations" are detailed in this letter, and embrace too many facts and circumstances to be abridged: permit me to desire you to review them. I shall only repeat, that nothing is more certain than that Mr. Blount's letter has not the remotest reference to the suspected Canada expedition, which is your only pretence for reinforcing the posts in upper Louisiana; for calling the Indians to your aid; for holding the posts at the Natchez and Walnut Hills; and for delaying to run the boundary line.

"10. That you evidently contradict yourself, when on one hand you are pleased to attribute to us the movements of the Indians, and in the very next paragraph you show it might proceed from American citizens, as it actually does, according to Mr. Blount's letter; and that he acted with the knowledge and intelligence of the very same British minister, in whose private notes without signature, and perhaps not of his own hand writing, you place such implicit confidence."

Answer. I have shown that there is not a shadow of contradiction in my observations on this subject; and your assertions to the contrary must proceed only from your not understanding them. You say that Mr. Blount acted in this matter with the knowledge and intelligence of the British minister. This is not likely to be true. It is in proof, by other evidence than the British minister's notes, that he did not and could not authorize the projected expedition against the Floridas; and particularly that one of his strong objections against it was, that it contemplated the employing of the Indians; although he thought it proper to submit the project to the consideration and decision of his Government. Nobody, therefore, will believe that he authorized Mr. Blount, or was even privy to his measures, for preparing the Indians for war. Besides, Doctor Romayne, who may be presumed to be well acquainted with Mr. Blount's plot, suggests that it is not the project offered to Mr. Liston by Chisholm. These are his words: "Mr. Blount is totally unknown to Mr. Liston, and so are all his views." And there is a passage in Mr. Blount's letter which countenances the doctor's assertion, and indicates, that although Chisholm and Blount had some communications with each other, yet that their views were not precisely the same. Mr. Blount, in his letter to Carey, says, "Where Captain Chisholm is, I do not know. I left him in Philadelphia, in March, and he frequently visited the minister and spoke upon the subject; but I believe he will go into the Creek nation, by way of of South Carolina or Georgia. He gave out he was going to England; but I did not believe him." These last words afford a pretty strong proof that they were not acting wholly in concert. Probably Mr. Blount endeavoured to persuade Chisholm that he would co-operate in the prosecution of his scheme; while at the same time he might have another of his own, or in concert with Doctor Romayne, and stand ready, in the event of things, to make his advantage of either—whichever should offer the best prospect of success. Doctor Romayne, you see, says that Mr. Blount is totally unknown to Mr. Liston. But it is well known that Mr. Blount was your frequent guest, and intimate companion; and that he was on this intimate footing with you during the whole time that you were representing to the Government your suspicions of British expeditions. Yet after the discovery of the conspiracy was made public, you formally requested the American Government to punish him for so scandalous a crime. But seeing that Mr. Blount was a citizen of the United States, and not a subject of Spain, it would have been decent in you to have left him with his own Government without interposing your advice. But especially when you knew that the President had laid his letter before Congress; and the two Houses were deliberating on the modes of punishing him; when the investigation had proceeded so far that a committee of the Senate had reported a resolution to expel Mr. Blount from the Senate; and a committee of the House had reported a resolution that he should be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors: for you then to interfere was singularly improper; and it was such an ostentatious display of zeal as, under all the known circumstances, suggests more than one interpretation.

"11. That although, in all your official communications, you have always manifested to me that the American Government knew of nothing which indicated any foundation for my suspicions, Mr. Blount's letter clearly proves that I was perfectly in the right."

Answer. This remark is perfectly inconsequential; for your communications exhibited your suspicions of projected expeditions only from Canada and Georgia: and I have shown that Mr. Blount's letter has no relation to either.

I thought I had reached the end of your criminations: but in your concluding paragraph you accuse me of an "unjust partiality;" meaning, no doubt, towards the British minister and his nation. The details I have given in this letter, I trust will abundantly prove that this charge is as unfounded as it is indecent. Those details verify the representations of the conduct of certain Spanish officers which are given in my report of the 3d of July to the President. If the truth has excited any unpleasant sensations, those only are to blame whose injurious acts obliged me plainly to declare it. Instead of this task, I should have been happy to execute the grateful office of stating to the President the good faith and amicable manner in which the officers of His Catholic Majesty had executed the treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation between our two nations.

You think, also, that my report to the President is not calculated to strengthen the bonds of friendship which unite Spain and America. Friendship, sir, cannot subsist without mutual confidence; and confidence springs from sincerity. But the proceedings of the Spanish officers, which are the subject of this correspondence, have shaken the confidence of the Government and of the citizens of the United States; and my report to the President only exhibits a summary of those proceedings; or rather the plain and obvious conclusions from the authentic facts and circumstances detailed in the documents, then and before presented to his view. And I dare venture to say, that every independent American has from the same premises drawn the same conclusions.

Nothing, sir, will give truer satisfaction to the Government and citizens of the United States than to see such a change in the proceedings of the Spanish officers as will restore confidence. The change would be easy and the effect certain. Let them withdraw their troops and garrisons from the territories of the United States. Let them commence and prosecute the running of the boundary line. Let them cease to stop, control, or regulate the passage of our citizens on the Mississippi, seeing these have a rightto navigate it with perfect freedom. And let them cease to send agents or emissaries among the Indians residing within the territories of the United States. When they shall do these things (and the good faith of His Catholic Majesty pledged in the treaty renders their doing them an indispensable duty) then we shall forget what is past; our confidence will return; and with it that beneficial intercourse and those friendly acts by which neighbors may promote each other's interests, welfare, and happiness. And for such a state of things, whatever you may have imagined to the contrary, no one more ardently wishes, and, on its arrival, no one will more sincerely rejoice, than

Your obedient servant,

NEW YORK, 19*th August*, 1797.

SIR:

The day before yesterday, the 17th, your letter of the 8th instant was received at my house at Philadelphia, and yesterday, the 18th, it came to my hands at this city. I avail myself of the first opportunity to acknowledge the receipt of this your answer to my letter of the 11th of July last, and as the examination of its contents would lead us to an endless discussion, I confine myself to mention to you, that when I had the honor of giving you the first notice relative to the projected expedition against Louisiana, with all the particulars referred to in my said letter, you were alone in your cabinet: that two days after I went to speak to you on another subject, and having there met the Secretary of War, Mr. M'Henry, I embraced the opportunity of speaking anew concerning it; and if then I spoke in general terms, it was doubtless to avoid the repetition of what I had communicated so shortly before. As it appears that you have forgotten this circumstance, it is not extraordinary that it should have escaped your memory in like manner with all the particulars of my first conference, mentioned in my above cited letter.

I offer myself to your disposition, and hope that God will preserve you many years.

Your most obedient servant,

CARLOS MARTINEL DE YRUJO.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq. Secretary of State.

No. 15.

PHILADELPHIA, 9*th October*, 1797.

SIR:

When the King my master appointed me his envoy extraordinary to the United States of America, immediately after having made with them a treaty the most liberal and generous,* I flattered myself that the principal exercise of my functions would be to give and receive repeated proofs of the union and friendship so intimate by the bands of that treaty. Instead of those flattering expectations, judge of my feelings on seeing them entirely vanished, and finding in that convention, which I trusted would forever have united us, the origin of disagreement and contention, unfortunately too well founded on our part.

I have before made known to you the just motives which determined the Spanish commandants of Louisiana to suspend in part the entire execution of the treaty, as no injury to the United States would flow from a short delay; and it might occasion great injury to the security of the possessions of the King to abandon certain posts, which, under present circumstances, would leave Louisiana open to the attacks of the English, and exposed to the effects of the evil intention of some citizens of the United States. I have also heretofore shown to you that the American agents at the Natchez, far from contributing to preserve that union and harmony which is so suitable to the two nations, conducted themselves in a manner highly imprudent; and even that I had reason to believe that they intended to obtain possession of the fort by surprise. The last advices which I have received from those parts, and the documents I herewith transmit to you, appear to me to prove it in such manner, that I cannot but consider those suspicions as being very well founded.

For some time past the conduct, in this respect, of the commandant of the American troops, Mr. Piercy Smith Pope, and at first of Mr. Andrew Ellicott, has been irregular, provoking, and, in some degree, hostile. The commandant, Don Manuel Gayoso, had positive advice that, in the camp of said Pope, a great number of ladders were making, and that arms (armas blancas) were preparing, evincing by these preparations their determination to assault the fort. The firmness and vigilance of the Governor, Don Manuel Gayoso, appears to have induced them to alter their intentions, and being well persuaded that the forts of Nogales and the Natchez could not be taken, either by force or surprise, they availed themselves of some profligate people to foment an insurrection, which it appears was to have taken effect on the 12th June, and which the prudence and preponderance of the wealthy inhabitants were alone capable effectually to stop.

The official letters of Mr. Piercy Smith Pope and Mr. Andrew Ellicott, numbered 3 and 4, and the documents 5 and 6, evidently show the part which both of them took in that popular commotion, however they may pretend to deny it; since, assuredly, nothing of this kind would have happened if they had not assumed, without any authority whatever, to treat of, and determine, some points and discussions of a political nature, foreign to their commission, with a publicity and arrogance calculated to compromit the two powers, explaining themselves without candor, and with intent to lead astray the populace on the principal point of the difficulty which had occasioned a wish on both sides for an explanation of the doubts which arose respecting the treaty.

* Although you only characterise as just, the stipulations of the treaty with Spain, I will take the liberty of observing, that, abstractedly from all the points which I touched in my letter of the 6th May, the Spanish sovereignty over the Natchez being in right of conquest at the period of the peace of 1783, if the United States obtained this possession by a voluntary convention, they owe it only to the generosity of Spain.

If their conduct has been provoking and insulting, their language towards the Spanish Government has not been less so. Mr. Andrew Ellicott, in his letter of the 13th of June, to Don Manuel Gayoso, says: "to embrace the means which will finally assure to them their happiness, cannot be censured;" (alluding to the change of the people of the Natchez from the dominion of the King my master to that of the United States) this is clearly an indirect attack upon the Spanish Government, as unjust as improper on the part of an agent of a friendly nation.

The document number 5, signed by Mr. Ellicott and Piercy Smith Pope, dated the 13th June, evidences, by the manner in which it is written, their intentions to deceive the public. At that time, and even since, they neither had, nor could have, just ground for officially speaking of an approaching rupture between the United States and Spain; yet you will see, that they speak of it as a thing at hand, and almost inevitable, relying only on the preparations for self-defence made in some forts on the banks of the Mississippi, and which they knew to be in consequence of the intended expedition of the English.

The whole tenor of their correspondence, and particularly the document number 6, leaves no doubt that these agents have interfered in political matters utterly foreign to their commission, engaging themselves to co-operate with the committee appointed to obtain the due execution of justice, and approving of the propositions presented to Governor Gayoso.

The repeated declarations you have made to me, that the intention and desire of the United States are to preserve peace and a good understanding with Spain, leave me no room to doubt that the scandalous and insulting conduct of Mr. Ellicott at first, and finally of Captain Piercy Smith Pope, is purely arbitrary, without any other guide than their passions and individual interests; and, at the same time, I can do no less than apply to you in the name of the King my master, in order that, for such repeated insults, there may be given to us due satisfaction, as necessary to Spain as becoming for the United States. God preserve you many years.

Your most obedient and humble servant,

CARLOS MARTINEZ DE YRUJO.

Governor Gayoso to Captain Pope.

SIR:

From repeated information of which I am possessed, it appears certain (and the conduct of some of the inhabitants of this Government equally manifest it) that a number of the subjects of His Majesty meditate and intend to rise and hostilely attack the fort, unmindful of the oath of fidelity which they have taken, and of the benign protection which the Government has dispensed to them for many years, and declaring themselves, as it is said, citizens of the United States of America. It is also further asserted, that they do it by your instigation, and that they have in their possession a paper in which you give authority to them in their rebellious designs, and by which you promise them your protection, and to furnish them the means of putting them into execution.

I cannot persuade myself that you would act in so unlawful a manner, as to be the promoter and an active party in an insurrection which will inevitably terminate in a rupture between the two nations, and the total ruin of this district and its inhabitants: wherefore, I pray you to inform me positively whether such is, or is not, your intention, in order that I may notify it to the Commandant General of this province, that it may be communicated to His Majesty. And if you persist in the same opinion, from this moment I protest solemnly, in the name of my said Commandant General, against a conduct so irregular, making you responsible for the fatal consequences which may flow from it.

I repeat the request to you to give me a categorical answer on this subject, and I have the honor to be, with consideration, sir, your most obedient servant,

MANUEL GAYOSO DE LEMOS.

NATCHEZ, June 13, 1797.

No. 3. A.

Lieutenant Pope to Governor Gayoso.

CAMP AT THE NATCHEZ, June 13, 1797.

SIR:

I have received your letter of this date, in answer to which I must avail myself of anterior occurrences. Did you not, shortly after my arrival here, positively give it to be understood that you intended to evacuate this post, as being within the territory of the United States? In attending to your first correspondence, I presume you cannot impute to me the charge of inconsistency and impropriety. If your Government feels the necessity of breaking its engagements, and if, on this very account, the people become irritated against it, as I have not been the first promoter of the deceit, so I am as little responsible for the event. I consider myself as the person appointed by my Government to take possession of the post of the Natchez: you admitted it in the beginning, and I, consequently, have a right to sustain it. It is not surprising that the citizens of the United States have chosen me to defend their right. After reflecting maturely on every part of the question, it is surprising that you should yet consider the people of the Natchez as subjects of His Catholic Majesty. But you appear to me to request that I should give you positive answers to general questions.

Have you endeavored to instigate the people of this country to act hostilely against the interests of His Catholic Majesty? Have you stirred up the people to take the fort? or, have you moved or incited them to other hostile objects?

To each of these questions I answer positively, no; but as commandant of the troops of the United States at the lower posts, I must assure you, that the landing of any troops, or the repairing of the fortifications of the territory in question, will be considered as an attack upon the dignity and the honor of my country, and I shall conceive myself bound by duty to act conformably to my present sentiments. I cannot, nevertheless, as far as respects myself, omit informing you, that any agreement upon just principles will meet my approbation.

PIERCY SMITH POPE,

Commandant of the troops of the United States on the Mississippi.

Senor DON MANUEL GAYOSO DE LEMOS.

We, the subscribers, have no knowledge of our country being now at war; but from the hostile preparations which the officers of His Catholic Majesty are making in these parts, we are induced to believe that war is not very distant, and until the commencement of hostilities against the United States, those who consider themselves citizens thereof will respect all descriptions of persons and things.

ANDREW ELLICOTT, Commissoner of the U. S.
PIERCY SMITH POPE,
Commandant of the United States troops on the Mississippi.

NATCHEZ, 13*th June*, 1797.

No. 16.

The Chevalier de Yrujo to the Secretary of State.

PHILADELPHIA, November 21, 1797.

SIR:

Although the answer which you gave to the letter I had the honor of writing to you on the 6th of May last, excited in me all the observations which I shall now present to you in this, wishing, upon the whole, that the interests of America would induce its administration to adopt the conciliatory mode which I proposed to you, that of giving to the American plenipotentiaries going to Paris the necessary instructions for adjusting the differences with Spain, I at that time abstained from entering into a reply; which, although well founded, might not perhaps contribute so much to the good intelligence between Spain and the United States as the idea which I then suggested to you, and have just now mentioned. The lively desire which I have had, and still have, not to see interrupted the harmony between these two nations, has caused me to view with regret, after several weeks silence, your disappointment in supposing that the reasons upon which your answer is founded were sufficient to convince His Catholic Majesty of the impartiality and good faith of the United States on this point. My suspicions have been verified, and your expectations are entirely frustrated by the late order that I have just received from the King my master.

His Catholic Majesty has not observed in the said answer from you, any reason to induce him to change his opinion concerning the injuries resulting to his subjects from the stipulations of the English treaty, compared with those of the treaty with Spain, as well on the subject of the articles of contraband, as on the principle adopted in ours, "that free ships should make free goods," &c.

But what has most astonished His Majesty, and confirmed him in the justice of his pretensions, is what you have said in your answer with regard to the navigation of the Mississippi. I am ordered, therefore, on a review of the whole, to make to this Government, through you, the following observations:

When the Secretary of State, Mr. Jefferson, on the 15th of May, 1793, wrote to Mr. Ternant, then the minister plenipotentiary of France, reclaiming the English ship Grange, captured at the mouth of the river Delaware by the frigate L'Ambuscade, belonging to the republic, he accompanied his letter with the opinion of Mr. Randolph, Attorney General of the United States, in which the right of reclamation was, among other reasons, founded on the following:

"That the whole of its descent to the Atlantic ocean is covered on each side by the territory of the United Sates: that from tide water to the distance of about sixty miles from the Atlantic ocean, it is called the river Delaware.

"That its mouth is formed by the capes Henlopen and May; the former belonging to the State of Delaware in property and jurisdiction; the latter to the State of New Jersey.

"That the Delaware does not lead from the sea to the dominions of any foreign nation.

"The corner stone of our claim is, that the United States are proprietors of the lands on both sides of the Delaware, from its head to its entrance into the sea.

"A river, considered merely as such, is the property of the people through whose lands it flows, or of him under whose jurisdiction that people is." Grot. b. 2. c. 2. § 12.

"Rivers might be held in property, though neither where they rise, nor where they discharge themselves, be within our territory, but they join both, or the sea. It is sufficient for us that the larger part of water, that is, the sides, is shut up in our banks, and that the river, in respect of our land, is itself small and insignificant." Grot. b. 2. c. 3. § 7. And Barbegroe* in his note subjoins that neither of those is necessary.

"Rivers may be the property of whole States." Puff. b. 2. c. 3. § 4. "To render a thing capable of being appropriated, it is not strictly necessary that we should enclose, or be able to enclose it within artificial bounds, or such as are different from its own substance; it is sufficient if the compass and extent of it can be any way determined. And therefore Grotius hath given himself a needless trouble when, to prove rivers capable of property, he useth this argument, that although they are bounded by the land at neither end, but united to the other rivers or the sea, yet it is enough that the greater part of them, that is, their sides, are enclosed." Puff. b. 4. c. 5. § 3.

"When a nation takes possession of a country, in order to settle there, it possesses every thing included in it, as lands, lakes, and rivers." Vattel, b. 1. c. 22. § 266.

"Congress, too, have acted on these ideas, when, in their collection of laws, they ascribe to a State the rivers wholly within that State.

"The gulfs and channels, or arms of the sea, are, according to the regular course, supposed to belong to the people with whose lands they are encompassed." Puff. b. 4. c. 5. § 8.

"These remarks may be enforced by asking, What nation can be injured in its rights by the Delaware being appropriated to the United States? And to what degree may not the United States be injured on the contrary ground? It communicates with no foreign dominion."

What a multitude of consequences may be drawn from the application of these principles, established by the American administration four years ago, with regard to the navigation of the Mississippi! The powerful arms held therein by Spain for obstructing this navigation, her not having made use of them, and her having insisted in a manner so explicit and positive that the citizens of the United States alone should have a right to the advantages of this river, are a convincing and incontestable proof of the good faith and upright intentions of Spain. But the privilege of the citizens of the United States to navigate the said river to the ocean not being now doubted, let us quit this point, in order to treat alone of that which regards the right acknowledged to England by the American administration for the enjoyment of its advantages.

What does Spain wish or desire? That the American citizens alone, of all the foreign nations, should enjoy the privilege of this navigation. What does the American administration wish or desire? That it should not be the American citizens alone, who should reap the advantages of it. From this difference of pretensions, it would appear that Spain defends the interests of America more than the administration itself.

You say in your answer to me of the 17th of May, "But I might deny that the United States ever granted the right of navigating the Mississippi to Great Britain. A recurrence to the treaties to which you refer, will prove that she possessed that right by the peace of 1763; and that she has never formally relinquished it." In another paragraph of the same letter you add, "By the definitive treaty of peace concluded the 3d of September, 1783, the latter ceded to Spain East Florida, as also West Florida; but the river Mississippi, as you observe, is not even mentioned in the treaty. What is the just inference from this circumstance the United States need not decide. Doubtless Great Britain conceived it important to hold a right to the navigation of it, and all parties at that time certainly supposed that parts of her territories joined its eastern side, and probably no one can now say they do not."

* Meaning Barbeyrac.

If it be certain that the United States never have granted to England the right of navigating the Mississippi to the ocean, it is notwithstanding very evident that they have acknowledged it with every solemnity, as appears by the treaty of 1783, by that of commerce, and lastly by the explanatory article signed on the 4th of May, 1796. How then could you say to me, "What is the just inference from this circumstance, the United States need not decide?" Have they not decided as positively, as favourably for England, by acknowledging the claim to an unjust right? Which of the principles established by the officers of the administration, in relation to the Delaware, in the case of the ship Grange, will apply to England in relation to the Mississippi? For instance, is its source in the British dominions? Does it run through their provinces or discharge itself in their possessions? But you say that when, by the treaty of 1783, England ceded to Spain East and West Florida, she did not make mention of the Mississippi; but the Attorney General of the United States established, in the case of the Grange, the principle of Vattel, that "when a nation takes possession of a country, in order to settle there, it possesses every thing included in it, as lands, lakes, rivers;" of course when Great Britain ceded East and West Florida, she likewise ceded the lands, lakes, and rivers, the right of which she might have held in the said possessions. By the principle established by you that she had not expressly renounced it, having made no mention of the rivers Apalachicola, Mobile, or Alabama, and others, the United States might believe themselves in like manner authorized to recognize the navigation in favor of England, because they are not mentioned in the treaty. France also might claim the navigation of the Mississippi, since in the act of session to Spain of New Orleans, she did not expressly renounce the navigation of this river. By this same principle, the United States might suppose themselves authorized to recognize to France the right of navigating the river St. Lawrence. The case is absolutely similar. France does not hold an inch of land on its borders: England does not possess a thumb's breadth on those of the Mississippi. The river St. Lawrence neither has its source, runs through, nor empties in, the possessions of France. The Mississippi neither has its origin, runs through, nor empties in the dominions of England. France once had the right of navigating the river St. Lawrence, because she had possessions on its borders. England also once enjoyed the right to the navigation of the Mississippi, because she had possessions on its margins. In the cession of Canada, no mention is made of the river St. Lawrence, although it speaks of islands. Nor is the Mississippi named in the cession of the Floridas. The case then is absolutely similar. If the United States, although they did not grant, should acknowledge to France the right of navigating the river of St. Lawrence, would not England, with infinite reason, consider herself as justly offended? Why, therefore, when the United States acknowledge to England a right as unjust, with regard to Spain, as prejudicial to the American citizens, should not Spain look upon herself as offended and insulted? I repeat the text of Vattel, "When a nation takes possession of a country, in order to settle there, it possesses every thing included in it, as lands, lakes, rivers."

Afterwards, touching the subject whether the possessions border on the Mississippi or not, you add, "and probably no one can now say they do not." I can assure you they do not. The late discoveries of M'Kenzie, and the best map that has hitherto been published of North America, in London, about eighteen months ago, by A. Arrowsmith, evideuce that the true origin of the Mississippi is in White Bear lake, and that from that point its waters do not touch any English territory. If other testimony were necessary, I should not seek it abroad. At Milford, in Connecticut, there now lives Mr. Peter Pond, who has been employed seventeen years in the service of the Hudson Bay Company; has passed over and examined all those regions; has been at the same origin of the Mississippi, that is, at White Bear Lake, and has formed a valuable map, which he now preserves in manuscript, and which confirms that the English have not a foot of land on the borders of the Mississippi.

Having, therefore, in my opinion, completely confuted the most essential part of the answer which you gave to my said letter of the 6th May, and having proved to demonstration the just motives which His Catholic Majesty has for being offended with the explanatory article signed by you and Mr. Bond, on the 4th of May, 1796, it only remains for me to ask you, in the name of the King my master, whether the United States contemplate, or not, the performance of the above mentioned treaty in this particular.

I tender you my services, and hope that the Lord may preserve you many years.

Your most obedient servant,

CARLOS MARTINEZ DE YRUJO.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq. Secretary of State.

No. 17.

[FOR THE AURORA.]

To the Native American:

The punctuality with which I have answered the letters you addressed to the Chevalier de Yrujo, and the defence you have taken on yourself, as well of Mr. Pickering as of the interests of Great Britain, authorize me in directing this letter to you, and imposes on you the obligation of answering it. Previous to my entering on the principal object of it, permit me, sir, to make a few observations.

Since our correspondence has ceased, the King of Great Britain and his council have declared that they should not consider in England, as American citizens, those who have been naturalized since the acknowledgment of our independence. This tyrannical declaration, contrary to all the principles of natural right, acknowledged by the first publicists, which, as it injures a great number of individuals in this country, and wounds, at the same time, the sacred right of its sovereignty, I expected would have excited in you, sir, that fervent zeal with which you have appeared to defend the interest of the United States in the dispute respecting the delivery of the posts and the line of demarcation with the Spaniards. From whence, then, arises this silence? Are you ignorant of the effects of this determination which extends the oppression of Great Britain to the very wilds of America? Can you be ignorant that the three-fifths of that active and valuable class of citizens which export the products of the country, equip the ships which carry the American flag to the extremities of the earth, and which supports our fisheries, in the perfect confidence and security of being protected by that Government to whom they have sworn allegiance, are thereby entirely thrown on the mercy of England? And do you not foresee that its immediate consequence is authorizing the British ships of war hereafter to seize the crews of our vessels under the appearance of a right? Where then is this zeal of yours which resounded in every gazette, when the subject in question was merely a momentary suspension of a part of the treaty with Spain, although this nation had the most powerful motives for so doing? What is become of the phalanx of scribblers, at whose head you appeared, with Fenno and the mighty Porcupine, to defend vigorously the rights of America? Surely, neither you nor any other person whatever will pretend to deny, or even express a doubt, that the above mentioned declaration of the British monarch does not violate them in a most unjust and hostile manner? From whence, then, so much noise and clamor when treating of the affairs in dispute with Spain? And from whence arises that servile silence in a Native American, when the question is to defend his country against the tyranny of England? This difference of conduct confirms my suspicions of your being a mere British hireling, who has assumed a respectable title in order the more easily to deceive the good faith and candor of your readers; but fortunately you have completely unmasked yourself, and the public may now judge the degree of faith and confidence to be placed in your productions. But to return to the affairs of Spain.

In my former letters I think I evidently proved the injustice of your attacks against Spain and its ministers. I think I have sufficiently shown that the projects of Blount, and the intended expedition of the English against the possessions of His Catholic Majesty, have justified the retention of the posts, as the most imminent danger might have arisen by their delivery. I shall now endeavor to give fresh proofs of our administration's not acting towards Spain with that equity, justice, and honor which a sound policy requires, and which certainly appertains to a nation that calls itself neutral, and affects to be strictly so.

Ever since exterior commerce and navigation, which is its consequence, have influenced in politics, mercantile connexions have been considered the links which unite most one nation with another. These mercantile relations consist in mutual wants and reciprocal means of satisfying them. From such evident principles, it results that there exists few nations which would and ought to establish a more intimate connexion than the United States and Spain. Our flour, plank, timber, pitch, and the articles of salt provisions, can always find a sure and advantageous market in His Catholic Majesty's dominions, both in Europe and America: on the other hand, the wines, brandies, oil, and fruits of Spain, the coffee and sugar of her colonies, are articles we are in want of. Behold here the basis of a perfect union and friendship, which would open an extensive field for speculation with mutual advantage. His Catholic Majesty made the first step towards this union, by concluding with the United States a very liberal treaty, established on the principles of sound policy; and when we ought to have expected that our administration would endeavor to tighten the bands of friendship with a nation from whom so many advantages would have accrued, it signed on the 4th of May, 1796, only a few months after concluding a treaty with Spain, an explanatory article to that part of the English treaty which regards the navigation of the Mississippi, acknowledging to the English a right to the said navigation. In order to convince every impartial American of the injustice of this proceeding, I shall not seek in any foreign text for arguments on which to ground mine. The principles established by the officers of the United States three or four years ago will be the basis of my observations.

When the Secretary of State, Mr. Jefferson, wrote on the 15th of May, 1793, to M. de Ternant, then minister plenipotentiary of France, claiming the British ship Grange, taken at the entrance of the Delaware by the French frigate l'Ambuscade, he communicated to him the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, in which, among others, he founded his claim on the following reasons:

"That the whole of its descent (the river Delaware) to the Atlantic Ocean is covered on each side by territory of the United States.

"That from tide-water to the distance of about sixty miles from the Atlantic Ocean, it is called the river Delaware.

"That its mouth is formed by the Capes Henlopen and May; the former belonging to the State of Delaware, in property and jurisdiction: the latter to the State of New Jersey.

"That the Delaware does not lead from the sea to the dominions of any foreign nation.

"The corner stone of our claim is, that the United States are proprietors of the land on both sides of the Delaware, from its head, to its entrance into the sea.

"A river, considered merely as such, is the property of the people through whose land it flows, or of him under whose jurisdiction that people is." Grot. b. 2. c. 2. § 12.

"Rivers might be held in property, though neither where they rise nor where they discharge themselves be within our territory, but they join to both, or the sea. It is sufficient for us that the larger part of water (that is, the sides) is shut up in our banks, and that the river, in respect of our land, is itself small and insignificant." Grot. b. 2. c. 3. § 7; and Barbegroe, in his note, subjoins that neither of those is necessary.

"Rivers may be the property of whole States." Puff. b. 3. c. 3. § 4.

"To render a thing capable of being appropriated, it is not strictly necessary that we should enclose it, or be able to enclose within artificial bounds, or such as are different from its own substance; it is sufficient if the compass and extent of it can be any way determined: and, therefore, Grotius has given himself a needless trouble when, to prove rivers capable of property, he useth this argument—that, although they are bounded by the land at neither end, but united to the other rivers, or the sea, yet it is enough that the greater part of them (that is, their sides) are enclosed." Puff. b. 4. c. 5. § 3.

"When a nation takes possession of a country, in order to settle there, it possesses every thing included in it, as lands, lakes, rivers." Vattel, b. 1. c. 22. § 266.

"Congress, too, have acted on these ideas, when, in their collection of laws, they ascribe to a State the rivers wholly within that State.

"The gulfs and channels, or arms of the sea, are, according to the regular course, supposed to belong to the people with whose lands they are encompassed." Puff. b. 4. c. 5. § 8.

"These remarks may be enforced by asking, what nation can be injured in its rights by the Delaware being appropriated to the United States? And to what degree may not the United States be injured on the contrary ground? It communicates with no foreign dominion."

Now, Mr. Native American, what a multitude of consequences could we not draw by an application of these principles (established by our administration four years ago) to the subject respecting the navigation of the Mississippi! What powerful arms was it not in the hands of Spain to have refused us this navigation! Not to have made use of them, and her insisting, in an explicit and positive manner, that the citizens alone of the United States should have a right to the advantages of this river, evidently proves her good faith and sound intentions. But, as the right which the Americans have to navigate this river to the very ocean is no longer doubtful, let us quit this topic, and treat only of that with respect to the right acknowledged by our administration in favor of England to these advantages.

What does Spain wish for, or desire? That, of all foreign nations, the Americans alone should enjoy the privilege of this navigation. And what is the wish and desire of our administration? That the citizens of America should not be the only people to enjoy its advantages. From this it evidently results that the King of Spain is the defender of the interests of America, and that our administration, instead of promoting it, has meanly sacrificed it to England. Impartial Americans, who love your country with more sincerity than the native American, to whom I address this letter, let your attention rest awhile on the present subject, and you will evidently see I do not exaggerate, when I tell you that, in this respect, our administration has basely sacrificed our advantages by their unjust partiality to Great Britain. In order to make this more evident, examine the answer given by Mr. Pickering on the 17th of May to the Chevalier de Yrujo's letter of the 6th of the same month; in it you will see that the Secretary of State of a neutral nation, precisely in a moment when his administration is taxed of being unjustly partial to England, instead of effacing this impression by a line of conduct strictly neutral, takes upon himself to defend the cause and interests of Great Britain. Mr. Pickering, attacked by the strength of the Chevalier de Yrujo's arguments, says, "But I might deny that the United States ever granted the right of navigating the Mississippi to Great Britain; a recurrence to the treaties to which you refer will prove that she possessed that right by the peace of 1763, and that she has never formally relinquished it." In another paragraph of the same letter, he says, "By the definitive treaty of peace between Spain and Great Britain, in 1783, the latter ceded to Spain East Florida, as also West Florida; but the river Mississippi, as you observe, is not even mentioned in the treaty. What is the just inference from this circumstance, the United States need not decide. Doubtless, Great Britain conceives it important to hold a right to the navigation of it; and all parties at that time certainly supposed that parts of her territories joined its eastern side, and probably no one can now say they do not." Mr. Native American, if it be true that the United States never granted the right of navigating the Mississippi as far as the ocean to Great Britain, can you, or any other person who knows how to read, pretend to deny that, if they did not grant it, they solemnly acknowledged it, as appears by the treaty of 1783, the unfortunate treaty of commerce, and lastly by the explanatory article, signed the 4th of May, 1796? How, then, can Mr. Pickering presume to say, "what is the just inference from this circumstance, the United States need not decide." Has it not been positively decided in favor of Great Britain, by acknowledging and confirming an unjust right thereto? Which of the principles established by the officers of Government, respecting the Delaware, in the affair of the Grange, can be applied to England, with respect to the Mississippi? Does it take its rise in her dominions? Does it run through the territories, or does it empty itself in her possessions? However, Mr. Pickering says that, when by the definitive treaty of peace of 1783, England ceded East and West Florida, no mention was made of the Mississippi. Mr. Native American, the Attorney General of the United States has established the principle of Vattel, that, when a nation takes possession of a country, in order to settle there, it possesses every thing included in it, as lands, lakes, and rivers. Of course, when Great Britain ceded East and West Florida, it equally ceded the lands, lakes, and rivers, to which it had a right in the said provinces. By this same principle of Mr. Pickering, as no mention was made of the rivers Apalachicola, Mobile, or Alabama, and others, the United States might, with as much propriety, suppose themselves authorized to recognize a right to their navigation in favor of Great Britain. France might equally claim a right to the navigation of the Mississippi, as, in the act of ceding New Orleans to Spain, she does not expressly renounce the navigation of said river. On the very same principle, the United States might suppose themselves authorized to recognize a right to France to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence: the case is identically the same. France has not an inch of land on its banks; England has not a spot on those of the Mississippi. The river St. Lawrence neither takes its rise, nor runs, nor empties itself in the possessions of France; the Mississippi neither rises, nor runs, nor empties itself in the dominions of Great Britain. France had once a right to the navigation of the river St. Lawrence, because she had possessions on its banks; England, likewise, had once a right to the navigation of the Mississippi, because she had possessions on its borders. In the cession of Canada, no mention is made of the river St. Lawrence, although mention is made of its islands: in the cession of the Floridas, no mention is likewise made of the Mississippi. Thus, then, I repeat, the case is identically the same. Now, Mr. Native American, if the United States were to require or acknowledge, although they did not grant, to France a right to navigate the river St. Lawrence, would not England, with great reason, be highly offended? Would she not look upon this act of the United States as an outrage? If so, why should not Spain look upon herself as grossly injured by the acknowledgment of a right as injurious to the subjects of Spain as it is to the citizens of America? I again repeat the quotation of Vattel: "When a nation takes possession of a country, in order to settle there, it possesses every thing included in it, as lands, lakes, rivers." Mr. Pickering continuing in the language and style of an advocate for Great Britain, instead of using that which becomes the Secretary of State of a nation which calls itself neutral, speaking whether the English possessions touch on the Mississippi or not, adds, "and probably no one can now say they do not." I, Mr. Native American, can assure you they do not; and if Mr. Pickering had been attentive to the progress of geography, and was even acquainted, as it is his duty, at least with that of his own country, he would know, as well as I, that they do not. The last discoveries of M'Kenzie, and the map published in London eighteen months ago by Mr. A. Arrowsmith, fully prove the origin of the Mississippi to be in the White Bear Lake; and that, from this point, its course does not run through any British possession. If it were necessary to produce any new testimony in addition to the foregoing, I would not seek it among foreigners. At Milford, in Connecticut, there actually lives a Mr. Peter Pond, who was employed seventeen years in the service of the Hudson Bay Company: he has gone over and examined particularly all those regions. He has been at the very source of the Mississippi, namely, the White Bear Lake, and has made out a valuable map, which he yet preserves in manuscript, and which confirms that the English have not a foot of land on the Mississippi. With these proofs, Mr. Native American, (notwithstanding Mr. Pickering's doubts, which are, perhaps, voluntary) I think I can safely assure you they do not.

Mr. Native American, the prosperity of the United States depends on peace, and peace on a strict neutrality; let us be just, and we shall be respected. Honesty is the best policy, and surely the contents of my former letter, as well as those of the present one, evidently prove that our administration has neither acted with justice or honesty towards Spain. The clamors respecting the momentary suspension of the least essential part of the treaty have been incessant, when, in reality, at the very moment Spain held out a friendly and liberal hand to us, we have repaid this act of generosity with ingratitude, recognizing to her enemy a claim to a pretended and unjust right. The friendship of Spain ought to be dear to us, as from a good understanding with her may result a commercial treaty, which would, at the same time, vivify and supply her colonies, and open an extensive field for the prosperity of our navigation and commerce. The unjust proceeding of the administration is not surely the method of obtaining an object we ought all anxiously to wish for. If the administration acts with justice and equity, it is the duty of every good American to support it; but I observe, with much regret, that many of my fellow-citizens daily confound the ministers, or the administration with Government, and think they support the latter, when in fact they support the administration. If ministers, animated either by the spirit of party, or by other views, proceed in their measures with injustice, it is necessary to attack the administration, in order to support the Government: for the administration can, in many instances, be as much the enemy of the Government as merchants are often the greatest enemies of commerce.

I hope, Mr. Native American, you will be pleased to favor me with an answer on the different points contained in this letter, as I shall look on your silence to be an implicit confession of the impossibility you find therein. Although the various subjects contained herein are susceptible of greater elucidation, I have adhered solely to the most prominent points, in order to facilitate your answer, and that the public may thoroughly investigate the subject.

VERUS.

No. 18.

The Secretary of State to the Chevalier de Yrujo.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PHILADELPHIA, January 20, 1798.

SIR:

As your letters of the 9th of October and 21st of November last contained no new matter of any consequence, and a fresh discussion of the points in dispute would require, on my part, only a recurrence to arguments formerly and conclusively urged, the general impression on my mind was, that it would not be necessary to give them a formal reply, whatever notice it might be proper to take of them in a report to the President of the United States. Nevertheless, I will now trouble you with a few observations.

A consideration of the papers heretofore laid before Congress, relative to the affairs on the Mississippi, of others since received from thence, in conjunction with your letter of the 9th of October, and its enclosures, convinces me that the conduct of Mr. Ellicott and Lieutenant Pope has been neither "scandalous" nor "insulting" towards the Spanish officers in that country; and that if any undue zeal or intemperance has been manifested by either, in maintaining the just rights of the United States, the measures adopted by those officers to evade the execution of the treaty between the United States and Spain have been the cause. It is by this course of conduct in the Spanish officers that the King their master has been dishonored, and not by the actions of the officers of the United States. I may, doubtless, be justified in saying, that their detention of the posts, and delays to run the boundary lines, have been unauthorized by the King. It is certain that neither of those Spanish officers has ever intimated an order from their Government as a warrant or an apology for their proceedings.

In your letter of the 21st of November, you recur to the several topics of your letter of the 6th of May, 1797, but exhibit no new argument on the points really in dispute. You barely mention the subject of the articles contraband of war, and the principle that free ships make free goods. The stipulations of the United States on these points, in their treaty of 1794, with Great Britain, were fully justified in my answer of the 17th of May, to your letter of the 6th. If any thing further were necessary, I would say (what I then mentioned as not to be doubted) that the Spanish Government voluntarily entered into the different stipulations with the United States when it possessed full knowledge of our stipulations in the commercial treaty with Great Britain, having in its hands the treaty itself; and having also ratified its treaty with the United States six months afterwards, which the Spanish Government would have been justified in refusing had there been any deception—any want of good faith on these points, on the part of the United States; but of which not a shadow of proof can be adduced.

The same observations apply to the other subject of your letter—the navigation of the river Mississippi—but with greater force: for, as I showed in my letter of the 17th of May, when the Prince of Peace proposed a mutual stipulation to exclude the British from the navigation of the Mississippi, Mr. Pinckney rejected it, and explicitly, because it would violate the faith of the United States, previously pledged to Great Britain; and the projected article of the Prince of Peace was altered accordingly. Yet, you now introduce those previous stipulations as subjects of complaint against the United States! It is true you also mention the subsequent explanatory article of the 4th of May, 1796, which is added to the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, of 1794, with Great Britain; but it is equally true that this contains no new stipulation, that it recognizes the principle that no subsequent treaty can make void prior engagements, (and, therefore, that this explanatory article of 1796 cannot, in the smallest degree, affect the prior treaty of 1795 with Spain) and that British subjects, the citizens of the United States, and the native Indians, shall enjoy full liberty of passage, intercourse, and commerce, with each other, "according to the stipulations of the third article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation." So that this explanatory article goes not beyond, but is positively confined within, the limits of the third article of the treaty of 1794; which, preceding, in order of time, the treaty with Spain by more than eleven months, and being, also, at the conclusion of the Spanish treaty perfectly well known to its Government, it cannot, consequently, afford to Spain the slightest ground of complaint.

I pass unnoticed your lengthy quotation from the opinion of Mr. Randolph, attorney general of the United States in 1793, and your observations upon it; because neither one nor the other touch the essential point in dispute between us.

As to the question in the last paragraph of your letter, I am authorized to say, that the United States are not concerned to vindicate the claim of Great Britain to the navigation of the river Mississippi. What was said on this subject of my letter of the 17th of May, was in consequence of your having entered into an examination of the British title to this navigation; and I said expressly, that I did not conceive it essential to the subject we were then discussing: I merely followed you. Our stipulation amounts only to this, that the United States shall not obstruct the navigation of the river by British subjects. If Great Britain demands and obtains it, or if Spain admits her claim, as she has reserved the right to do, in the 4th article of her treaty with the United States, the latter cannot oppose it: and if the British vessels and boats do navigate the Mississippi, we are bound to admit them into our ports on the eastern bank of that river. Whether this admission would be advantageous or injurious to the United States, it belonged to them only to judge; they have not asked, nor will they have occasion to ask Spain to be the guardian of their rights and interests on the Mississippi: they only desire, in this respect, that she would faithfully perform her own engagements sanctioned by a solemn treaty.

I am, sir, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

THE CHEVALIER DE YRUJO, Envoy Extraordinary, &c. &c. from His Catholic Majesty to the United States of America.

No. 19.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. Ellicott, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 14, 1797.

"On the 8th of June I received by Mr. Knox your despatches dated the 14th of April, which were laid before Congress on the 12th of June, and on the 29th of June, I received by Captain Hunter, your despatches dated the 10th of May, which on the 3d of July were also laid before Congress, together with the despatches from Captain Pope to the Secretary of War. These communications to Congress appear in the enclosed pamphlets.

"With respect to the important business with which you are charged, the repeated promises, followed by as often repeated failures to enter upon it, by the Spanish Governors, with other circumstances, afford too much reason to believe that there is an intention to postpone it. Nevertheless, the President is of opinion, and directs that you should remain at the Natchez, and always hold yourself in readiness to commence the running of the boundary line between the territories of the United States and of His Catholic Majesty. You will endeavor, in concert with Governor Gayoso, or other proper officer of His Catholic Majesty, to fix a time when this work of ascertaining the boundary line shall commence. This endeavor may be renewed as often as you shall think fit. Great care should be used to give no just cause of offence to the Spanish Government. What will be the final result of its measures is uncertain; but if war should follow, it will be of the last importance that the United States should not be the aggressors. The President, therefore, desires that your conduct should be perfectly guarded, moderate, and prudent."

No. 20.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. Ellicott, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PHILADELPHIA, August 30, 1797.

Your expresses, Mr. Bean and Mr. Robins, arrived here on the 24th instant, and delivered me your two letters of June 27th. The same day I received your letters of May 27th and June 4th and 5th.

The Baron de Carondelet's proclamation of the 24th of May, enclosed in your letter of June 4th, abandons almost all the former pretences for retaining the posts, which he says "is ocsasioned only by the imperious necessity of securing Lower Louisiana from the hostilities of the English, who have set on foot (without regard to the inviolability of the territory of the United States) an expedition against Upper Louisiana." By my former despatches covering the printed reports and documents, you will have seen that this expedition had never any existence. This is more fully shown in my letter of the 8th instant to the Chevalier de Yrujo, now enclosed. And my answer to him about the navigation of the Mississippi, and the articles of our treaties with Great Britain concerning it, also among the printed documents, demonstrates that in those stipulations we have not departed from the strictest line of good faith towards Spain; that we have granted nothing in respect to the navigation of the Mississippi, to Great Britain; and that the ideas the United States entertained on that subject, were perfectly known and understood by the Government of Spain, when our treaty with Spain was concluded; and that there is nothing contradictory between the two treaties, the British and Spanish.

As, therefore, the Baron de Carondelet has not a shadow of foundation to suspect an expedition by the British against Upper Louisiana; as the American Government has formally declared to the British Minister, for the information of his Government, that we will suffer the march of neither British nor Spanish troops through our territory, for the purpose of hostility of one against the other; as, finally, the British themselves (as you will see in Mr. Liston's letter among the printed documents) declare they had never formed such a plan of an expedition, and acknowledged that its execution would violate our territorial rights, for these reasons: on the principles of his proclamation the Baron ought immediately to evacuate the posts and territory of the United States.

These observations will also apply to the Baron's proclamation of the 31st of May, in which, however, he takes somewhat new ground. What "security" can the United States give, or rather what will the Baron deem a "security" against a descent of the English by the Mississippi?

If the facts and assurances already stated and given, on the part of the United States, do not satisfy, nothing can.

With respect to any hostile intentions of the United States towards Spain, as intimated by the Baron in this last proclamation, nothing is more unfounded. The march of the troops to Tennessee, from the Ohio, is for the sole purpose of establishing a force in that country, to restrain the inhabitants, or other citizens, from aggressions against the Cherokees, and especially to prevent a forced settlement, which was threatened, on the Indian lands; and any orders to the Cumberland militia to hold themselves in readiness, can be only for the object of preventing encroachments on the Indian lands, and to preserve peace. If we meditated an attack against the Spaniards on the Mississippi, we should certainly contemplate an easier route than by a wilderness of many hundred miles in extent, through which the transportation of stores and provisions would be impracticable; or of such extreme difficulty and boundless expense, as folly alone would attempt.

I have now only to notice the general commotion at the Natchez, among the inhabitants, against the Spanish Government, which seems to have been quieted very much by your prudent management. This line of conduct, caution, prudence, moderation, so as by all means to avoid the possibility of a charge of aggression against the United States, you will see, in my letter of the 14th of July, was specially enjoined by the President. And a perseverance in the same course, I trust, will eventually issue in a peaceable adjustment of the disputes now subsisting, respecting the posts, the country where they are situated, and the navigation of the Mississippi. The pacific views of the United States, and their good faith, are not to be doubted; and it is clear as demonstration can make it, that the Baron has nothing to apprehend from the British from Canada: and, consequently, that he has now no cause or pretence for retaining the posts, or for delaying to run the boundary line."

5th CONGRESS.] No. 130. [2d SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 3, 1798.

UNITED STATES, February 2, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I have received from our minister at London, two acts of the Parliament of Great Britain; one passed on the 4th of July, 1797, entitled "An act for carrying into execution the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between His Majesty and the United States of America," the other passed on the 19th day of July, 1797, entitled "An act for regulating the trade to be carried on with the British possessions in India, by the ships of nations in amity with His Majesty." These acts have such connexions with the commercial and political interests of the United States, that it is proper they should be communicated to Congress. I have accordingly transmitted copies of them with this message.

JOHN ADAMS.

ANNO TRICESIMO SEPTIMO GEORGII III. REGIS.

An act for regulating the trade to be carried on with the British possessions in India, by the ships of nations in amity with His Majesty. [19th July, 1797.]

Whereas by an act passed in the twelfth year of the reign of His late Majesty King Charles the Second, entitled an act for the encouraging and increasing of shipping and navigation, it was enacted that, from and after the first day of December, one thousand six hundred and sixty, and from thenceforward, no goods or commodities shall be imported into or exported out of any lands, islands, plantations, or territories to His Majesty belonging, or in his possession, or which may hereafter belong unto or be in the possession of His Majesty, his heirs and successors, in Asia, Africa, and America, in any other ship or ships, vessel or vessels, than such as do truly and without fraud belong unto the people of England or Ireland, dominion of Wales, or the town of Berwick upon Tweed, or are the built of, and belonging to, any of the said lands, islands, plantations, or territories, as the proprietors and right owners thereof, and whereof the master and three-fourths of the mariners, at least, are English, under certain penalties and forfeitures therein mentioned: and whereas it is expedient that the ships and vessels of countries and States in amity with His Majesty, should be allowed to import goods and commodities unto and to export the same from the British territories in India, subject to certain restrictions and regulations:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That, from and after the passing of this act, and during the continuance of the exclusive trade of the United Company of merchants of England, trading to the East Indies, and during the term for which the possessions of the British territories in India is secured to the said United Company, it shall and may be lawful for the ships and vessels of countries and States in amity with His Majesty, to import into and export from the British possessions in India, such goods and commodities as they shall be permitted to import into and export from the said possessions by the directors of the said company, who are hereby directed to frame such regulations for carrying on the trade to and from the said possessions and the countries and States in amity with His Majesty, as shall seem to them most conducive to the interest and prosperity of the said British possessions in India, and of the British empire; and no ship or vessel belonging to any of the subjects of States or countries in amity with His Majesty shall be liable to seizure, confiscation, or forfeiture, or other penalty, for exporting from or importing into the said British possessions in India, any goods or commodities, the importation or exportation of which, respectively, shall be permitted by the said regulation, any thing in the said hereinbefore recited act of the twelfth year of the reign of King Charles the Second, to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided always, That it shall not be lawful for the directors of the said United Company to frame any regulations for the conduct of the said trade, which shall be inconsistent with any treaty or treaties which shall have been or may be entered into by His Majesty, his heirs and successors, and any country or State at amity with His Majesty, or which may be inconsistent with any act or acts of Parliament which have been passed for the regulation of the trade and commerce of the said British territories in India.

II. And be it further enacted, That all such regulations as shall be framed by the said court of directors for carrying on the trade to and from the British possessions in India and the countries and States in amity with His Majesty, shall be, and they are hereby, directed to be subject to the superintendence, direction, and control of the board of commissioners for the affairs of India, in the same manner as all acts, operations, and concerns, which anywise relate to or concern the civil and military governments and revenues of the British territories and acquisitions in the East Indies now are.

III. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any general court of proprietors to alter or change, or to direct, or order, or authorize the altering or changing any resolution of the court of directors, or to rescind, revoke, suspend, or vary the same, in so far as the same relates to the intercourse of foreign nations in amity with His Majesty and the British territories in India.

An act for carrying into execution the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded between His Majesty and the United States of America. [4th July, 1797.]

Whereas a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation has been concluded between His Majesty and the United States of America: and whereas, by the eleventh article of the said treaty, it is agreed between His Majesty and the United States of America, that there should be a reciprocal and entirely perfect liberty of navigation and commerce between their respective people, in the manner, under the limitations, and on the conditions specified in the following articles of the said treaty: and whereas by the fifteenth article of the said treaty, it is further agreed, that no other or higher duties shall be paid by the ships or merchandise of the one party, in the ports of the other, than such as are paid by the like vessels or merchandise of all other nations; nor shall any other or higher duty be imposed in one country on the importation of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the other, than are or shall be payable on the importation of the like articles, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the other, than are or shall be payable on the importation of the like articles, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation or importation of any articles to or from the territories of the two parties, respectively, which shall not equally extend to all other nations:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in his present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That it shall and may be lawful to import into this kingdom, directly from any of the territories of the United States of America, in British built ships or vessels, owned, navigated, and registered according to law, or in ships built in the countries belonging to the United States of America, or any of them, or in ships taken by any of the ships or vessels of war belonging to the Government or any of the inhabitants of the said United States, having commissions or letters of marque and reprisal from the Government of the said United States, and condemned as lawful prize in any court of admiralty of the said United States, of which condemnation proof shall be given to the satisfaction of the commissioners of His Majesty's customs, or any four or more of them, in that part of Great Britain called England, and any three or more of them, in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, and owned by the subjects of the said United States, or any of them, and whereof the master and three-fourths of the mariners, at least, are subjects of the said United States, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the growth, production, or manufacture of the said United States, which are not prohibited by law to be imported from foreign countries, and to enter and land such goods, wares, and merchandise, upon payment of the duties, and subject to the conditions and regulations hereinafter mentioned; any law, custom, or usage, to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding.

II. And be it further enacted, That all such goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into Great Britain, either in such ships, or in British built ships, owned, navigated, and registered according to law, (except such goods, wares, and merchandise as are hereinafter particularly enumerated or described) shall, and may be entered and landed, upon payment of such duties of customs and excise, and no higher, as are payable on goods, wares, and merchandise of the like denomination or description, upon their importation into this Kingdom, in British built ships, from any other foreign country; and in cases where different duties are imposed upon goods, wares, and merchandise of the like denomination or description, imported from different foreign countries, then upon payment of the lowest duties which by law are required to be paid on the importation, in British built ships, of any such goods, wares, or merchandise, from any foreign country, according to the schedule and tables marked A. D. and F. annexed to an act, passed in the twenty-seventh year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act for repealing the several duties of customs and excise, and granting other duties in lieu thereof, and for applying the said duties, together with the other duties composing the public revenue; for permitting the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, the produce or manufacture of the European dominions of the French King, into this kingdom; and for applying certain unclaimed moneys, remaining in the exchequer for the payment of annuities on lives, to the reduction of the national debt;" or by any other laws in force, passed subsequent to the said act, touching the duties contained in the said schedule and tables marked A. D. and F., subject also, when imported in American ships, to the countervailing duties imposed by this act.

III. And, in order to encourage and promote the trade from the United States to this kingdom, Be it further enacted, That any pig iron, bar iron, pitch, tar, turpentine, rosin, pot ash, pearl ash, mahogany, masts, yards, and bowsprits, being the growth, production, or manufacture of the said United States, and all staves, and unmanufactured goods and merchandise, whatsoever, which are not prohibited by law to be imported from any foreign country, being the growth or production of the said United States, shall, or may be imported in British or American ships, owned and navigated as herein before required, upon payment of such duties of customs and excise, as are payable on the like goods, wares, and merchandise, when accompanied with the certificates required by law upon their importation into this kingdom, in British built ships, from any British island or plantation in America, notwithstanding such goods, wares, or merchandise may not be accompanied with the certificates heretofore required by law, subject also, when imported in American ships, to the countervailing duties imposed by this act.

IV. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That upon the importation into Great Britain from the said United States of America, of wheat, wheat meal or flour, rye, barley, beer or bigg, oats, oatmeal, peas, beans, Indian corn, and maize, the duties to be paid thereon respectively shall be regulated and ascertained according to the prices of wheat, rye, barley, beer or bigg, peas, beans, oats, and oatmeal, in the manner set forth and specified in the table marked D, in an act passed in the thirty-first year of his Majesty's reign, entitled "An act for regulating the importation and exportation of corn, and the payment of the duty on foreign corn imported, and of the bounty on British corn exported;" any thing contained in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

V. And be it further enacted, That all oil made from fish, or creatures living in the sea, and blubber, whale fins, and spermaceti, being the produce of the fisheries carried on by the people of the said United States of America, may be imported from the countries of the said United States into this kingdom, in British or American ships, owned and navigated as herein before required, upon payment of such duties of customs as are payable on the like goods and merchandise, upon their importation into this kingdom, in British built ships, from countries not under the dominion of his Majesty, subject also, when imported in American ships, to the countervailing duties imposed by this act.

VI. And be it further enacted, That any tobacco, being the growth or production of any of the territories of the said United States of America, may be imported in British or American ships, owned and navigated as herein before required, upon payment of the same duties of customs and excise, as tobacco imported by British subjects, from any British colony or plantation in America, is, or may hereafter be subject to; and that any snuff, being the production and manufacture of any of the said territories, may be imported, in manner before mentioned, upon payment of such duties of customs and excise, as snuff, being the production or manufacture of Europe, imported from Europe is, or hereafter may be subject to, and may be warehoused and again exported; such tobacco and snuff to be subject respectively nevertheless, to all and singular, the regulations, restrictions, penalties, and forfeitures, relating to the importation and exportation thereof, or in any other respect relating thereto, of an act, made and passed in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of his present Majesty, entitled, "An act for repealing the duties on tobacco and snuff, and for granting new duties in lieu thereof;" and another act, passed in the thirtieth year of his present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act to explain and amend an act, made in the last session of Parliament, entitled "An act for repealing the duties on tobacco and snuff, and for granting new duties in lieu thereof;" or of any other act since made relating thereto, subject also, when imported in American ships, to the countervailing duties imposed by this act: Provided always, that such tobacco shall be accompanied with a manifest, as by law required.

VII. And be it further enacted, That any rice, being the growth or production of any of the territories of the United States of America, which shall be imported directly from thence into any of the ports of Great Britain, in manner before mentioned, may, upon the importer paying down, in ready money, the duty of eight pence the hundred weight, being part of the duties now payable on the importation of rice, be landed and warehoused, except as herein-after provided, under the joint locks of His Majesty and the importer, in such warehouses as shall be approved of for that purpose by the commissioners of His Majesty's customs, or any four or more of them, in that part of Great Britain called England, or any three or more of them, in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, or by the collector and comptroller of His Majesty's customs of the respective ports into which such rice shall be imported, upon the importer's own bond for payment of the remainder of the duties due and payable for such rice, within eighteen months, according to the net weight and quantity of such rice at the time it shall be so landed: Provided always, that upon the importation of any such rice into the ports of London, Bristol, Portsmouth, Cowes, Liverpool, Lancaster, Falmouth, Poole, Whitehaven, Hull, Greenock, and Port Glasgow, or either of them, in the manner herein before expressed, the importer shall be at liberty to enter and land the same, without payment of any duty whatever, upon condition that such rice shall be warehoused under the joint locks of His Majesty and the importers, in such warehouse or warehouses as shall be approved of for that purpose by the commissioners of His Majesty's customs, or any four or more of them, in that part of Great Britain called England, or any three or more of them, in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, or by the collector and comptroller of His Majesty's customs of the respective ports where such rice shall be imported: And that every expense attending such warehousing shall be borne by the said importers; and that such importer or importers, or his or their known servant, shall, from time to time, at all seasonable hours, as occasion may require, have free access to such warehouses, in the presence of some proper officer of the customs, for the purpose of skreening and shifting the rice, to prevent it receiving damage; and that if any rice, which shall be so imported from the territories of the said United States into any of the ports above mentioned respectively, and warehoused as aforesaid, shall be taken out of the warehouses, wherein the same shall be secured under the joint locks of His Majesty and the importers as aforesaid, for home consumption, the full duties due and payable by law, upon the importation of such rice into this kingdom for home consumption, and also, when imported in American ships, the countervailing duty imposed by this act shall, previously to its being taken out of such warehouses, be paid to the collector of His Majesty's customs at the port where such rice shall be so warehoused; but that such importer, if he intends to export such rice, shall have liberty to export the same from such warehouses respectively, under the same regulations under which such rice might be exported by law immediately before the passing of this act, without payment of any duty whatever: Provided that the exportation of any such rice, hereafter to be warehoused under the authority of this act, be made within the said space of eighteen months; but if not exported within that period, that the full duties payable by law and also when imported in American ships, the countervailing duty imposed by this act shall be paid for the same, and not be afterwards drawn back; and that if any rice, which shall have been imported into any port of this kingdom, not herein before specially named, and shall have been warehoused upon the importer's bond, in manner aforesaid, shall within the time herein before mentioned, be taken out of the warehouse wherein it shall have been so secured, to be exported directly from thence, the bond entered into for the payment of the said duties thereon shall be discharged and cancelled by debenture or debentures, made out and passed in the usual manner, for the quantity or quantities of rice duly exported; and if any rice imported into any port of this kingdom, not herein before specially named and warehoused in manner aforesaid, shall be taken out of any such warehouse for home consumption, the remainder of the duties due and payable by law, and also, when imported in American ships, the countervailing duty by this act imposed, shall, previously to its being taken out of such warehouse, be paid to the collector of His Majesty's customs at the port where such rice shall be so warehoused. Provided, that if any rice warehoused under the authority of this act shall remain in such warehouse beyond the period of eighteen months, upon which the full duties due and payable by law shall not have been paid, then in such case the same shall and may be sold for the duties, in like manner, and under the same rules, regulations, and restrictions, as any other goods are now directed by law to be sold for the duties, and the produce applied in like manner as is directed by an act, passed in the twelfth year of the reign of her late Majesty Queen Anne, entitled "An act for encouraging the tobacco trade."

VIII. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the importation of rice and other articles, without payment of any duty whatever, by virtue of an act passed in the present session of Parliament, entitled "An act to prohibit the exportation of corn, meal, flour, and potatoes, and to permit the importation of corn and other articles of provision, for a limited time, in any ships whatever, without payment of duty," and in the manner in the said act mentioned, during the continuance thereof.

IX. And be it further enacted, That all goods, wares, and merchandise, so imported from the United States of America, shall, upon the exportation thereof to any foreign country, be entitled to the same drawbacks as are or may hereafter be by law allowed upon the exportation of goods, wares, and merchandise, of the like denomination and description, when exported to any foreign country; and that there shall be allowed and paid the same drawbacks and bounties on goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from this kingdom to the territories of the said United States, or any of them, as are or may hereafter be allowed by law upon the exportation of goods, wares, or merchandise, of the like denomination or description, to any of the islands, plantations, or colonies, belonging to the crown of Great Britain in America.

X. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and paid the same drawbacks upon the exportation of any sort of foreign hemp, or foreign iron, exported from this kingdom to any British colony or plantation in America, and to the territories of the United States of America, or any of them, as are, or may hereafter be allowed by law upon the exportation of the like sort of hemp, or iron, to other foreign parts.

XI. And whereas by the said fifteenth article of the treaty before mentioned, the British Government reserves to itself the right of imposing such duty as may be adequate to countervail the difference of duty not payable on the importation of European and Asiatic goods, when imported into the United States in British or in American vessels, be it therefore enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that, from and after the fifth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, there shall be raised, levied, collected and paid, to and for the use of His Majesty, his heirs and successors, on the importation into this kingdom of the goods, wares, and merchandise hereinafter mentioned or described, being of the growth, production, or manufacture of any of the territories of the United States of America, and imported directly from thence in American ships or vessels, owned and navigated, as by this act is required, the following additional duties of customs; that is to say, on the importation of any such goods, wares, and merchandise as aforesaid, (except tobacco, and other articles, for which provision is hereinafter made) an additional duty, at and after the rate of ten pounds per centum on the produce and amount of the several duties of customs due and payable by law, on the importation into this kingdom of the like goods or merchandise, from any of the said United States, in British built ships or vessels; on the importation of any such pig-iron, bar-iron, pot-ash, pearl-ash, in manner aforesaid, an additional duty, at, and after the rate of ten pounds per centum, on the produce and amount of the several duties of customs due and payable by law on the importation into this kingdom of any such goods from any British colony or plantation in America, when not accompanied with the certificates required by law; on the importation, in manner aforesaid, of any such pitch, tar, turpentine, rosin, mahogany, masts, yards and bowsprits, and unmanufactured goods and merchandise as aforesaid, (wood, staves, and tobacco excepted) an additional duty, at and after the rate of ten pounds per centum on the produce and amount of the several duties of customs due and payable by law on the importation of any such goods into this kingdom, from any British colony or plantation in America; on the importation in manner aforesaid, of any such unmanufactured wood and staves, an additional duty, at and after the rate of ten pounds per centum on the produce and amount of the several duties of customs due and payable by law, on the importation of any such goods into this kingdom from any part of Europe, not within his Majesty's dominions, in British built ships or vessels; on the importation, in manner aforesaid, of any oil made from fish or creatures living in the sea, and blubber, whale fins, and spermaceti, being the produce of the fisheries, carried on by the people of the said United States, and imported directly from thence into this kingdom in American ships or vessels, owned and navigated as by this act is required, an additional duty, at and after the rate of ten pounds per centum, on the produce and amount of the several duties of customs due and payable by law on the importation of any such goods into this kingdom from countries not under the dominion of His Majesty; on the importation, in manner aforesaid, of any such tobacco so imported, an additional duty of customs, at and after the rate of one shilling and sixpence for every hundred pounds weight of such tobacco.

XII. Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to charge or impose the duty of ten pounds per centum by this act imposed on certain goods and merchandise imported into this kingdom from the said United States in American ships, on the produce or amount of the respective duties of five pounds per centum, and of ten pounds per centum, granted His Majesty by an act made in this present session to parliament, entitled An act for granting to His Majesty certain duties of customs on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into, exported from, or brought and carried coastwise within Great Britain, except wine, and except coals when brought or carried coastwise; and for applying the money to a use by virtue of an act, passed in the last session of parliament, entitled "An act for the reduction of the drawbacks and bounties now allowed on the exportation of sugar, towards defraying the increased charge occasioned by any loan granted, or stock created, by any act or acts passed in the last session of parliament."

XIII. Provided always, That if any goods or merchandise so imported from the United States of America shall be permitted, by virtue of any act or acts of parliament in force at the time of such importation, to be secured in warehouses, without the payment of the duties due on the importation thereof, then, and in such case, the additional duties of customs, by this act imposed, shall not be payable unless and until such goods shall be taken out of such warehouse for the purpose of being used or consumed in this kingdom.

XIV. Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to repeal or anywise alter the duties of package, scavage, balliage, or portage, or any other duties payable to the mayor and commonalty and citizens of the city of London, or to the Lord Mayor of the said city for the time being, or to any other city or town corporate, within the kingdom of Great Britain, or to repeal, or anywise alter any special privilege or exemption to which any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, is or are now entitled by law, but the same shall be continued as heretofore.

XV. And be it further enacted, That such of the duties of customs and excise by this act imposed, as shall arise in that part of Great Britain called England, shall be under the management of the respective commissioners of the customs and excise in England for the time being, and such thereof as shall arise in that part of Great Britain called Scotland shall be under the management of the respective commissioners of the customs and excise in Scotland for the time being.

XVI. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the duties of customs and excise, and the drawbacks of the duties of customs and excise upon, for, or in respect of the several goods, wares, or merchandise by this act imposed and allowed, shall and may be respectively managed, ascertained, raised, levied, collected, answered, paid, recovered, and allowed, in such and the like manner, and in or by any or either of the means, ways, or methods by which the former duties of customs and excise, and drawbacks of duties of customs and excise upon goods, wares, or merchandise in general, and also by any or either of the special means, ways, or methods respectively, by which the former duties of customs and excise and drawbacks of duties of customs and excise upon goods, wares, or merchandise of the same sorts or kinds respectively, were, or might be managed, ascertained, levied, raised, collected, answered, paid, recovered, and allowed, and the goods, wares, or merchandise, so by this act respectively made liable to the payment of, or chargeable with duties of customs and excise, or so entitled to drawback of duties of customs and excise, upon the importation thereof into, or exportation thereof from Great Britain, or on any other account whatever, shall be, and the same are hereby made subject and liable to all and every the conditions, regulations, rules, restrictions, and forfeitures, to which goods, wares, or merchandise in general, and also all and every the special conditions, rules, restrictions, regulations, and forfeitures respectively, to which the like goods, wares, or merchandise, respectively, were subject and liable by any act or acts of parliament in force on, and immediately before the passing of this act respecting the revenues of customs and excise, except where any alteration is expressly made by this act; and all and every pain, penalty, fine or forfeiture, of any nature or kind whatever, for any offence whatever committed against, or in breach of, any act or acts, of parliament in force, on, and immediately before the passing of this act made for securing the revenue of customs and excise, or for the regulation or improvement thereof, and the several clauses, powers, and directions therein contained (unless where expressly altered by this act) shall, and are hereby directed and declared to extend to, and shall be respectively applied, practised, and put in execution, for, and in respect of, the several duties of customs and excise and drawbacks of duties of customs and excise hereby charged and allowed, in as full and ample manner, to all intents and purposes whatever, as if all and every the said acts, clauses, provisions, powers, directions, fines, pains, penalties, or forfeitures, were particularly repeated and re-enacted in the body of this act.

XVII. And whereas, by the said fifteenth article of the treaty before mentioned, it is further agreed that the British Government does reserve to itself the right of imposing on American vessels, entering into the British ports in Europe, a tonnage duty equal to that which shall be payable by British vessels in the ports of America: and whereas, it is thought expedient, for the present, to exercise the power reserved in the said article so far only as relates to imposing a tonnage duty on American ships entering the ports of His Majesty's dominions in Europe, equal to the excess of the duty payable in the ports of the United States by British ships, beyond that which is payable by American ships entering the same ports; Be it therefore enacted, That, from and after the fifth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid, unto and for the use of His Majesty, his heirs, and successors, a tonnage duty at and after the rate of two shillings, of good and lawful money of Great Britain, for each and every ton burthen of every ship or vessel belonging to the inhabitants of the United States of America, coming or arriving within the limits of any port of Great Britain, and that the tonnage of every such ship or vessel shall, in case of any doubt or dispute as to the same, be ascertained by admeasurement, in the mode and manner directed by an act passed in the twenty- sixth year of His present Majesty's reign, entitled "An act for the further increase and encouragement of shipping and navigation."

XVIII. And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, That it shall and may be lawful to and for any officer or officers of His Majesty's customs, to stop and detain every ship or vessel, liable to the payment of the said duty, until the said duty is paid as aforesaid; and, in case payment thereof shall not be made for the space of three calendar months after the arrival of such ship or vessel at any port in this kingdom, it shall and may be lawful to and for the commissioners of His Majesty's customs in England and Scotland respectively, or any three or more of them, to cause such ship or vessel, and her masts, apparel, and furniture, to be sold publicly to the best bidder, and the produce thereof to be applied, first, to the charges that shall arise by such detention and sale, next, to the said duty imposed by this act, and the overplus to be paid to the proprietor of such ship or vessel, or other person duly authorized by such proprietor to receive the same.

XIX. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the tonnage duty hereby imposed shall be paid into the hands of the proper officer of His Majesty's customs, at the respective ports or places where such duty shall become due and payable, and such duty shall be under the management of the commissioners of His Majesty's customs in England and Scotland respectively.

XX. And to the intent that the said duty may be answered and paid, Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no officer of His Majesty's customs whatever, or his deputy, or clerk, at any of the said ports or places in Great Britain, where such duty shall become due and payable, shall, from and after the said fifth day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, take or receive any entry outwards, cocket, or report outwards, for any ship or vessel liable or subject to the said duty, nor shall such ship or vessel be suffered or permitted to depart, from any such port or place, until the said duty shall be paid, pursuant to the directions of this act, to the respective collectors or other principal officers of His Majesty's customs, authorized to receive the same, and until the respective master or owner of any such ship or vessel, subject to the payment of such duty, shall show to such respective officer a receipt for the same.

XXI. And be it further enacted, That all the moneys from time to time arising by the several new and additional duties, by this act imposed as aforesaid, (the necessary charges of raising and accounting for the same respectively excepted) shall, from time to time, be paid into the receipt of His Majesty's exchequer at Westminster, and the said money, so paid in as aforesaid, shall be carried to and made part of the consolidated fund.

XXII. And, whereas, by the thirteenth article of the said treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, it is, among other things, provided, that the vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States of America shall be admitted and hospitably received in all the seaports and harbors of the British territories in the East Indies, and that the citizens of the said United States may freely carry on a trade between the said territories and the said United States, in all articles of which the exportation or importation respectively, to or from the said territories, shall not be entirely prohibited; And it is further provided, That the said trade shall be carried on under the regulations contained in the said article; and it is expressly agreed that the vessels of the United States shall not carry any of the articles exported by them from the said British territories to any port or place, except to some port or place in America, where the same shall be unladen, and that such regulations shall be adopted by both parties, as shall, from time to time, be found necessary to enforce the due and faithful observance of the above recited stipulation: Be it therefore enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the ships belonging to the citizens of the United States to carry on the said trade to the British territories in the East Indies, and to import into, and export from, the said territories, all articles, of which the importation or exportation respectively, to or from the said territories, shall not be entirely prohibited, in the manner, and with the privileges and advantages, and subject to the restrictions and regulations contained and expressed in the said thirteenth article of the said treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, any law to the contrary notwithstanding; and, particularly, notwithstanding any provisions contained in an act, passed in the twelfth year of the reign of His late Majesty King Charles the Second, entitled "An act for the encouraging and increasing of shipping and navigation."

XXIII. And be it further enacted, That all acts or engagements entered into by the subjects of the United States or of His Majesty, in pursuance of the said thirteenth article, shall be deemed and taken to be lawfully done, provided the same shall have been done or entered into, since the final ratification of the said treaty; and provided the same might have been done and entered into, agreeably to the said thirteenth article, any law to the contrary notwithstanding; and the same shall be deemed, and taken to be, in all respects, and to all intents and purposes whatsoever, as if the same had been done, entered into, or had taken place, subsequent to the passing of this act, any prohibition to the contrary notwithstanding; and no penalty, forfeiture, or disability, of any kind or nature whatsoever, shall be incurred or sued for, for or on account of any such acts or engagements.

XXIV. And whereas, by the ninth article of the said treaty, it was agreed that British subjects, who then held lands in the territories of the said United States, and American citizens, who then held lands in the dominions of His Majesty, should continue to hold them according to the nature and tenure of their respective States and titles therein, and might grant, sell, or devise the same to whom they should please, in like manner as if they were natives, and that neither they nor their heirs or assigns, should, so far as might respect the said lands and the legal remedies incident thereto, be regarded as aliens: Be it therefore enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all lands, tenements, and heriditaments, in the kingdom of Great Britain, or the territories and dependencies thereto belonging, which on the said twenty-eighth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, (being the day of the exchange of the ratification of the said treaty between His Majesty and the said United States) were held by American citizens, shall be held and enjoyed, granted, sold, and devised, according to the stipulations and agreements contained in the said article, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

XXV. Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to give any right, title, or privilege to any person, not being a natural born subject of this realm, which such person would not have been entitled to if this act had not been made, other than, and except such rights, titles, and privileges, as shall be necessary for the true and faithful performance of the stipulations in the said article contained, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, or to give to any person, not being either a natural born subject of this realm, or a citizen of the said United States, any right, title, or privilege, to which such person would not have been entitled if this act had not been made.

XXVI. And whereas by the said treaty it is further agreed, that His Majesty and the United States, on mutual requisitions by them respectively, or by their respective ministers or officers authorized to make the same, will deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with murder or forgery committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum, within any of the countries of the other, provided that this shall only be done on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had there been committed, and that the expense of such apprehension and delivery shall be borne and defrayed by those who make the requisition, and receive the fugitive: Be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That in case requisition shall at any time be made, in pursuance of, and according to, the said article, for the delivery of any person charged with murder or forgery, committed within the jurisdiction of the said United States, it shall be lawful for one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of State, by warrant under his hand and seal, to signify that such requisition has been so made, and to require all justices of the peace, and other magistrates and officers of justice, to govern themselves accordingly, and to be aiding and assisting in apprehending the person so charged, and committing such person, for the purpose of being delivered up to justice according to the provisions in the said article; and thereupon it shall be lawful for any justice of the peace, or other person having power to commit for trial persons charged with offences against the laws of this kingdom, to examine, upon oath, any person or persons touching the truth of such charge, and upon such evidence as, according to the laws of this kingdom, would justify the apprehension and commitment for trial of the person so charged, if the offence wherewith he shall be so charged had been committed in this kingdom; it shall be lawful for such justice of the peace, or other persons having power to commit, as aforesaid, to commit the person so charged to His Majesty's gaol, there to remain, until delivered pursuant to such requisition, as aforesaid, and thereupon it shall be lawful for one of His Majesty's Secretaries of State, by warrant under his hand and seal, to order the person so committed to be delivered to such person or persons as shall be authorized by the said United States to receive the person so committed, and convey such person to the dominions of the said United States to be tried for the offence with which such person shall be so charged; and if the person so charged shall escape out of any custody to which he shall be committed, as aforesaid, it shall be lawful to retake such person in the same manner as any person charged with any offence against the laws of this kingdom may be retaken upon an escape, so that such person so charged, as aforesaid, may be effectually delivered up to justice, according to the true intent and meaning of the said article of the said treaty.

XXVII. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force so long as the said treaty between His Majesty and the United States of America shall continue in force, and no longer.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, June 12, 1797.

SIR:

I had the honor to state to you, in a former letter, that a bill was soon to be brought into Parliament, making the commercial provisions required by our treaty. Such a bill has been introduced into the House of Commons; and an abstract of it having been sent to me from Lord Grenville's office, I sent his Lordship a note, with sundry observations upon the regulations proposed to be established concerning our trade and navigation, and requesting his Lordship to confer with me upon the subject before the bill should be discussed in the House of Commons.

I enclose a copy of the abstract, note, and remarks. In my conference with Lord Grenville, I briefly recapitulated the objections which had occurred against the provisions of the bill. His Lordship received them with great candor, and observed, that the details of the treaty, as well as the proposed regulations, being out of his mind, he could not speak with confidence, or conclusively, respecting them; that, in respect to the requisition that our ships trading to Great Britain should be American built, or prize vessels, and navigated by at least three-fourths American seamen, he said it was conformable to the analogous provisions in all former cases, and that this provision existed under the commercial treaty with France, concluded in 1786. I observed that it was impracticable to discriminate, in certain cases, American built from foreign built ships, since all vessels owned on a certain day, in the year 1789, had been registered as American ships; that, though the greatest part, indeed, nearly all of these ships were American built, yet there were a few foreign built, and that a discrimination was impracticable. His Lordship replied that he did not imagine that, in practice, there would be any difficulty experienced from this regulation. I repeated, in detail, the objections to the bill, on account of the omission of a revision corresponding with that part of the fifteenth article of the treaty, which it has been supposed authorizes us to import into Great Britain, in American vessels, the productions of every country, without being confined to those of America; I said the article, in this respect, was in the face of the navigation act; but that we could understand it in no other light. His Lordship answered that he could not, at that time, make any reply on that point, but expected very soon to be able fully to discuss it.

His remarks respecting the countervailing duty were of a similar nature: he said they were desirous of preserving the present footing of the trade, as far as they could consistently with their treaties with other nations, and that he believed that the variations would be very immaterial; that a table was preparing which would exhibit, at one view, the present footing of the trade, and likewise the variations that would take place by the imposition of the countervailing duty; that, till such a view was before him, he could not, with any advantage, speak concerning the manner of executing the right reserved to them by the treaty.

His Lordship said there was a distinction between the light money collected in England, and the tonnage duty levied in America; the former was private property, and the latter was a public revenue: besides, that the British lights were useful to our commerce, not only with England, but also with other neighboring nations, while our lights were of advantage only in our trade.

I replied that the object of the parties was to give an equal and fair competition to their respective ships in their trade with each other; that it was of no importance, and, in reference to that equality, that there was no difference whether the imposition was for private or public purposes: nor did we maintain our light houses at less expense from the circumstance of their being, from our local position, almost exclusively beneficial to the ships that resorted to our ports; that the right, under the treaty, to impose a tonnage duty on American ships, must be decided by the fact whether British ships, resorting to the American ports, now pay a greater duty per ton than American ships pay which resort to British ports.

Lord Grenville said, that in the equalization of tonnage duties, under former treaties, the light duties had never been included in the compensation, and that it might affect their whole system to consider them as a branch of their public revenue.

I replied, that, in order that their system might not be disturbed, perhaps it might be agreed that they should impose the proposed duty of two shillings sterling per ton on American vessels, to balance the difference of tonnage duties in the American ports; and that we should impose two shillings sterling per ton on British ships, to balance the difference of light money in the British ports. Lord Grenville answered, that the subject was not then so distinctly in his possession as to enable him to pursue the conversation with advantage.

Concerning the India trade his Lordship said, that he then saw no objection to insert a clause in the bill, or to introduce a new bill, giving to the India company a right to permit the American ships to take freights from India to China, and likewise from India to Europe, leaving the subject in the discretion of the local Government of India; and that it was likewise proper that the bill should contain a clause, making valid insurances on American ships, which had been made in England since the conclusion of the treaty. In respect to the doubt which has been started in the case of the American ship Argonaut, Collect, master, whether the trade from America to the British territories in India must not be direct, Lord Grenville said he did not think there would be any difficulty on that point. Our conference ended with Lord Grenville's saying, that, as soon as he should receive the necessary information and documents on this subject, he would converse with me further.

I ought to observe to you, that no certain inference results from this conversation; Lord Grenville having commenced it by saying that he was not prepared to speak conclusively on any point.

With perfect respect, &c.

RUFUS KING.

[The following is the abstract, transmitted by Lord Grenville to Mr. King, and the remarks of Mr. King thereon, referred to in the preceding despatch.]

ABSTRACT.

SECTION 1. Any goods, wares, and merchandise, the produce and manufacture of the United States, which are not prohibited by law to be imported from foreign countries, may be imported directly into this kingdom, subject to the duties hereafter mentioned, in American built ships, or American prize ships, owned by the subjects of the said United States, and navigated by a master and three-fourths at least Americans.

2. American produce or manufactures, (except as hereafter enumerated) to pay the same duties of customs and excise as if imported from any other foreign country in British ships. And where different duties are imposed upon importation from different foreign countries, then upon the lowest of such duties in tables A, D, and F, in the consolidation act. If imported in American ships, then subject also to the countervailing duties imposed by this act.

REMARKS.

SECTION 1. The ships belonging to the people and inhabitants of the United States consist of American built and of foreign built ships. This section establishes a discrimination. American built ships, belonging to Americans, may trade to Great Britain; ships not built in America, though owned by Americans, may not trade to Great Britain, unless they are prize ships. It is not plain that the treaty permits this discrimination to be made: the expressions in the 14th article, are "the people and inhabitants of the two countries, respectively, shall have liberty freely and securely, &c. to come with their ships and cargoes to the lands, cities, &c. within the dominions and territories aforesaid, to enter into the same, &c. subject as to what respects this article to the laws of the respective countries." This limitation is supposed to regard the prohibition of, and the duties upon, particular commodities, and not to refer to the quality of the ships, nor the manner in which they shall be navigated, whether by subjects or foreigners. The section seems to be liable to objection, not only on account of the discrimination of native built from foreign built ships, but also in respect to the regulation that three-fourths of the crew of American ships should be Americans—regulations adopted by Great Britain, in their system, but not required by the United States. A third objection to the section is, that it confines the American trade with Great Britain to goods, wares, and merchandise, of the growth and manufacture of the United States, contrary to a clause of the 15th article of the treaty, that permits the importation, by American vessels, of any article (whether the production or manufacture of the United States or otherwise) that may be imported by the ships of any other country.

SECTIONS 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8. These sections appear to change, in several instances, the footing on which the American trade now stands; and this to its disadvantage. At this time any unmanufactured goods and merchandises, the importation of which is not prohibited by law, (except tobacco, fish oil, whale fins, and spermaceti, which are subject to other regulations) and any pig iron, bar iron, pitch tar, turpentine, rosin, potash, pearlash, indigo, masts, yards, and bowsprits, the growth or production of the United States, may be imported on the footing specified in the third section. All other goods and merchandise, (except tobacco,

3. Pig iron, bar iron, pitch, tar, turpentine, rosin, potash, pearlash, masts, yards, bowsprits, and unmanufactured wood and staves, imported, (without any certificate) to pay the same duties as if imported in British built ships, from the British Plantations, with certificates subject also, if imported in American ships, to the countervailing duties imposed by this act.

4. Oil, blubber, whale fins, and spermaceti, may be imported on the same duties as if imported in British built ships from foreign countries, subject likewise to the countervailing duties imposed by this act.

5. Tobacco may be imported on the same duties as from a British colony; and snuff upon the same duty as when imported from Europe, subject to the regulations of the 29th George III., and 30th George III., and to the countervailing duty.

6. Rice may be landed and warehoused upon paying 8*d.* the cwt., and giving bond for the remainder of the duties within eighteen months. Provided that in the port of London, and other enumerated ports, it may be landed and warehoused without paying any duty, with liberty to export the same within eighteen months; or, if taken out for home consumption, upon paying the duty payable thereon.

A saving of the temporary provision bill, which admits certain articles duty free.

7. Goods, &c. exported from the United States, entitled to the same drawbacks, when exported from Great Britain to any foreign country, as the like goods are entitled to on exportation to any other foreign country by law, and goods exported to the United States, entitled to the same drawbacks and bounties as if exported to the British colonies.

8. The same drawback upon the exportation of foreign hemp and iron to any British colony, or to the United States, as is now, or may hereafter be, allowed by law, upon the exportation thereof to other foreign ports.

9. From and after the 5th of January, 1798, goods, &c. the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States of America, imported into this country, directly from the said States, in American ships, to be subject to the following additional duties of customs, viz.

10. All goods, &c. (except tobacco, and other articles for which provision is made hereafter) 10 per cent. on the amount of the duties of customs, payable on such articles when imported from the United States in British ships.

11. Pig iron, bar iron, pot and pearl ash, 10 per cent. on the amount of the duties of customs payable on the said articles imported from any British colony, or plantation, in America, when not accompanied with the certificates required by law.

12. Pitch, tar, turpentine, rosin, masts, yards, and bowsprits, 10 per cent. on the amount of the custom duties payable on these articles when imported from any British colony or plantation in America.

13. Unmanufactured wood, and staves, 10 per cent. on the duties of customs payable on such goods, imported from any part of Europe not within His Majesty's domains, in British ships.

14. Oil, blubber, whale fins, and spermaceti, the produce of American fisheries, 10 per cent. on the duties of customs payable on the like articles, on importation from countries not under the dominion of His Majesty.

15. Tobacco, 18*d* per hundred lbs. weight.

16. This act not to be construed to impose this additional duty of 10 per cent. on the duties of 5 per cent. and 10 per cent. granted to His Majesty, by an act of the present session, on certain goods (except wine and coals) exported from, or brought, and carried coastwise within Great Britain.

17. This additional duty of 10 per cent. not to be paid on goods permitted to be imported from the United States, and to be warehoused, until, and unless, such goods are taken out of the warehouse to be consumed in this kingdom.

18. This act not to exempt from duty any articles in American ships, which by any law now in force, may be imported without payment of snuff, and rice,) not above enumerated, and also fish oil, whale fins, and spermaceti; being of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, may be imported on the footing specified in the second section.

Tobacco, snuff, and rice, will remain upon the same footing on which they now stand.

These changes will yield little or no advantage to the British revenue; they will affect disadvantageously the course of business which, from practice, has become, in some degree, habitual; they regard a subject of detail and intricacy in which alterations for slight causes should be avoided; they, moreover, afford occasion for misrepresentation and misunderstandings; added to which, the early period at which the commercial regulations of the treaty must again come under examination, and the mutual interest of the parties that the most impartial and liberal views should prevail on that occasion; may lead at least to a doubt whether any change of the existing state of the trade between Great Britain and the United States, will be a measure of prudence, in reference to future and more important arrangements on that subject.

Sections 9 to 20, both inclusive. These sections are liable to objections; the right to impose a countervailing duty is clear; the policy, under existing circumstances, of exercising this right, merits, perhaps, consideration.

Most of the commodities imported into Great Britain by American ships are raw materials, and of importance to the manufactures, to the navigation, and to the marine of England; the policy of England has hitherto been to obtain these articles in the cheapest and most easy manner; this countervailing duty, though disadvantageous to the American, will enhance the price of raw materials to the manufacturer of England; it will also change the present footing of the American trade, and be liable to the inconveniences that may arise from such change.

Besides, the object which alone can be in view in the imposition of this countervailing tax, may be defeated, after the expiration of two years subsequent to the peace: it is only for that term that the American Government are restrained from increasing the existing difference of duties on goods imported into the United States in American and British ships; the British Government can countervail only the now existing difference; the American Government cannot increase this difference at any time before the expiration of two years after the peace; but afterwards, they may increase the difference; and the British Government will have no right to countervail such augmentation. It may be added, that admitting the policy to be as clear as the right, still it is not obvious that the manner of imposing this countervailing duty is warranted by the treaty. The right reserved, is to countervail, by an adequate duty, the difference of duty payable on goods imported into the United States by American and British ships: the thing to be countervailed is not a given sum, but a ratio, or proportion; the rule is simple, and its application should be so likewise. Instead of imposing 10 per cent. upon the duties payable on American goods imported from America in British ships, which it is conceived would be a rule in itself simple, as well as simple in its operation, these sections, in some cases, impose 10 per cent. upon the duties payable on goods imported from the United States by British ships; in others, 10 per cent. upon the duties payable on similar goods imported from British colonies, without certain certificates; in others, 10 per cent. upon the duties payable on similar goods imported from British colonies; in others, including certain articles of wood, the duty on which will amount to a prohibition, 10 per cent. on the duties payable on similar goods imported in British ships from any part of Europe, not under the British dominions; in others, including the important article of fish oil, already subject to a very heavy duty, 10 per cent. upon the duties payable on similar goods imported from countries not under the British dominions; and, in the case of tobacco, a specific sum (not a proportion of duty) of 18*d.* per hundred.

duty only upon condition of their being brought in British ships, unless such goods are particularly exempted from duty by this act.

19. Proviso to save the duties of package, scavage, balliage, or porterage, or other duties payable to the city of London, or other corporation, and to save also special privileges and exemptions belonging to any private persons or bodies politic.

20. All the duties imposed by this act, placed under the respective commissioners of excise and customs in England or Scotland. All these duties and drawbacks, as well as all penalties and forfeitures arising from this act, subjected to the rules and regulations already provided by law in such cases respectively.

21. A tonnage duty of 2*s.* to be paid by American ships arriving in Great Britain, such tonnage to be ascertained by admeasurement, according to statutes 26th Geo. III. ch. 60.

22. Officers of the customs may detain ships, and, after the space of three months, such ships may be sold for paying such tonnage duty.

23. The produce of such tonnage duties to be under the management of the commissioners of the customs in England and Scotland; and no such ship is to be suffered to clear out till the master shall have produced a receipt for the payment of the tonnage duty.

24. Money arising from the duties imposed by this act to be paid into the exchequer, and to be made part of the consolidated fund.

25. Lands, &c., holden by American citizens on the 28th of October, 1795, shall be enjoyed, granted, &c. according to the stipulations and agreements in the 9th article of the treaty.

26. Proviso that this shall not extend to give to persons, not being natural born subjects, other privileges, &c. than such as are necessary for the foregoing purpose.

27. In case of requisition, according to the 27th article of the treaty, His Majesty's Secretary of State is to require justices of the peace, &c. to apprehend persons charged with murder or forgery, committed within the United States, and to proceed in the examination, and commit to gaol the same as if such crime had been committed in this kingdom; and to order the persons so apprehended and committed to be delivered to any person authorized from the United States to receive them into custody.

It is possible that this mode of executing the countervailing right may be the least burthensome to the American commerce; but as the standards referred to are various, and unknown, it may be, likewise, that this manner of executing the right will be found to be injurious; it seems certain that it will be obscure to the Americans. Besides, a plain, simple, as well as an equitable mode of imposing this countervailing duty may be devised. Why, then, resort to one that is, at least, to one of the parties, obscure, complex, and concerning the equity of which it can only be an affair of conjecture.

Sections 21, 22, 23. These sections propose to levy 2*s.* per per ton on American ships, under that clause of the 15th article of the treaty reserving to Great Britain a right to impose, on American vessels in Europe, a tonnage duty, to equal that impost on British vessels within the United States. The object of this stipulation of the treaty was to put upon an equal footing the ships of the two countries in their trade and intercourse with each other. This was equitable; and if a difference of imposition exist, it should be countervailed; the propriety of the tax, then, depends on the fact whether British vessels, trading to the American ports, do pay higher tonnage duties than American vessels, trading to British ports, pay; the coast of America is very extensive; and, from one extreme to the other, is lighted at a great expense; there is no duty or tax collected from ships under the name of light money; the only tax or duty is called a tonnage duty, which amounts to 2*s.* 3*d.* sterling per ton on foreign ships; this tax, together with one of the same denomination, but less in amount, paid by American ships, is paid with all other taxes into the general treasury, and stands appropriated, in common with them, for the payment of annuities, and the various objects of public expenditure, including the building and support of light houses, beacons, buoys, &c. In the ports of Great Britain the duties paid on the tonnage of foreign ships, for light money, and other objects, vary; and, indeed, from the rights of different cities and corporations it is not easy to ascertain, with precision, the extent of these demands upon foreigners in their commerce with Great Britain. In Liverpool and Bristol, as well as in London, there are taxes, incident to navigation, which are levied in a double or some increased ratio upon foreign ships; in all cases the British light money is double upon foreign ships. The lights of St. George's channel, on foreign ships, amount to 10*d.* per ton; in the English channel to 2*s.* 4*d.* per ton; and the northern lights to 8½*d.* per ton; and American ships, touching for orders, and bound up channel as far as Amsterdam, pay all the channel lights; and if to the northward of Amsetrdam they pay the channel and northern lights; and it is understood that this duty is exacted for the passage, up and down, whether the vessel returns down channel, goes north about, or never returns. Thus, on an American vessel, of 200 tons burthen, the duty for channel lights is £23 6*s.* 8*d.*, and for northern lights £7 1*s.* 8*d.*, making £30 8*s.* 4*d.* which, taken for both passages up and down, makes £60 16*s.* 8*d.*, or 6*s.* 1*d.* per ton. If the American ship falls into St. George's channel, and afterwards pursues her voyage up the English channel, which is not uncommon, she pays for the lights in St. George's channel, which amount to 10*d.* per ton; which, added to 6*s.* 1*d.* gives a tonnage duty of 6*s.* 11*d.* paid by American ships, and amounting, on a ship of 200 tons, to £69 3*s.* 4*d.* which is £34 11*s.* 8*d.* more than is paid by a British ship of the same tonnage, provided that British ships pay for the passage, up and down, otherwise the difference against the American ship will be £49 15*s.* 10*d.*

Or thus. A British and American ship, for the advantage of all the lights on the American coast, in their inward and outward passage, pay a tonnage duty, viz:

A British ship of 200 tons,	Sterling,	£22 10*s.*
An American, of like tonnage,		2 10
Difference,		£20 00

A British and American ship for the advantage of the lights in St. George's Channel, the English Channel, and for the Northern Lights, pay a tonnage duty, viz:

British ship of 200 tons, for a single passage,	£19	7*s.*	6*d.*
American ship of the same tonnage, double passage,	69	3	4
Difference,	£49	15	10

Or, if the British ship pays two, or double passages, then thus:

British ship,	£34	11*s.*	8*d.*
American do.	69	3	4
Difference,	£34	11	8

This is stating the question in the strongest manner against the American ships. If, instead thereof, an average statement could be made, especially if, in addition to the heavy tax for the support of lights which foreign ships pay, the local and corporate duties are taken into the account, it is confidently believed that a result would appear unfavorable, (if not in the extreme above stated) to the American navigation. The conclusion is against the proposed tonnage duty of 2*s.* per ton, on American vessels. It is true that few British vessels are at present employed in the trade between Great Britain and the United States. This may be satisfactorily accounted for, without recourse to an opinion that it proceeds from the tonnage duty imposed by the United States.

28. American ships may trade to and from the British territories in the East Indies, subject to the restrictions contained in the 13th article of the treaty, and notwithstanding the navigation act, 12th Charles II. sec. 22.

29. All acts or engagements done or entered into by American or British subjects, in pursuance of the 13th article of the treaty, since the final ratification of the treaty, and in conformity thereto, shall be deemed, to all intents and purposes, as if they had been done or entered into, subsequent to the passing of this act.

30. This act to continue as long as the treaty, and no longer.

Sec. 28. The American cargoes for the India market consist of wines, usually taken on board in the outward passage at Madeira, and various other articles, sometimes collected in America, and frequently purchased on the outward passage in England and elsewhere. This was the footing on which the trade stood when the treaty was made. The object of the treaty, in this respect, was, to convert a favor into a right. A question has been started, whether the trade from the United States to India must not be direct, in the outward, as well as in the return passage. It is of importance to the security of this branch of the American commerce, that no doubts should exist on this point; and, as from a careful examination of the article there does not appear to be any reason to doubt the intentions of the parties, it is to be wished that expressions may be used in the proposed bill which shall remove all questions on this point.

The American vessels which take on board goods in the British territories in India, are required to return direct to America; but it never has been understood that the voyage must be direct from America to such British territories. Should such a construction be attempted, it would defeat, in a very considerable degree, the benefit of the article. The footing of sufferance on which the trade stood before the treaty would be preferable.

Previous to the treaty American vessels sometimes obtained freights from the British territories in India to China. It is believed that such freights are still occasionally obtained by the Danes and Swedes; and, likewise, that the ships of these nations obtain permission of the British local government in India, to take freights from India to different parts of Europe.

It would be a very satisfactory measure to the American merchants, if, by a clause in the proposed act of Parliament, these advantages, which are gratuitously enjoyed by the Swedes and Danes, might, likewise, be enjoyed by the Americans, in such cases as the competent authority in India should allow.

All that is desired on this head is, that the treaty may not be construed to incapacitate the Americans from enjoying, by favor, those advantages which, by favor, are occasionally granted to other neutral and friendly merchants.

Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

London, 4th July, 1797.

Sir:

In a further conference with Lord Grenville, respecting the bill for carrying into effect the treaty with us, and the remarks that I sent him on that subject, his Lordship stated to me the following observations upon these remarks, which had been made by the Board of Trade.

"Section 1st. The object of this clause of the bill is to equal (as far as respects the United States) the third section of 12th C. II. c. 18; by which the trade with Asia, Africa, and America, is confined to British built ships only.

"It is conceived that the discrimination complained of is clearly comprehended under the words "subject always, as to what respects this article, (that is, article 14) to the laws and statutes of the two countries respectively;" which words cannot be supposed to relate, exclusively, to duties and prohibitions; no mention whatever being made of duties or prohibitions in any part of the article.

"The expression their ships, on which this objection is grounded, is to be found in most of the commercial treaties concluded by Great Britain, particularly in those with Russia and France. But no idea was ever entertained, either here or in Russia, or in France, that by such a stipulation, the French were exempted from the provisions of the eighth section of the act of navigation; and no deviation from the spirit or letter of that act can be supposed to be intended by either party, except where it is expressed in the most unequivocal words.

"The general principle of the bill (with a variety of exceptions in favor of America) is to put America upon the footing of the most favored European nation. The regulations respecting the built of European ships, and the persons by whom they are navigated, apply, more or less, to the trade of every European nation. There seems, therefore, no room to complain that they are applied to America. It may further be observed that this restriction has been established by the orders in council, by which the trade has hitherto been regulated; and that, under this restriction, the trade has annually increased, and is now carried on entirely in American bottoms.

"The third objection arises from the accidental omission of the words "from thence," in the copy of the abstract. Those words are in the order of council, and will be in the act. The restriction upon the American trade is no more than a restriction of the indirect importation of goods, the growth, produce, or manufacture of America; a restriction which applies, in all material articles, to every European nation. All European articles, the importation of which is not confined by the act of navigation to British ships, or ships of the built of the country, from whence such articles are brought, or has been since exempted from the operation of that act by particular provisions, will remain free to American ships, in common with all others.

"The extended interpretation, given by the remark to one of the clauses of the 15th article, is inadmissible. In the first place, that clause, connected with what precedes it, evidently applies only to the articles, and not to the manner in which they are brought. In the next, the interpretation would completely defeat, by a side wind, the whole principle of the act of navigation, and cannot, therefore, be supposed to have been intended.

Sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8. By all these sections the importation of all American articles, in British ships, is intended to be left precisely upon the same footing in which it stood by the orders in council, from which the words of the proposed act are nearly taken. These have been now acted upon without difficulty for many years, and are clearly understood, both here and in America. It is to be hoped, therefore, that no occasion is given for misrepresentation or misunderstanding, at least in this part of the bill.

"It is true that non-enumerated unmanufactured goods and merchandise, which were importable under the orders in council on the British plantation duties, would be importable, by this act, on the duties payable by the most favored nation. The difference is not believed to be material, because the chief articles of that sort are specified in the next section, and are thereby made importable on the British plantation duties; and because there are but few articles, besides those specified, which pay less duty, or are duty free, when imported from a British plantation. There will, however, be no objection to restore non-enumerated unmanufactured goods and merchandise to the footing on which they stood by the orders in council; and the bill will be brought into the House of Commons upon that principle.

"All the material articles of the American trade, which might, according to the treaty, have been subjected to the heavy duties now payable on many of them by the most favored nation, are put upon a par with the same articles from British colonies, and pay either a very low duty, or no duty at all. Amongst the latter are pot and pearl ashes, bar and pig iron, and most articles of wood.

"Indigo was omitted among the enumerated articles, as the insertion of it was stated by the officers of the customs to be superfluous; it being importable, under certain regulations, from all countries, duty free.

"The general stipulation respecting duties in the treaty is, that the duties on American articles shall not be higher than are, or shall be, payable on the like articles from any other foreign country; and the provisions of the former sections prove that this country is sensible of the principles of policy stated in the remark.

"According to the treaty, such further duty may also be imposed as may be (not equal to, but) adequate to countervail the difference of duty on the importation of European and Asiatic goods into the United States, in British and American vessels. The object of retaining such a right was by no means to check American trade, but to protect British navigation, on the same principle on which America has protected her own; and the manner in which it is now proposed to be exercised will be found, upon examination, liberal; never exceeding, and, in most cases, falling within, the limits prescribed by the treaty.

"The interpretation given to the last clause of the 15th article is far from clear or admissible; but, even if it were true that, at the period referred to, the American Government might increase the now subsisting difference between the tonnage and other duties on British and American ships, it is also true that the British Government might exercise their right of imposing duties on American articles, in any ships, and countervailing duties on such articles in American ships to its full extent; and that both countries might experience much inconvenience from such a conduct. But it may be hoped that both countries are too sensible of their mutual interest to engage in this kind of commercial hostility; and the manner in which the British Government proposes, at present, to exercise its rights, is perfectly remote from any such idea.

"The mode of imposing the countervailing duty is stated to be obscure, and another more simple is proposed.

"Had the right of imposing duties been exercised to its full extent by one general clause subjecting American articles to no higher duties than those payable on similar articles from any other foreign country, obscurity would have been avoided; a countervailing duty (in addition to such duties) of ten per cent. on their amount might have been imposed. The rule would have been simple in itself, and simple in its operation; but the most material articles of the American commerce would have been exposed to heavy, and, in many instances, insupportable burthens. All the apparent obscurity and complexity of these provisions, which, however, will be found upon examination to be sufficiently intelligible, arises from the desire on the part of the Government of this country of favoring the American commerce in its most important branches.

"The rule proposed in the remark is not indeed (nor could it be expected that it should be) that rule which is above stated as the most simple. But it is suggested that 10 per cent. should be imposed upon the duties payable on American goods imported from America in British ships. It will be found, upon examination, that this is exactly what is done in all cases to which such a rule is applicable.

"Section 10 applies this rule to all the articles included in section 2. Section 14 applies it to the articles included in section 4. Section 11 relates to bar and pig iron, pot and pearl ash.

"These articles are generally subject to duty, but, when imported from the British plantations, with certificates, are duty free.

By section 3, these articles, when imported from the United States in British ships, are put upon the same footing as if imported from the British plantations, with certificates, and are therefore duty free.

"As the imposition of 10 per cent. upon nothing is impossible, it is imposed upon the amount of the duty payable on importation from the British plantations without certificate.

"This duty on pot and pearl ash is about 2*s*. 4*d*. per cwt.; the ten per cent. will be about 2½*d*.

"This duty on pig iron is about 5*s*. 9*d*. per ton; the ten per cent. will be about 6½*d* per ton.

"This duty on bar iron is about £3 1*s*. 9½*d*. per ton; the ten per cent. about 5*s*. 7½*d*.

"These will be the only duties payable on these articles, even when imported in American ships; whereas the duties which might have been imposed, consistently with the treaty, would have been, on pig iron above, £31 10*s*. per cwt. ad valorem; and on bar iron, above £3 7*s*. per ton.

"The importation of iron from America consists almost entirely of pig iron, on which the proposed duty is merely nominal.

Section 13 relates to unmanufactured wood and staves, upon which no duty is payable when imported from the British plantations. The imposition of ten per cent., on the proposed principle, was here also impossible; and the ten per cent. is therefore imposed upon the lowest duties on wood and staves imported from foreign countries, i. e. when so imported in British ships. American unmanufactured wood and staves, as well as the articles in section 11, will, therefore, pay nothing when imported in British ships; and when imported in American ships, only one-tenth part of the duty payable on the same articles when imported from any other country in British ships.

"This can hardly be conceived to be, in any instance, a prohibitory duty. It will, in fact, be, upon most articles, little more than nominal. The duties paid by the wood of other countries, amounted, last year, to about £350,000; of which America paid no part whatever.

"Section 12. These articles are in no case duty free. They do not, therefore, require the same special provision with the articles included in section 11. But the rule proposed in the remark is exactly applied to them.

"Section 15. The proposed additional duty on tobacco imported in American ships is 18*d.* per 100 lbs. weight.

"The present custom house duty on British plantation tobacco, imported in British ships, is 6*d.* per pound, i. e. 50*s.* per 100 pounds weight.; the ten per cent. upon this would be 5*s.* It is not necessary to observe how far the adoption, in this case, of a specific sum, instead of a proportion of a duty, is favorable both to American commerce and navigation.

"If the proposed tax upon American commodities, even when imported in American vessels, is conceived to be a heavy burthen, it is desired that the duties now payable in America upon all articles of British commerce should be compared with those which, after passing the proposed bill, will be payable in Great Britain upon all articles of American commerce. A glance of the eye over such a comparative table would supersede the necessity of further argument upon this head.

"It should, however, be observed, that the rate of custom duties has, of late, been considerably increased in America. On comparing the tax table of August, 1790, with the bill which commenced on the last day of March, 1795, (subsequent to the date of the treaty) it will be found that the duties on all the articles of British trade, have been raised in different proportions, varying from the addition of one-third, to the addition, in many instances, of a tax equal to the original duty. The difference of duty, on importing the same articles in British or American ships, has indeed still been only ten per cent.; but it is evident that this ten per cent. when calculated upon a larger sum, imposed, in fact, a heavier burthen; and, if a literal interpretation were to be insisted upon, might be argued, "to increase the then subsisting difference between the duties payable on the importation of any articles in British or American vessels;" which increase is particularly provided against in the fifteenth article.

"Sections 21 to 26. The doubt implied in the remarks on these sections, whether the tonnage duty proposed to be levied on American ships is within the stipulation of the treaty, rests upon a supposition (which cannot be admitted) that the contracting parties were ignorant of the difference then existing in the light, and other duties, payable in British ports by British or American vessels. That difference was, in fact, notorious to both parties; and, notwithstanding that the right reserved is expressly to impose a tonnage duty equal to (not "adequate to countervail," as expressed in another part of the same article) that which shall be payable by British vessels in America.

"It might further be stated that light house duties, or tolls, never have been considered, as yet, in the negotiation or construction of any treaty of commerce, as public duties; they are, in truth, not so: they are of service to many foreign ships which never enter a British port, and they are so various, according to the different voyages made by different ships coming into our ports, that any attempts to calculate any countervailing duty, with a reference to these tolls, would be deficient, if not impracticable.

"The right reserved by the treaty is not, however, proposed to be exercised to its full extent, as the intended tonnage duty, of 2*s.* per ton, is not equal to the tonnage duty payable in America by British ships, but to the difference between the duty payable in America on British and American ships.

"The light duties on all ships vary in the different ports of Great Britain, each ship being charged for the toll of such lights only as she passes; but no tolls are collected in any of the outports by the corporation of Trinity House, except the light duties. In London, American and other ships, besides the toll to the several lights, pay a duty of about 8*d.* per ton, (under the denomination of Trinity duties) for the buoys and beacons, which are very numerous.

"The tolls for the benefit of the lights are, in general, double on American and other foreign ships to what British ships pay.

"With respect to the light duties on American ships passing up St. George's channel, the English channel, and the northern lights, the following is an accurate statement of the light duties paid by an American ship of 200 tons, and a British ship of the same burthen, viz:

	£.	s.	d.
An American ship of 200 tons, passing through the English channel to London, pays to the numerous lights on the coast,	10	16	8
And, on her return,	10	16	8
Which is 1*s.* 1*d.* per ton, each way,
If the same ship proceeds to the Baltic, the additional lights amount to	4	1	3

Which is less than 5*d.* per ton, and is payable for the single passage; but the same ship passes the northern lights on her back passage, without any additional charge.

	£.	s.	d.
An American ship of 200 tons, from America to Liverpool or Bristol, pays, for lights,	5	00	00
And thence to America,	5	00	00
Which is 6*d.* per ton each way.
A British ship of 200 tons, from London to America, pays	5	16	08
From America to London,	5	16	08
Which is 7*d.* per ton each way.
A British ship of 200 tons, from Liverpool or Bristol to America, pays	2	10	00
Back from America,	2	10	00
Which is 3*d.* per ton each way.

On a supposition that an American ship performs the after mentioned voyage, which rarely happens (it may be said never) she pays for 200 tons in the following proportion to a British ship, viz:

	American. £.	s.	d.	British. £.	s.	d.
From America to Bristol,	5	00	00	2	10	00
Bristol to London,	10	16	8	5	16	8
London to the Baltic,	4	1	3	3	4	7
For her return to America,	15	16	8	8	6	8
Northern lights not charged for, the back passage.
	£35	14	7	£19	17	11

"So that an American ship of two hundred tons would pay, £35. 14*s.* 7*d.* (not £69. 3*s.* 4*d.* as stated in the remarks) for a voyage from America to Liverpool or Bristol, from thence to London, from London to the Baltic, and home to America.

"A British ship, for the same voyage, would pay £19. 17*s.* 11*d.*

"In the course of the above voyage a ship passes, and has the benefit of, thirty-six lights; every one of which leads her clear of the most dangerous sands, shoals, or rocks; and American ships always avoid the payment of lights for their passage through the English Channel, if bound to a foreign port, by not entering a British port, unless bound there to deliver, or forced in by distress of weather; and then they only pay for such lights as they receive benefit from; and although American ships pay their light duties for the passage up and down the channel, yet if such ships do not pass all the lights, in the several channels, which they have paid for, either by not returning down channel, going north about, or never returning, the duties they paid for the several lights they have not passed are returned to them.

"Section 28. Nothing can be further from the intention of this country than any idea of so constructing the treaty as to incapacitate the Americans from enjoying, by favor, the advantages which are granted, occasionally, by favor, to other friendly and neutral merchants. Nothing in the section can have any such effect. It does no more than permit American ships to carry on the trade as stipulated by the treaty.

"The intercourse which neutral ships have been allowed to enjoy with the British territories in India, though sanctioned by custom, appears, by some late decisions in our own courts of justice, to be contrary to law: and it will be necessary to make some general legislative provision upon that subject. The directors of the East India Company will then be legally authorized to give directions for the admission of neutral ships, subject to such regulations as they may think proper: provided, only, that they are not inconsistent with any act of Parliament for regulating their trade, nor with any treaty.

"By the proposed clause the intercourse, stipulated by the treaty, is exempted from the discretion of the directors, and put upon the footing of right. With respect to all other intercourse, American ships will be capable of profiting, in common, with others, of such advantages as may be granted by favor."

From the tenor of these observations it was evident that most of the points were so far settled as to leave little hope of alteration. I however insisted upon the equity of the objection against the tonnage duty, as well in my conference with Lord Grenville, as with a subsequent one that I had with Lord Liverpool. The answer was, that their light duties were not a branch of revenue; that the terms of the treaty left no room for construction; and that, independent of their desire to encourage their own navigation, the balancing of their light duties against our tonnage duties would constitute a precedent that would operate to their disadvantage in their future treaties with other nations. I concluded the discussion, on this head, by observing that it was reasonable to suppose, that the parties did intend to put their navigation upon an equal footing, in their intercourse with each other; that it was plain that this equality would not exist under the proposed tonnage duty; and that there remained no other mode of correcting the inequality, but by our Government's imposing and collecting a duty under the denomination of light-money.

Light houses, in Europe, are generally supported by a duty, imposed for that special purpose, upon all ships, and the duty is commonly double upon foreign ships. I have not discovered that these tolls, or duties, have ever been included in the computation frequently made in the adjustment or equalization of the taxes imposed by different nations upon the ships which enter their ports.

These duties are not considered as a branch of revenue; from the manner in which our tonnage duty is levied, collected, and paid, it is deemed to be a branch of our revenue; though a considerable portion of the amount of the duty is annually applied to support our light houses, beacons, buoys, &c.

It merits consideration, not only in reference to this country, but likewise as it respects the similar duties of other European nations, whether we ought not to impose, in like manner with them, a particular and adequate duty upon all ships for the support of our light houses.

In these conferences I urged, but without success, the objection that I had before made against the full countervailing duty upon fish oils; as the countervailing right was not exercised in its full extent in respect to tobacco and rice. I suggested the policy of a small additional duty only, to the very high duties already imposed upon this article. I was answered, that in tobacco and rice we were not rivals, but that in the whale fishery we were so; that, even against high duties, large quantities of our spermaceti oil, and occasionally cargoes of our brown oil, were sold in England; and that our skill and situation gave us great advantage over others in this branch of industry.

My efforts have been more successful in respect to our trade to India. A clause was added to the bill, giving it a retrospective operation from the time of the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty, by which the insurances which had been made here upon our ships in that trade will become legal. Another clause which had been added to protect such of the British officers against suits as, after the conclusion of the treaty and before the passage of the bill, had seized American ships trading to India, was rejected. This clause had been inserted in the bill with a special reference to the capture, by Lord Keith, at the Cape of Good Hope, of the ship Argonaut, Collect, master; its rejection leaves the remedy in full force, as well against the underwriters as against Lord Keith.

I found, in the course of these conferences, that our construction of the 13th article of the treaty, in respect to the outward voyage to India, would be admitted by this Government; and that we have a right, under that article, to go to India from England, Madeira, or any other country, and with productions collected and taken on board at any place, instead of being confined to a direct voyage from America to India; a construction of the article that the East India company have endeavored to establish.

I likewise found the greatest readiness to put us upon as good a footing as any other nation in the trade which, by favor, may be carried on with India. A late decision in Westminster Hall had shown, that the trade hitherto carried on by foreigners with the British possessions in India, was against the navigation act: a bill has, therefore, been brought into Parliament, vesting in the directors of the East India company a power to permit such trade, under such regulations as may be judged advisable. These regulations will be principally for the purpose of preventing British subjects carrying on a trade under foreign flags; our ships, by this bill, will have an equal right with those of other nations in amity with Great Britain, to share in the coasting trade of India, in the freightage from India to China, and from India to Europe, the restrictions and limitations in our treaty notwithstanding.

The East India company have opposed this bill; though I have good reason to be satisfied that they have done so, not from an aversion to our participation in the trade, but from an apprehension that British capital and British subjects would engage in it, to the injury of the company's monopoly.

The bill for carrying the American treaty into effect has passed into a law.

The bill permitting the ships of nations in amity with Great Britain to trade to the British possessions in India, under certain regulations, is before Parliament, and will probably pass into a law. (See page 103.)

I annex copies of sundry papers which have passed between the Court of Directors and the Board of Control, respecting as well this bill as that which has passed into a law for carrying into effect the American treaty.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, Sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

Papers referred to in the preceding letter.

J. Anstruther to Mr. Inglis.

LINCOLN'S INN, 31*st May*, 1797.

SIR:

A case has lately occurred in the Court of King's Bench respecting the trade of foreigners to India, which renders some law upon the subject necessary. An action was brought upon a policy on the cargo of an American ship loaded in the British territories in India. Lord Kenyon held, that it was against the act of navigation for foreigners to export from, or import into the British territories in India, any goods whatever; and therefore nonsuited the plaintiff. If this decision be right, a Danish, or Swedish, or American ship, loading her cargo in India, is liable to be seized and confiscated, and some law must be passed to set the matter right.

The attention of the Board of Trade was called to the point by the American minister. They sent the subject to the Board of Control, who thought the proper mode of remedying the evil was, to put the trade under the regulation of the East India Company. By their directions, I have prepared the accompanying act, to be submitted to the court of directors. I have the honor to be, yours, &c.

J. ANSTRUTHER.

HUGH INGLIS, Esq.

Mr. Dundas to Mr. Inglis.

WHITEHALL, 14*th June*, 1797.

SIR:

I have received your letters enclosing two clauses which are wished to be inserted in the bills now pending in Parliament, one for carrying into effect the treaty with America; the other for regulating the trade to be carried on with India by the ships of nations in amity with Great Britain.

These subjects are closely connected together, and I shall shortly give you my reasons why I would deem it very impolitic to bring either of those propositions under discussion. I do not think Parliament would agree to adopt them; and therefore, all the unpopularity likely to arise from the discussion would attach on the East India Company alone.

First, with regard to the clause respecting the American intercourse with India, I think the clause goes beyond the terms of the treaty; for I can discover no words in it to justify the proposition that the Americans are bound to go directly from America without touching at any other port; and therefore it would be most impolitic indeed to attempt, at the request of the East India Company, to make the situation of the American trade to India more severe than settled by a solemn and well considered treaty. Besides, it is well worthy the consideration of the East India Company, if it is not more impolitic to relax from the rigor of the American treaty, as it now stands, than to endeavor to draw it straighter than the terms of that treaty warrant. If a more extensive mode of trading to India is permitted to other nations, in amity with Great Britain, the Americans, whose amity with us is at least as desirable as that of any other nation, would probably consider themselves hardly dealt with if they were to be kept in a worse state of intercourse with India than that which has been, and I think, probably will be, continued to other nations in amity with us.

This leads me to observe upon the clause proposed to be inserted in the other bill, relative to the intercourse of other nations in amity with us. Upon this subject it cannot fail to strike you, on the first view of it, that you are avowedly, by this clause, rendering more unfavorable to other nations the trade to India, than has, in fact, and in practice, been exercised by them. Surely the Court of Directors cannot think this is the moment when it can be thought right to excite the jealousy of other nations respecting our Indian pre-eminence; the reverse must be our conduct; and in proportion as we may be obliged to hold up our rights of sovereignty in that country, exactly in the same proportion must we convince other nations of the liberality of our commercial principles. In truth, the bill now brought forward, puts the trade of other nations more under the check and control of the East India Company than it has hitherto in practice been; and, under such circumstances, it would, in my opinion, be most unwise to avow, by a proposition coming from them, that they intend, in the execution of it, to be more illiberal and rigorous than heretofore.

So far, with regard to the manner in which the proposition may operate on the feelings of foreign nations; but I would submit to the serious consideration of the East India Company, how far they would be wise, from considerations nearer home, to bring forward or to agitate such a proposition.

The manifest tendency of what you propose, if it has any effect at all, is to throw a difficulty in the way of the export of the produce and manufactures of this country. If the East India Company, in virtue of their monopoly, and the capital they possess, not only in Britain but in India, are not able, by a wise and economical commercial system, to secure to themselves the export trade from Great Britain to India, against any competition with any foreign nation whatever, it is a confession at least unnecessary to bring forward, and one which the representatives of the commercial and manufacturing interests of Great Britain will not feel disposed to countenance, by lending their aid to render it more difficult for other nations to make British produce or manufactures part of their assortments to the Indian market. I have uniformly been of opinion, and always will remain so, that the East India Company must maintain their monopoly, not merely by legislative regulations and restrictions, which on such a subject will always prove to be unavailing and ineffectual, but by the exercise of a judicious and well devised system of commercial policy.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

HENRY DUNDAS.

East India Company's report sent to Mr. Dundas, with the clauses alluded to in his letter to Mr. Inglis.

"AT A COMMITTEE OF LAW SUITS, 9th June, 1797.

"Pursuant to reference of court of 31st ultimo, the committee, with the assistance of the counsel and solicitor, took into consideration a letter from John Anstruther, Esq. enclosing draft of a bill proposed to be brought into Parliament for permitting ships of countries and States, in amity with His Majesty, to import into, and export from, the British possessions in India, with such regulations as may be made by the Court of Directors.

The committee also considered a clause in an act, now before the House of Commons, applicable to the 13th article of the treaty with the United States of America (so far as relates to their trading to and from the East Indies;) and, having very maturely deliberated thereon, they are of opinion that it is necessary, on the part of the Company, and for the preservation of their interest, and of the general interests of this country, and to secure to it, as far as possible, the carrying trade, that all ships and vessels of countries and States, in amity with His Majesty, should be restrained from importing goods and commodities of the growth, produce, and manufacture of the British territories, into any port or place in the East Indies, being part of the British possessions, without having first landed such goods and commodities in the country or territory to which such ship shall truly, and bona fide, belong; and, also, that they should be restrained from importing into any port or place whatever, any goods or commodities exported by them from the British territories in the East Indies, otherwise than to the ports of the country to which such ship shall actually belong.

"Which is submitted to the court."

Clause proposed by the East India Company to be added to the American bill.

"Provided always, that nothing in this act shall extend, or be construed to extend, to authorize any citizen of America to carry on any trade, otherwise than directly from some port in America to the said British territories in India; and from the said British territories in India to some port in America; any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

N. B. A similar clause mutatis mutandis was proposed to be added to the foreign trade bill.

5th Congress.] No. 131. [2d Session.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 5, 1798.

United States, February 5th, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate and
Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I have received a letter from his excellency Charles Pinckney, esq. Governor of the State of South Carolina, dated on the 22d of October, 1797, enclosing a number of depositions of witnesses to several captures and outrages committed within and near the limits of the United States, by a French privateer, belonging to Cape François or Monte Christo, called the Vertitude, or Fortitude, and commanded by a person of the name of Jordon, or Jourdain, and particularly upon an English merchant ship named the Oracabissa, which he first plundered, and then burned, with the rest of her cargo of great value, within the territory of the United States, in the harbor of Charleston, on the 17th day of October last; copies of which letter and depositions, and also of several other depositions relative to the same subject, received from the collector of Charleston, are herewith communicated.

Whenever the channels of diplomatical communication between the United States and France shall be opened, I shall demand satisfaction for the insult, and reparation for the injury.

I have transmitted these papers to Congress, not so much for the purpose of communicating an account of so daring a violation of the territory of the United States, as to show the propriety and necessity of enabling the Executive authority of Government to take measures for protecting the citizens of the United States, and such foreigners as have a right to enjoy their peace and the protection of their laws within their limits, in that, as well as in some other harbors, which are equally exposed.

JOHN ADAMS.

Letter from Governor Pinckney to the President of the United States.

Charleston, October 22, 1797.

Sir:

I have the honor to submit to your consideration the enclosed affidavits respecting the English ship Oracabissa, burnt on Tuesday last within the bar of this harbor, by a privateer, said to be called the Vertitude, commanded by a Captain Jourdain, and belonging to Cape François; also of the capture of the ship Pallas, belonging to this port, and the Mary, of Savannah. By an examination of these affidavits, you will find this was a very glaring and wanton violation of the neutrality of the United States, and such as will require their serious attention. The distance from this city to the place where the act was committed, prevented our interfering in time. As soon as I received intelligence of it from the British consul, I ordered an armed force from Fort Johnson to proceed to the Oracabissa, to protect her, while within our harbor and the jurisdictional line of the United States, from seizure, depredation, or insult; but the cutter was not able to get down before the ship was destroyed, and the privateer had put to sea, and proceeded beyond the limits of the United States, where she captured the Pallas and the Mary the next day. As I am convinced these violations of our neutrality within our harbors and limits cannot be countenanced by the French Government, but are generally committed by vessels not commissioned, or which proceed contrary to their instructions, I have considered it my duty to transmit them to you for your determination, and have requested the collector to forward copies to the proper department. The trade of this city being extremely important to the revenue of the United States, and much exposed, from its southern situation, to cruisers from the Floridas, Bahamas, and the West Indies, British as well as French, (for they have both lately captured a number of our vessels), I conceive it would be proper that a revenue cutter of at least twenty guns should be equipped for the use of this port, and for the protection of the neutrality of the United States within our jurisdictional line, until the establishment of a general peace, which, I trust, will soon take place; and that all our differences with the French republic will be honorably and amicably adjusted.

I have the honor, &c.

By John Mitchell, Esq. Justice of the Quorum in and for the said State, and notary public, by lawful authority duly sworn, admitted, and commissioned, residing and practising in the city and State aforesaid.

Do hereby certify that, on the day of the date hereof, personally came and appeared before me the said notary, Jonathan Story, master of the ship Oracabissa, of London, who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did depose, testify, and declare, that on his voyage from Jamaica, loaded with sugar and rum, bound for London, he met with severe gales of wind, by which he lost his main and mizen masts, and sprung a leak; that being in great distress off the harbor of Charleston, the British consul, having had information of his situation, sent six or seven men to assist him, and enable him to get over the bar, and up to Charleston, to repair the said vessel; that, after several days lying at anchor off the bar, on Friday evening, the thirteenth of this instant, October, he got over the bar with the said ship, and came to anchor in Five Fathom Hole, in the harbor of Charleston aforesaid: the wind being contrary, he could not proceed up to the city; that, on Monday evening, the sixteenth of said month, about sun down, he saw a small armed schooner come over the bar, and came to anchor to the north-north-west of said ship, but showed no colors; that immediately after the said armed schooner weighed anchor, and came close up under their starboard quarter, and came to anchor; ordered him to hoist out his boat, but on his answering his boat was stove, they sent their boat, with an officer and four or five armed men, with pistols and cutlasses, took forcible possession of said ship Oracabissa, ordered the deponent, with his papers, on board the said schooner, and carried him and one man on board, and sent the boat, with four or five armed men, on board the said ship; that, when he got on board, he perceived two carriage guns, but the small arms were concealed from him; that he asked the name of the said schooner, and the captain's name, but they refused to inform him: one of the men said she came from Cape François, and was a French privateer; that, as soon as the boat went the second time with men on board, he saw them begin to plunder the vessel and cargo, and continued to do so till eight o'clock on Tuesday morning; that they brought as much rum and sugar of the cargo, and the rigging and sails of the vessel, as they could stow in the said privateer; that at nine o'clock they cut the said ship Oracabissa's cables, and set her on fire in four several places, to wit—fore, main, and after hatchway, and in the gun room: the ship then drifted on the breakers, near the shore; after which, the captain of the said privateer told him he had fifty men on board, but would not tell him his name, or the vessel's name; also said that the captain of a British frigate had burned a privateer he commanded in Hampton roads, and for that reason he burned the ship, but could he have carried her off, he would have done it; that the deponent received part of his clothes in a bag, and received no personal bad treatment, himself or crew; immediately after, the privateer weighed anchor, got over the bar, and went into Stony Inlet, and landed him with fifteen men on the beach, being the whole number on board the ship when taken at anchor in the harbor of Charleston, contrary to the laws of neutrality and of nations; that they got to Mr. Taylor's, who treated them very kind, and in a friendly manner.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, city of Charleston.

By John Mitchell, Esq. Justice of the Quorum in and for the said State, and notary public, by lawful authority duly sworn, admitted, and commissioned, residing and practising in the city and State aforesaid.

Do hereby certify that, on the day of the date hereof, personally came and appeared before me, the said notary, Michael Delany, who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did depose, testify, and declare, that he is a branch pilot belonging to Charleston; that on this morning A. M. as he was conducting the brig Hannah, of Charleston, Captain Daniel Bythewood, into harbor, this 17th instant, at a quarter past nine o'clock, he discovered the British ship Oracabissa on fire, from her stern to the main hatch; but, being then about four miles distant from her, he cannot be more particular; that, at the time he first discovered the fire, there were no colors flying that he could perceive, but in a few minutes after, he saw colors flying at the fore topmast head, but could not distinguish of what nation.

MICHAEL DELANY, his × mark.

Captain Daniel Bythewood being also duly sworn agreeably to law, deposeth that, on this morning, about a quarter past nine o'clock, being in the brig Hannah of Charleston, under his command, as he was crossing the bar of Charleston, having Michael Delany, a branch pilot, on board, he saw a large ship dismantled, and at anchor in Five Fathom Hole, within the bar and harbor of Charleston; he saw the smoke and flames issuing from the said ship from her stern to the main hatchway; that when he first discovered the smoke he perceived no colors, but afterwards saw colors flying at the fore-topmast head, but could not distinguish to what nation they belonged.

DANIEL BYTHEWOOD.

Mr. John Colhoun being also duly sworn agreeable to law, deposeth that, on yesterday the sixteenth of this instant, October, about half past one o'clock, P. M. he went on board the British ship Oracabissa, in Five Fathom Hole, commanded by Captain Story, with provisions sent by His Britannic Majesty's consul for the captain and men on board, the said ship having lost her main and mizen masts, being in distress from severe gales, and a great leak which kept one pump going; about half past two, being at dinner with the captain, one of the seamen came and informed him there was a picaroon coming in, he had better be on his guard for fear of an attack, when the captain asked the deponent to go out and look at the said picaroon, which he did, and was of opinion, with the seamen and pilot, that the said picaroon or privateer was an enemy's vessel; that the seamen wanted to fire at her; but, by the advice of the deponent, the captain forbad it, but got the six-pounder in order to defend the vessel if she was attacked; the said picaroon came over the bar; passed the ship, and came to an anchor between her and the light house; soon after, the said picaroon weighed anchor, and came to N. N. W. at between two and three miles distance, about five o'clock; the deponent left the said ship and proceeded to Charleston in a whale boat, with two negroes; that he rowed close under the stern of the said picaroon or schooner privateer to endeavor to find out what she was; that he hailed her and asked from whence she came, to which answer was made in bad or broken English, from Savannah, and also desired the deponent to come on board, to which he refused; he then asked him if he was a pilot, he answered no; but would send him one if he wanted one; to this the same voice asked what ship that was, to which he replied, Ay! ay! He then rowed towards the ship to put them on their guard, on which the said picaroon weighed anchor and endeavored to cut him off from the ship, but he hailed the ship, and told them to take care, at which time the said schooner fired a shot at him; he then ordered the sail set, and stood for the light house, at which time he received a second shot, and was chased until he got into shoal water; they then fired a third shot, but were obliged to desist chasing, and proceeding to the ship, came to an anchor about a mile from her stern; he then proceeded to Charleston, and about nine o'clock informed the British consul of the above particulars.

JOHN COLHOUN.

In testimony whereof, I, the said notary, have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal of office, at Charleston, this 17th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1797, and in the 22d year of the independence of the United States of America.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, city of Charleston.

By John Mitchell, Esq. Justice of the Quorum in and for the said State, and notary public, by lawful authority duly sworn, admitted, and commissioned, residing and practising in the city and State aforesaid.

Do hereby certify that, on the day of the date hereof, personally came and appeared before me the said notary, Mr. Shadrach Turner, of Charleston, a pilot, who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did depose, testify, and declare that, on Monday, the 16th instant, he was sent on board the British ship Oracabissa, Captain Story, who lay at anchor in Five Fathom Hole, within the bar and harbor of Charleston, in distress, to relieve the pilot who had been on board several days and was sick; that about 3 o'clock a small French schooner privateer came over the bar and came to anchor to the northward of the said ship; that seeing a boat go from the ship, in which Mr. Colhoun was, the privateer got under way and chased her till she got into Light House Creek, then run up under the stern of the said ship, and came to an anchor on her starboard quarter, hailed her, and asked from whence she came, and was answered from Jamaica, and came there in distress; they then ordered the captain to lower his boat down, and come on board; he answered the boat was stove; on which the privateer hoisted his boat out, and sent a lieutenant and another officer with two men on board, who took forcible possession of the ship as a prize to said privateer, and sent the captain with his papers on board her, and afterwards sent several more men on board to assist in pumping, who began to plunder the vessel, and continued to do so all night, sent sugar, rum, cordage, and sails on board the said schooner, as much as could be stowed, till eight o'clock in the morning of the 17th, when they sent Captain Story on board the ship to get his clothes, and see they had taken none; that between eight and nine all the people were sent on board the privateer, and at nine o'clock they set her on fire in several places, and cut her cables; she then drifted on the Folly Breakers, with her colors flying; they then got under way, and stood over the bar and into Stono Inlet, where all the people were landed, but the deponent, whom they kept on board, having first proposed to land them on Light House Island, but the deponent informed them it could not be done with safety; that they lay in Stono all the night; that yesterday morning they got out and bore down on the ship Pallas and ship Betsey, who were bound for Charleston; they took the Pallas and let the Betsey go, and sent the deponent on board her, in which vessel he got up to Charleston this morning; that when he was on board the privateer the captain showed him his commission, in which the said schooner is called the Vertitude, and the captain, Jordon, of Monte Christo; that he was well treated on board.

SHADRACH TURNER.

In testimony whereof, I, the said notary, have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my seal of office, at Charleston, this 19th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1797, and in the 22d year of the independence of the United States of America.

By John Mitchell, Esquire, Justice of the Quorum in and for the said State, and notary public, by lawful authority duly sworn, admitted, and commissioned, residing and practising in the city and State aforesaid.

Do hereby certify that, on the day of the date hereof, personally came and appeared before me, the said notary, of Charleston, who, being duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did depose, testify, and declare, that he was employed by Benjamin Moodie, Esquire, His Britannic Majesty's consul in this city, to go on board the British ship Oracabissa, Captain Story, who was in great distress, having lost her main and mizen mast, and sprung a leak; that, on the 9th day of this instant, October, he, with six more men, went from this city, and got on board said vessel, then about three leagues over the bar; that they came to anchor that evening, and on Friday, the 13th, the ship got over the bar of Charleston, and came to anchor in Five Fathom Hole, the wind being contrary could not proceed for the city; that the ship continued at anchor till Monday afternoon, about 3 o'clock, when a small armed schooner privateer came over the bar, and came to anchor about north of the ship; that a little before sun down the said schooner weighed anchor, and came close along side said ship and dropped anchor; that she had no colors up. They ordered the captain of the ship to hoist out his boat and come on board with his papers, who answered the boat was stove; they then sent him their boat with an officer and four or five armed men, who took forcible possession of the vessel, and carried the captain, with his papers, and the boatswain, on board the privateer, and detained them, and sent the boat again with more men on board the ship; that they immediately began to plunder the cargo and vessel, and continued to carry sugar, rum, coffee, cordage, and sails, all night, with all the other articles they could carry; that, on the morning of Tuesday the 17th, about nine or ten o'clock, they set the said ship Oracabissa on fire in three places that he saw, cut both cables, by which she drifted on the Folly Breakers, close by the light house shore; that the deponent was informed the said privateer was called the Adventure, from Cape François, Captain Jordon; they then took the deponent, Captain Story, and all the men on board of the ship on board the privateer, got under way and over the bar, then run into Stono Inlet, where they landed all the people except Mr. Turner, the pilot, whom they carried away.

Do hereby certify that, on the day of the date hereof, personally came and appeared before me, the said notary, Thomas Pierson, first mate, Robert Glaister, second mate, Alexander Jordon, and Benjamin Jeffries, seamen on board the ship Pallas, of Charleston, who being severally duly sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, did depose, testify, and declare, that they sailed on board the said ship Pallas from Port Glasgow, commanded by Captain John Hunter, loaded with coals and dry goods, American property, and bound for Charleston, in the State of South Carolina aforesaid, on Monday, the 12th day of August last, being all natives of the United States; that they arrived in said ship off the bar of Charleston on Monday, the 16th of this instant, October; that on Wednesday, the 18th, about 12 o'clock, they were in ten fathoms water, N. N. W. of the Charleston light house, about six leagues from the land, when a small schooner, a French privateer, which they were informed was called the Fortitude, commanded by Captain Jordon, carrying two six pounders, came up, having then an English jack flying, and ordered them to hoist out the boat, and the captain to come on board, and bring his papers with him; that being some time getting, the privateer sent her boat along side, and an officer with armed men came on board, and forcibly took Captain Hunter, two men, and a boy, on board the privateer, and sent more men on board the ship, took possession of her as a prize to the said privateer, put the deponents, with four more of the crew, and two passengers, on board the ship Mary, of Hamburg, leaving Captain Hunter, two men, and a boy on board the Pallas; that the officer who was put on board the said ship Pallas said he would carry her to Cape François, in St. Domingo; that the ship Mary got over the bar of Charleston this morning, the 19th, and landed them in the city about 11 o'clock this day.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 132. [2d SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 19, 1798.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In the report of the Secretary of State, and the documents herewith transmitted, will be found such information as is in our possession, of the losses recovered by the citizens of the United States, under the treaty made with Great Britain, which are now presented to the House of Representatives in compliance with their request, in their resolution of the first of this month.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, February 18th, 1798.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 16, 1798.

To the President of the United States:

The Secretary of State respectfully presents, as directed, the annexed papers, exhibiting, pursuant to a resolve of the House of Representatives of the first instant, "a statement of the losses recovered by the citizens of the United States, under the treaty made with Great Britain;" and, as far as he possesses information, "specifying those cases which have actually been decided in the court of appeals."

Document A contains a schedule of the cases of costs and damages which, in order to save the delay and expense attending their prosecution before the judiciary tribunals, were refered, by the consent of the American and British Governments, to the decision of Sir William Scott, the King's Advocate General, and Doctor John Nicholl, the advocate retained on the part of the United States. The annexed extract of a letter from Mr. Bayard, the American agent, dated 28th February, 1797, and marked A A, will show how advantageously to the claimants this class of cases was settled by the referees. The sums awarded were paid on the 28th of last July.

Document B contains a list of the causes in which, on the 29th of last July (the date of the latest communication upon the subject) restitution had been decreed by the board of commissioners appointed to carry into effect the 7th article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with Great Britain; and document C contains such cases wherein the amount of the awards had been paid at the time last mentioned, being all that were then due. It is proper to add, that, in a letter from the American commissioners, dated the 29th of July, 1797, they intimate that, "except some more cases of capture, under the orders of 1795, for taking vessels loaded with provisions, there is very little prospect of any other being in a state to come before the commissioners, till the term of eighteen months, from the commencement of their business, shall have expired. Every cause, in which the parties were furnished with the necessary evidence, had been decided; and they trusted, that almost every principle of importance, or liable to contest, had been settled and determined, until the question should be agitated, if any should ever be made, of their right to judge on cases not decided by the commissioners of appeal, after the said term of eighteen months is elapsed."

The Department of State is not in possession of documents from which any tolerably accurate or comprehensive statement can be made of the decisions decreeing restitution, or reversing sentences of condemnation, which have actually taken place in the High Court of Admiralty and Court of Appeals in prize causes; but owing to the multiplicity of business which, in time of war, accumulates upon them, and to the small space of time allotted for the sittings of the latter, there is reason to believe that no great despatch has been given to the decision of the American causes depending therein. Document D contains such as have been extracted from the imperfect papers, with which the Department of State is furnished in relation to that subject.

Extract of a letter from S. Bayard, Esq. to the Secretary of State, dated FEBRUARY 28*th*, 1797.

SIR:

I have the pleasure to inform that Sir William Scott and Dr. Nicholl have conferred together on the subject of the cases of cost and damage. In many of them, where the documents were satisfactory, they have made definitive awards; in others their awards are conditional, allotting a certain sum of money on the party's producing an affidavit of his having sustained a loss to that amount. Where the proofs were defective, they have, in many cases, specified the nature of the further proofs demanded; and in the rest, simply declared the total want of all necessary information.

I have examined the cases in which they have given awards, and on the whole observe, with pleasure, that they have made liberal allowances to our claimants, and exacted a less degree of proof than would, probably, have been demanded by the commissioners under the treaty.

I have written to all the claimants interested in the class of cases, informing them of the awards in their respective causes, and stating the kind of proofs they should furnish where further evidence is required.

When I have obtained the consent of the King's proctor to those awards, which are absolute, I shall, through our minister, endeavor immediately to have some arrangement made for paying the sums allotted to the claimants respectively.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 133. [2d SESSION.

TUNIS.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 21, 1798.

UNITED STATES, February 21st, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Having received the original treaty concluded between the United States and the Government of Tunis, I lay it before the Senate of the United States, whether they advise and consent to its ratification.

JOHN ADAMS.

To all whom these presents shall come or be made known:

Whereas the underwritten David Humphreys hath been duly appointed commissioner plenipotentiary, by letters patent under the signature of the President and seal of the United States of America, dated the 30th day of March, 1795, for negotiating and concluding a treaty of amity and commerce with the most excellent and illustrious lord the Bey and supreme commander of the State of Tunis: whereas in conformity to the necessary authority committed to him therefor, he did constitute and appoint Joel Barlow an agent in the business aforesaid: and whereas the annexed treaty was, in consequence thereof, agreed upon, in the manner and at the time therein mentioned, through the intervention of Joseph Stephen Famin, invested with full powers for the said purpose:

Now know ye, that I, David Humphreys, commissioner plenipotentiary, aforesaid, do approve and conclude the said treaty and every article and clause therein contained, reserving the same, nevertheless, for the final ratification of the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the said United States.

In testimony whereof I have signed the same with my name and affixed thereto my seal, at the city of [L. S.] Madrid, this 14th day of November, 1797.

DAVID HUMPHREYS.

GOD IS INFINITE.

Under the auspices of the greatest, the most powerful, of all the Princes of the Ottoman nation, who reign upon the earth, our most glorious and most august Emperor, who commands the two lands and the two seas, Selim Kan the Victorious, son of the Sultan Moustafa, whose realm may God prosper until the end of ages, the support of Kings, the seal of justice, the Emperor of Emperors;

The most illustrious and most magnificent Prince Hamouda Pacha Bey, who commands the Odgiak of Tunis, the abode of happiness, and the most honored Ibrahim Dey, and Soliman, Aga of the Janissaries, and chief of the Divan, and all the elders of the Odgiak, and the most distinguished and honored Adams, President of the Congress of the United States of America, the most distinguished among those who profess the religion of the Messiah, of whom may the end be happy.

We have concluded between us the present treaty of peace and friendship, all the articles of which have been framed by the intervention of Joseph Stephen Famin, French merchant residing at Tunis, chargé d'affaires of the United States of America, which stipulations and conditions are comprised in twenty-three articles, written and expressed in such a manner as to leave no doubt of their contents, and in such way as not to be contravened.

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a perpetual and constant peace between the United States of America and the magnificent Pacha, Bey of Tunis; and also a permanent friendship, which shall more and more increase.

ART. 2. If a vessel of war of the two nations shall make prize of an enemy vessel, in which may be found effects, property, and subjects of the two contracting parties, the whole shall be restored; the Bey shall restore the property and subjects of the United States, and the latter shall make a reciprocal restoration; it being understood on both sides, that the just right of what is claimed shall be proved.

ART. 3. Merchandise belonging to any nation which may be at war with one of the contracting parties, and loaded on board of the vessels of the other, shall pass without molestation, and without any attempt being made to capture or detain it.

ART. 4. On both sides, sufficient passports shall be given to vessels, that they may be known and treated as friendly; and, considering the distance between the two countries, a term of eighteen months is given, within which term respect shall be paid to the said passports, without requiring the congé or document, (which at Tunis is called testa) but after the said term the congé shall be presented.

ART. 5. If the corsairs of Tunis shall meet at sea with ships of war of the United States having under their escort merchant vessels of their nation, they shall not be searched or molested; and in such case the commanders shall be believed upon their word, to exempt their ships from being visited, and to avoid quarantine; the American ships of war shall act in like manner towards merchant vessels escorted by the corsairs of Tunis.

ART. 6. If a Tunisian corsair shall meet with an American merchant vessel, and shall visit it with her boat, she shall not exact any thing, under pain of being severely punished; and, in like manner, if a vessel of war of the United States shall meet with a Tunisian merchant vessel, she shall observe the same rule. In case a slave shall take refuge on board an American vessel of war, the consul shall be required to cause him to be restored; and if any of their prisoners shall escape on board of the Tunisian vessels, they shall be restored: but if any slave shall take refuge in any American merchant vessel, and it shall be proved that the vessel has departed with the said slave, then he shall be returned or his ransom shall be paid.

ART. 7. An American citizen having purchased a prize vessel from our Odgiak, may sail with our passport, which we will deliver for the term of one year, by force of which our corsairs, which may meet with her, shall respect her; the consul, on his part, shall furnish her with a bill of sale, and, considering the distance of the two countries, this term shall suffice to obtain a passport in form; but after the expiration of this term, if our corsairs shall meet with her without the passport of the United States, she shall be stopped and declared good prize, as well the vessel as the cargo and crew.

ART. 8. If a vessel of one of the contracting parties shall be obliged to enter into a port of the other, and may have need of provisions and other articles, they shall be granted to her without any difficulty, at the price current of the place; and if such a vessel shall have suffered at sea, and shall have need of repairs, she shall be at liberty to unload and reload her cargo, without being obliged to pay any duty.

ART. 9. If, by accident, and by the permission of God, a vessel of one of the contracting parties shall be cast by tempest upon the coasts of the other, and shall be wrecked or otherwise damaged, the commandant of the place shall render all possible assistance for its preservation, without allowing any person to make any opposition; and the proprietor of the effects shall pay the costs of salvage to those who may have been employed.

ART. 10. In case a vessel of one of the contracting parties shall be attacked by an enemy under the cannon of the forts of the other party, she shall be protected and defended as much as possible; and when she shall set sail, no enemy shall be permitted to pursue her from the same port or any other neighboring port, for forty-eight hours after her departure.

ART. 11. When a vessel of war of one of the parties shall enter a port of the other, she shall be saluted by the forts, and shall return the salute, gun for gun, neither more nor less. But there shall be given by the parties, respectively, a barrel of powder for every gun which shall be required for the salute.

ART. 12. When citizens of the United States come within the Dependencies of Tunis, to carry on commerce, the same respect shall be paid them as the merchants of other nations enjoy; and if they choose to establish themselves within our ports, no opposition shall be made; and they shall be free to avail themselves of such interpreters as they may judge necessary, without any opposition thereto, in conformity with the usages of other nations; and if any Tunisian subject shall establish himself within the Dependencies of the United States, he shall be treated in the same manner. If a Tunisian subject shall freight an American vessel and load her with merchandise, and he shall afterwards wish to unlade it or ship the same on board of another vessel, we will not permit him, until the matter shall be decided by merchants, who shall make an award thereon, which shall be conclusive. No captain shall be detained against his will in port, except in the case of our ports being shut for the vessels of all other nations; which may extend to merchant vessels, but not to those of war. The subjects or citizens of the two nations shall be protected by the government or commandants of the places where they may be, and not by the other authorities of the country. In case the Government of Tunis shall have need of an American vessel for its service, the captain shall freight his vessel, and the freight shall be paid to him according to the agreement of the Government, without his being allowed to refuse.

ART. 13. If among the crews of merchant vessels of the United States, there shall be found subjects of our enemies, they shall not be made slaves, on condition that they do not exceed a third of the crew; and when they do exceed a third, they shall be made slaves; the present article only concerns the sailors, and not the passengers, who shall not be, in any manner, molested.

ART. 14. The citizens of the United States of America, who shall transport into the kingdom of Tunis the merchandise of their country, in the vessels of their nation, shall pay three per cent. duty. Such as may be laden by such citizens under a foreign flag coming from the United States, or elsewhere, shall pay ten per cent. duty. Such as may be laden by foreigners on board of American vessels coming from any place whatever, shall also pay ten per cent. duty. If any Tunisian merchant wishes to carry merchandise of his country, under any flag whatever, into the United States of America, and on his own account, he shall pay three per cent. duty.

ART. 15. It shall be free for the citizens of the United States to carry on what commerce they please in the kingdom of Tunis, without any opposition, and they shall be treated like the merchants of other nations; but they shall not carry on commerce in wine, nor in prohibited articles; and if any one shall be detected in a contraband trade, he shall be punished according to the laws of the country. The commandants of posts and castles shall take care that the captains and sailors shall not load prohibited articles: but if this should happen, those who shall not have contributed to the smuggling shall not be molested nor searched, no more than the vessel and cargo, but only the offender, who shall be demanded to be punished. No captain shall be obliged to receive merchandise on board of his vessel, nor to unlade the same, against his will, until his freight shall be paid.

ART. 16. The merchant vessels of the United States which shall cast anchor in the road of the Goulette, or any other port of the kingdom of Tunis, shall be obliged to pay the same anchorage for entry and departure which French vessels pay, to wit: seventeen piasters and an half, money of Tunis, for entry, if they import merchandise, and the same for departure, if they take away a cargo; but they shall not be obliged to pay anchorage if they arrive in ballast, and depart in the same manner.

ART. 17. Each of the contracting parties shall be at liberty to establish a consul in the dependencies of the other; and if such consul does not act in conformity with the usages of the country, like others, the Government of the place shall inform his Government of it, to the end that he may be changed and replaced; but he shall enjoy, as well for himself, as his family and suite, the protection of the Government; and he may import, for his own use, all his provisions and furniture without paying any duty; and if he shall import merchandise, which shall be lawful for him to do, he shall pay duty for it.

ART. 18. If the subjects or citizens of either of the contracting parties, being within the possessions of the other, contract debts, or enter into obligations, neither the consul, nor the nation, nor any subjects or citizens thereof, shall be in any manner responsible, except they or the consul shall have previously become bound in writing; and without this obligation in writing they cannot be called upon for indemnity or satisfaction.

ART. 19. In case of a citizen or subject of either of the contracting parties dying within the possessions of the other, the consul or the vekil shall take possession of his effects, (if he does not leave a will) of which he shall make an inventory, and the Government of the place shall have nothing to do therewith; and if there shall be no consul the effects shall be deposited in the hands of a confidential person of the place, taking an inventory of the whole, that they may eventually be delivered to those to whom they of right belong.

ART. 20. The consul shall be the judge in all disputes between his fellow-citizens or subjects, as also between all other persons who may be immediately under his protection; and in all cases wherein he shall require the assistance of the Government where he resides to sanction his decisions, it shall be granted to him.

ART. 21. If a citizen or subject of one of the parties shall kill, wound, or strike a citizen or subject of the other, justice shall be done according to the laws of the country where the offence shall be committed. The consul shall be present at the trial; but if any offender shall escape, the consul shall be in no manner responsible for it.

ART. 22. If a dispute or law-suit on commercial or other civil matters shall happen, the trial shall be had in the presence of the consul, or of a confidential person of his choice, who shall represent him, and endeavor to accommodate the difference which may have happened between the citizens or subjects of the two nations.

ART. 23. If any difference or dispute shall take place concerning the infraction of any article of the present treaty, on either side, peace and good harmony shall not be interrupted until a friendly application shall have been made for satisfaction; and resort shall not be had to arms therefor, except where such application shall have been rejected; and if war be then declared, the term of one year shall be allowed to the citizens or subjects of the contracting parties to arrange their affairs, and to withdraw themselves with their property.

The agreements and terms above concluded by the two contracting parties shall be punctually observed, with the will of the MOST HIGH. And for the maintenance and exact observance of the said agreements, we have caused their contents to be here transcribed, in the present month of REBIA ELUL, of the HEGIRA one thousand two hundred and twelve, corresponding with the month of August, of the Christian year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven.

Extract of a letter from Joel Barlow, Esquire, to Colonel David Humphreys, dated

ALGIERS, 23d May, 1797.

"The peace of Tunis is concluded, as I am confidently informed by Mr. Famin. The sickness of the First Secretary of State has prevented its being enregistered, signed, and sent me. It is on the footing of note No. 3, which I sent you by Captain O'Brien. I shall, at a proper time, send you copies of all my letters on this subject, to convince the Executive I could do no better."

[The note No. 3, above referred to, does not appear among the papers transmitted by Colonel Humphreys: but in Captain O'Brien's journal of his mission to Tunis, to negotiate, in conjunction with Mr. Famin, a peace with that regency, there are three notes of the terms of peace; the first, proposed by the Bey, containing military and naval stores, estimated at sixty-eight thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, but which would cost much more, also fifty thousand dollars in cash, and in presents twenty-two thousand, in the whole one hundred and forty thousand five hundred and fifty dollars. Captain O'Brien having rejected these terms, proposed others containing military and naval stores to the amount of twenty-nine thousand three hundred and fifty dollars, estimated, as before, much under the real cost to the United States, and cash and presents the same as proposed by the Bey, the whole amount, one hundred and one thousand three hundred and fifty dollars. These terms were rejected by the Bey, who then offered the following as definitive:]

TERMS No. 3.

Determined terms of Hamonda, Bashaw of Tunis, to make a peace with the United States of America.

26 guns, 12 pounders, carriages complete for sea.
14 guns, 8 pounders, do.

5,000 pine boards 3 inches, 1 foot broad, 12 and 16 feet long.
300 pieces ranging timber, pine, 9, 10, 11, 12 inches.
10 cables of 14 inches, 110, 120 fathoms each.
10 cables of 12 do.
15 hawsers, from 6, 7, 8 inches.
600 quintals Swedish iron in bars.
200 barrels of pitch.
200 barrels of rosin.
200 barrels of tar.
40 quintals of match rope.

[The above called]	Regalia, supposed amount in dollars,	35,000
	Peace, cost in money,	50,000
	Peace presents,	12,000
	Consuls' presents,	4,000
	Sackatappa, or secret service,	6,000
	Total amount in dollars,	107,000

Extract of a letter from Colonel Humphreys to the Secretary of State, dated at MADRID, November 14, 1797.

"I have the honor to transmit to you herewith, the original treaty lately concluded between the United States and Tunis, for the consideration of the Executive. And I cannot refrain from recommending, at the same time, to the favorable notice of Government, the persevering, intelligent, and honorable conduct of Mr. Joseph Stephen Famin, in the management of this tedious and difficult negotiation."

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, February 21, 1798.

The foregoing extracts from Mr. Barlow's and Colonel Humphreys' letters, and from Captain O'Brien's journal, are truly made.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 134. [2d SESSION.

TUNIS.

REPORTED TO CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 28, 1798.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the committee to whom was referred the consideration of the treaty with the Bey of Tunis, made the following report:

That a peace with the Bey of Tunis, after a variety of difficulties, and a tedious negotiation, has been at length concluded on the following terms, viz:

In money, - - - - - - - -	$50,000
In naval stores, called regalia, - - - - -	35,000
In peace presents, - - - - - - - -	12,000
In consuls' presents, - - - - - - - -	4,000
In sackatappa, or secret service money, - - - -	6,000
	$107,000

The greatest portion of which, it is supposed, has already been disbursed through the medium of a temporary loan, obtained on account of the United States.

The committee further report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the Treaty of Peace and Friendship between the United States of America and the Bey and Government of Tunis, concluded in the month of August, 1797, on condition that the fourteenth article of the said treaty, which relates to the duties on merchandise, (to be reciprocally paid by the citizens and subjects of the said parties, in their respective ports) shall be suspended.

That it be recommended to the President of the United States to enter into a friendly negotiation with the Bey and Government of Tunis, on the subject of the said article, so as to accommodate the provisions thereof, to the existing treaties of the United States with other nations.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 135. [2d SESSION.

AMERICAN SEAMEN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 1, 1798.

Report of the Secretary of State to the House of Representatives of the United States:

In obedience to their resolve of the 29th of November last, (which was received on the 9th instant) the Secretary of State lays before the House of Representatives, an abstract of all the returns* of registered American Seamen, and of the protests and returns* respecting Impressed Seamen, since the 17th of February, 1797, (the date of his last report) transmitted to him by the collectors of the different ports, pursuant to the directions of the act for the relief and protection of American Seamen; and copies or abstracts of such communications from the agents employed by virtue of the said act, in foreign ports, as have been received.

To these the Secretary adds sundry important communications, on the same subject, from Mr. King, the minister of the United States at London.

Returns of impressments and detentions made by the collectors, in pursuance of the act for the relief and protection of American seamen, which have been received by the Secretary of State, since his communication of the 17th February, 1797, to the Committee of the House of Representatives, appointed to inquire into the operation of the said act.

"The Collector of Dighton returns, for the quarter ending with the 30th of June, 1797, that "he has not received any report that a seaman has been impressed or detained abroad."

The Collector of Ipswich returns, for the quarter ending with the 31st of March, "that there does not appear to have been any impressments or detentions of American seamen by any foreign power to have taken place, no protests of masters of vessels having been made, during the above period, in his office." And for the succeeding quarter he returns in like manner.

The Collector for the district of Providence returns as follows:

"The following appear, by the declarations of the masters, to be all the instances of impressment and detention of men belonging to vessels of the United States, which have entered at this port in the first quarter of the present year, 1797.

"James Brown and John Cloak, British subjects, impressed off the Grand Key, Bahamas, and carried on board the British ship of war Dictator, commanded by —— Weston, Esquire, from on board the brigantine Adventure, Jeremiah Greenman, master.

"The mate and three seamen, citizens of the United States, taken out of the sloop Polly and Betsey, Benjamin E. Gorten, master, by a small French Privateer, and carried with the sloop into Guadaloupe, but restored after several days imprisonment: protest transmitted.

"Thomas Crandall, of Maryland, (having no protection) impressed from on board the brigantine Sukey, William Thornton, master, by the British sloop of war, the Lark, commanded by —— Ogilvie, Esquire, off Cape François."

The Collector of Providence returns, for the second quarter of 1797, that "the brigantine Lydia, John Cooke, master, from Aux Cayes, entered on the 26th April, 1797, had one seaman impressed and carried on board of the British ship Abbicore, —— Foster, commander: protest transmitted.

"Sloop Lark, Charles Remington, master, from Tobago, had the mate taken and detained three days.

"Ship Macy, Samuel Parkard, master, from Havana, entered on the 27th of April, had one seaman impressed.

"Sloop Hawk, Holden Langford, master, from Jamaica, entered on the 16th May, had two seamen impressed."

The Collector of Providence returns, for the third quarter of 1797, that "Samuel Brown, a negro man, belonging to Philadelphia, was impressed on the 16th of July, 1797, from on board of the schooner Betsey of this port, Major F. Bowler, master, on her passage from Turk's Island, by a British frigate of thirty-six guns, her name and the commander's unknown; and of which a protest was made agreeably to law.

"Francis Gibbons, a native of France, married and resident at New London, in Connecticut, was taken by the French authority at Rochefort, from on board the ship Edward, of this port, Metcalf Bowler, master."

The Collector for Providence returns, for the fourth quarter of 1797, "that none of the mariners belonging to the vessels entered at this port, during the last quarter of the year 1797, have been impressed or detained, while on their respective voyages."

The Collector of Annapolis returns, on the 18th of April, 1797, "that there have been no reports made to his office, of any seamen being impressed by any of the British ships of war since the passing of the act for the relief and protection of American seamen."

The Collector of Wilmington, North Carolina returns, "that there were no impressments from the 1st October, 1796, to the 31st March, 1797."

The returns of the Collectors of New York and Pennsylvania are annexed

Communications from David Lenox, Esquire, Agent for procuring the release of impressed American Seamen, in Great Britain.

LONDON, July 1st, 1797.

SIR:

The letter which I had the honor to write you the 12th instant, would inform you of my arrival here, and of an arrangement being in contemplation, which had for its object a more direct line than had hitherto been practised, of affording relief to our unfortunate seamen, who might be impressed or detained on board His Britannic Majesty's fleet; this has been effected, and applications in future are to be made by me, through Mr. Nepean, first secretary to the Admiralty. By the former mode, applications went from our minister to Lord Grenville, by him they were referred to the Lords of the Admiralty, and they gave directions to a secretary, to be forwarded to the commanders of the different ships; by this circuitous route, no doubt can be entertained that many omissions took place, and that to this cause may be attributed the many cases of our seamen to which no kind of attention has been paid: these will appear by the abstract lately sent you by Mr. King. I am preparing to make a renewal of all these cases, the result of which I will have the honor to transmit to you when I shall have it in my power. Since my arrival I have made application for eleven seamen, among whom there appeared no recent instance of impressment, except in the case of two men who were picked up here by the press gang; one of them was liberated on my interference, the other is yet detained on the supposition of his being a British subject. I find considerable difficulties will often arise from defects in our laws with respect to seamen. By act of Congress, of the 14th April, 1792, the consuls are authorized, in certain cases, to allow twelve cents per diem to our seamen; but I find the relief from this provision has been small indeed. The same law obliges masters of vessels to take on board seamen on the application of consuls, but this has seldom been enforced; and Mr. Johnson, consul at this port, has informed me that such applications have been very generally treated with contempt; however, I have requested him to renew the trial when cases shall occur, having no kind of doubt in my own mind, that on proof being sent to America, the penalty would be recovered, and an example or two would, in my opinion, have a good effect. My experience does not yet furnish me with sufficient grounds to point out all the defects of our laws on this subject; but Mr. King has a thorough knowledge of the business, and, I have been informed, has given every information; I shall, however, take the liberty to convey from time to time such ideas as may occur to me in the course of my official communications.

In compliance with my instructions, I have opened a correspondence with all the American consuls in the different European ports, and have informed them of my establishment here. With respect to that part which refers to my visiting "those ports and places which are the principal scenes for impressing or detaining American seamen," Mr. King is of opinion with me, that no good would result from it, for the commanders of vessels would not allow me, as matter of right, to go on board their ships; if, however, I find that any good can be expected, I will certainly make the attempt. That part which respects protections to our seamen, I much fear cannot be accomplished; I have seen the correspondence between Mr. King and Lord Grenville on this subject, and there appears unsurmountable obstacles on their part; I shall, however, attempt, at least, to establish a form which may protect our seamen once discharged from future impressment, but even this I find liable to objections, and I believe the fact is they are afraid to trust us. I have had great assistance from Mr. King since my arrival in arranging my business; and, from the general disposition I have found in every person with whom I have had to confer, I have reason to hope that I shall be able to conduct the business with which I am entrusted, with benefit to my country and satisfaction to myself.

I have the honor to be, &c. &c. &c.

LONDON, July 17th, 1797.

SIR:

Since I had the honor to write you the 1st instant, (copy of which is enclosed) nothing of consequence has occured in my official situation. On the 12th instant I renewed an application for all seamen who appeared, from documents in my possession, to be still detained on board His Britannic Majesty's fleet; and I now do myself the honor to forward you a copy of it. I beg leave, however, to observe that, I have reason to believe some of these men may have been discharged; yet, as it does not appear with certainty, I conceived it my duty to include the whole. As these men are now deprived of every kind of proof of their citizenship, and is a pretext for their being detained, I would suggest the propriety of some general publication to urge their friends to forward me the best proof in their power: those who can be furnished with extracts from church registers, attested by a notary, and certified by a British consul, will be the best, and such as I conceive will soon put it in my power to restore them to their country and friends: where this is impracticable, the best that can be obtained. My applications for impressed seamen now amount to twenty-six, and eight have applied to me who have been discharged; of these I keep a regular register, extracts from which I shall forward at stated periods.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

D. LENOX.

The Hon. TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq.

A List of Seamen, representing themselves to be American citizens, impressed and detained on board His Britannic Majesty's fleets, whose discharge has been required by the Honorable Thomas Pinckney, Esq. late minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America at the Court of London, and now renewed by David Lenox, agent, residing in Great Britain, for the relief and protection of American seamen.

In all, two hundred and eighty-seven seamen, who appear, from documents in my possession, not to have been discharged on the application of Mr. King, and one hundred and fourteen on the application of Mr. Pinckney, making, in the whole, four hundred and one.

Mr. Lenox begs leave to remark, that there appears, in several instances, the same name, but as it is possible different persons may be meant, he conceives it his duty to mention them, but in doing this, he hopes no improper motive will be imputed to him.

D. LENOX,
Agent for the relief and protection of American Seamen.

LONDON, 12*th July*, 1797.

Abstract of the communications from Silas Talbot, Esq. Agent in the West Indies for procuring the release of impressed American seamen; to which are annexed copies of several of his letters, and the letters of Mr. Henry Craig, his Agent at Martinique.

On the 2d of September, 1796, he arrived at Barbadoes; but finding nothing there to claim his official attention, he proceeded for Martinique, and arrived at Fort Royal on the 28th of the same month. Here he had an interview with Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, in which he explained to him the object of his mission. The Admiral appeared altogether unaccommodating, and observed that, if he released any seamen who might be claimed, he must have unequivocal proof of their citizenship, and that he would not, in any case, receive their own attestation. By Admiral Parker he was referred to Admiral Harvey, who appeared perfectly well disposed; and, before Mr. Talbot left his ship, the latter assured him he was willing to enter into an inquiry, on the most liberal footing, and that all Americans should be released from the ships under his immediate command. Mr. Talbot having written to him on the 4th and 11th of October, requesting, among other things, liberty to visit the British ships of war in port, with the view of ascertaining such among the crews as were Americans, he returned for answer, "that, on the arrival of such of His Majesty's ships and vessels which were under his immediate command, every necessary inquiry should be made on the circumstances stated by Mr. Talbot, in respect to the impressing and detaining of seamen being subjects of the American States; and, in such cases, orders would be given for their immediate discharge; that he might rest assured that the most positive orders would be given to the captains and commanders of King's ships and vessels not to impress American seamen, and to pay due regard to the protections with which they may be furnished." With respect to the request to be permitted to visit the British ships, for the purpose of examining their crews, he referred Mr. Talbot to the Commander-in-chief, Sir Hyde Parker; but, on the 11th of October, Mr. Talbot had written to Sir Hyde, requesting him to cause an inquiry to be made for impressed Americans, and to respect their protections. On the next day, Sir Hyde answered him, declining to proceed "upon such slight grounds," requiring him to "identify particular men," and "produce incontestable proof that the individual is a citizen of America, upon which he should determine how to act;" and informing him that, "agreeably to his request, he should issue orders that no American seaman should be impressed, and that due regard should be paid to the protections of all American seamen." From this answer, connected with the verbal conference he had before had with Sir Hyde, Mr. Talbot deemed it useless to renew with him the request to be permitted to search for Americans among the crews of the fleet.

On the 20th of October, 1796, Mr Talbot writes, from St. Pierre, Martinique, that he had received good information, that, after his departure, a number of Americans were released from the ships of war lying at Fort Royal Bay the 14th preceding, and that they had also been paid off. The number he had not ascertained, but three of them were from Admiral Parker's ship.

On the 7th of November, 1796, he writes, from Antigua, that he had been on board of the Bull Dog, commanded by Captain Ryves, who treated him with great politeness, and showed him Admiral Harvey's orders for releasing five Americans, who were on board the ship, with which orders he said he intended to comply, and to pay them their wages and prize money.

Mr. Talbot intending to go to Jamaica, and deeming it of great consequence to have an agent under him permanently residing at Martinique, which is the usual resort of all the vessels appointed to watch and protect the Leeward Islands and a part of the continent, on the 12th of November, 1796, he appointed Mr. Henry Craig, an American, formerly of Baltimore, for that purpose, but without assigning him any emolument; as Mr. Craig was willing, through motives of attachment to his country, to undertake, without reward, the fulfilment of this service.

A copy of his letter, dated at St. Kitts, 19th November, 1796, is annexed, marked No. 1.

On the 22d of December, 1796, he writes, from Kingston, Jamaica, that he had had an interview with Admiral Bligh, at Fort Royal, who received him with politeness, told him that, if he could find any impressed Americans on board the vessels then in port, they should be discharged, and sent his captain (Rutherford) with him on board the several vessels. But, previous to their leaving the Admiral's ship, Mr. Talbot informed him that he had the names of two Americans who were on board his ship. The Admiral immediately ordered them to be called into the cabin: when they came in, they produced certificates, from the collector of the State of Georgia, that they had sworn before him that they were citizens of the United States; but, on account of their distance from home, the regular proof could not be obtained; which was deemed insufficient, and they were ordered back to their duty. From the Resource Mr. Talbot procured the release of two Americans. He afterwards went on board a tender, which had, a few days before, impressed three men from on board an American brig. The captain of the tender refusing to deliver them up, Captain Rutherford took them to the Admiral. One of the men was an American, the second a Swede, and the third an Italian. It was with considerable difficulty the Admiral was prevailed upon to restore the American, as the protection with which he was furnished was from a notary public, in which kind of evidence of citizenship he said he could place no faith. The Swede was given up without the least hesitation. The Italian having entered, the Admiral thought he should have his choice, to stay in the King's service, or enter again the American brig. Mr. Talbot consenting to this, the man chose the former. From the Mermaid he procured the release of one seaman. On going on board the Quebec, the captain refused to see him, and he was obliged to leave her without effecting any thing. Having received information of three more Americans being on board the Resource, he applied to the captain for their release, who denied that he had any such men on board. Mr. Talbot now addressed himself to Admiral Bligh, to whom he related the manner in which he had been treated on board the Quebec, and the refusal of the captain of the Resource to deliver up the three Americans; whereupon, the captains of both those vessels were sent for, together with the men he wanted to see, and two of them were released.

A copy of his letter, dated at Cape Nicholas Mole, 21st January, 1797, is annexed, marked No. 2.

On the 28th January, 1797, he enclosed to Sir Hyde Parker a list of impressed American seamen, partly collected by himself, and partly furnished by the Department of State, accompanied by such proofs of the citizenship of some of them, as he was possessed of, and requested their release. In many cases, Mr. Talbot believed the proof to be complete. Nevertheless, nothing was done in consequence of it; and, on the 3d March following, Sir Hyde wrote him, that, "in no one instance, have proofs been produced, relative to the names of those you have been pleased to style citizens of America, sufficient to authorize me to discharge the individuals from His Majesty's service."

On the 4th March, 1797, Mr. Talbot writes from the Mole of St. Nicholas, that, for the two months he had been at St. Domingo, he had heard only of one real American being impressed, and he had not a protection; and that only one neutral subject had been impressed at that port, who had not been given up since his arrival.

Copies of his letters of the 22d April, 7th May, 4th July, 17th October, 9th November, and 12th December, 1797, are annexed, marked respectively from No. 3 to No. 8, inclusively.

A letter from Mr. Henry Craig, the agent at Martinique, dated on the 2d February, 1797, and an extract from another, dated 16th September, 1797, are annexed, marked respectively Nos. 9 and 10.

No. 1.

BASSETERRE, ST. CHRISTOPHER'S, November 19, 1796.

SIR:

I left Antigua the 16th, and the next day landed at Nevis, where I tarried one day, and then hired a small vessel to bring me to this island.

I have not yet had time to see the Commander-in-chief, as he lives at the distance of twelve miles from this place, which is the metropolis of the island.

There is not, at this time, any men of war at this island, or at Nevis; but, perhaps, some may return into port before I leave the place.

Previous to my leaving Antigua, I had an interview with Captain Metford, who is the commanding officer of the four ships that are now lying at English Harbor, at Antigua. The Commodore (as he is generally styled) told me that he had, some time since, received Admiral Harvey's orders to discharge every American, if any were on board his ship, and that similar orders from the Admiral had been received by the several captains under his immediate command. He gave me his word that there was not one American left on board his ship, and said that he had no reason to think but that the order had been strictly complied with on board the other ships; but, for greater certainty, and agreeable to my desire, he said he would immediately make an inquiry on board each ship, and, if any Americans were found on board (which he believed would not be the case) they should be discharged.

I have good reason to believe, sir, that the business relative to our seamen among the Windward Islands is now on a good footing; as I find that Admiral Harvey has sent forth his orders to the captains and commanders of His Majesty's ships and vessels of war, in every direction, to release all Americans which they may have on board, and not to impress any of them in future. The commander of a tender named Lady Bickerton, which is in the impress service, told me, on board the Bickerton, that his orders were, not to impress any American. I am confident that there has not been one American impressed since my arrival at Martinique, unless it may have been done by some of the ships at distant stations, which might not, at the time, have received the Admiral's orders on that subject. But, with all the inquiry I have been able to make, I have not heard of one that has been disturbed. I shall embrace the first opportunity of a passage to Jamaica.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient humble servant,

SILAS TALBOT.

Honorable TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State.

ST. NICHOLAS MOLE, in the Island of St. Domingo, January 21, 1797.

SIR:

My last letter to you, dated at Kingston, Jamaica, the 22d of December, will fully explain every circumstance of note, relative to my mission, after leaving the island of St. Christopher's. For want of a direct opportunity, the letter above alluded to, and a duplicate thereof, I put into the hands of a merchant in Kingston, to be forwarded to America, in different vessels. I took passage and sailed from Jamaica, the first of this month, in a vessel bound to Port-au-Prince, at which place Major General Forbes, the Commander-in-chief of His Majesty's land forces at this island, keeps his head quarters. The object of my going to Port-au-Prince was to see the General; but it so happened that, at the moment of my arrival there, the General was embarking for this place. Being thus disappointed, I procured another passage to this port, where I arrived the 18th instant. Soon after landing, I went to pay my respects to the Major General. But I have not as yet had time to prepare my business to lay before Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, therefore have nothing very material to communicate.

The law requires of me to render an account of all impressments and detentions whatever of our seamen to the Executive of the United States, and I make no doubt but that it may have been thought strange that no particular information of that kind has come to hand from me. But it is impossible for me to obtain the information in question, unless the several masters of the American vessels comply with the law on their part, in that of forwarding to me protests in cases where their men have been impressed, and which has never been the case but in one instance, and that since my last to you.

So many and so different have been the modes of giving our seamen protection, that it is not to be wondered at, if the British officers should be mistrustful of their authority or validity.

Protections have been given, and many are still produced, from judges of the several courts, notary publics, justices of the peace, mayors of cities, secretaries of the individual States, and of the United States, consuls abroad, governors of the several States, and lastly from the several collectors. The act authorizing the collectors, under certain restrictions, to give protections, does not have the salutary effect which was probably contemplated by Congress.

In short, I am inclined to think that it has done more hurt than good; because it has destroyed all respect for former protections; and the act requires such kind of proof to be made to the collectors as is frequently impossible for seamen to procure, in case they sail from any port in America distant from the place of their nativity; for instance, suppose a man was born in Hampshire, but sails out of Philadelphia, or some more southern port, in which case it is very likely he cannot produce to the collector such evidence as the law requires to enable him to obtain his protection, and therefore he ventures again and again with his old Notary Public's protection, or no protection at all, until at last he is impressed, and in that case the difficulty is great in obtaining his release, and perhaps insurmountable. If application is made for his discharge, and his protection offered as a proof of his citizenship, his Majesty's officers will very probably say, that, as your Congress have adopted a new mode of giving out protections, and requiring a proof of citizenship first to be produced, affords to us a conviction that the old protections ought not to be respected, which they say have been fraudulently obtained in more than four thousand instances. But while I am stating the difficulty in obtaining protections, agreeably to the last act, for that part of our seamen who sailed out of ports distant from the place of their nativity, yet I do not wish to be understood as recommending any change in the mode of obtaining them, because every such alteration would tend to destroy their credibility. But if any mode could be devised to prohibit the masters of American vessels from shipping any American citizens without protections, agreeably to the late act of Congress, it surely would be of great service. For it is much easier to prevent the evil in question, than to remedy it by any attempt to restore the unfortunate prisoners to their liberty. If masters were by law prohibited, under a heavy penalty, from carrying American citizens to sea without proper protections, all such of our seamen as could not obtain a protection, in a distant port, from the place where they were born or naturalized, they would, in a short time, for want of employ, return to the place of their nativity; and then suitable protections might be had; because they could undoubtedly produce the necessary proof required by law. I am aware that a measure of this kind would occasion some little trouble to a number of that class of our citizens; but it would be, in my opinion, infinitely better for them and the United States, that they should be thus restrained, than to be detained on board ships of war. To convince you, sir, how necessary it is to restrain this thoughtless class of our citizens, permit me to observe, that, at this day, it is not uncommon to find our vessels in these ports, the crews of which are absolutely born in the American States, and yet not one of them can produce a protection of any sort; and parts of the crews of other vessels are frequently found in like predicament; which shows that this useful class of our citizens ought to be taken care of, since they will not take care of themselves.

I am, sir, with perfect respect, your humble servant,

SILAS TALBOT.

No. 3.

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, 22*d April*, 1797.

SIR:

In my last letter, dated March the 4th, I informed you of all that passed between Admiral Sir Hyde Parker and myself at the Mole, relative to the detention of American seamen, and of my determination to leave that place and to repair to Jamaica, for the purpose of endeavoring to relieve our seamen, by writs of Habeas Corpus.

In pursuance of that plan of removing the Americans from ships of war, I left Cape St. Nichola Mole the 5th of March, and arrived at Kingston the 8th of the same month. There were then lying at Port Royal, several ships of war, and in a few days more came in, making in all nine sail; namely, the Canada, Hermione, Experiment, Ambuscade, Proselyte, La Tourterelle. Jamaica, Renommé, Laurel, and Montego Bay. Having already, and when at St. Domingo, made application, first to the captain, and then to Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, to have five Americans discharged that were detained on board the Hermione, and being refused by both, I did not hesitate to apply for a writ of Habeas Corpus to serve on Captain Pigot of the Hermione, and at the same time obtained the like writs for the captains of the Renommé and La Tourterelle, for one American on board each ship. The writs were served, and the men produced before the judge that granted the writ. The King's Solicitor opposed their being released, but the judge discharged all of them. Having now free access to those men that were discharged, I learnt that there were still four Americans on board the Hermione. I therefore applied and obtained another writ, and had it served on the captain, and the four men were also discharged. Having now obtained a discharge for nine that were on board the Hermione, the other captains began to be somewhat alarmed, as I supposed, and they gave out that I need not take out writs against them, for that they would discharge all the Americans upon my application, and giving proof of their citizenship. Being informed of this, I went down to Port Royal for the purpose of visiting all the ships in port; and in the first place I attempted to go on board the Canada, of seventy-four guns, commanded by Commodore Bowen; but on my approaching the ship, they on board ordered me to keep off, and they did not then suffer me to come alongside. From the Canada they asked me what I wanted: I answered that I had business with the Commodore: they said he was not on board; I then requested of them to be so kind as to inform me where I might find him: they answered at the dockyard: on which I thanked them, and then went on shore at the dockyard, where I found the Commodore and introduced myself to him, and made known my business; he was perfectly polite to me, and immediately asked me to go on board the Canada with him: I accepted of the invitation, and after we were on board, the men that I wanted to see were ordered into the cabin; and after examination, the Commodore agreed to discharge all of them, they being six in number, and I am confident there were not any more on board that ship. During my stay every politeness was shown to me by the Commodore, and he insisted on my coming on board the next day to dine with him, adding that he was going to have a party on board at dinner, it being the 12th of April, which is the day that Admiral Rodney gained a victory over the French fleet, and which day is much celebrated at this island. Finding him so importunate, I engaged and dined with him accordingly.

Some days after my visit on board the Canada, I went on board the Montego Bay, and the captain of that vessel, after some conversation, gave me up all the Americans that he had on board, they being six in number. In two or three days after I went on board the La Tourterelle and the Renommé, and was well treated by the captains of those vessels; but I could not prevail on them to release the Americans on board their ships, alleging that they could not do it without Sir Hyde Parker's orders; and that they asked me to write to him on the subject, and that they would willingly join with me in my representation. I told them candidly that I could not think of applying to Sir Hyde for the release of the men in question; and I put the question to them whether they would release the men: they answered, that they were not warranted in doing it. I then took leave; and again had recourse to writs of Habeas Corpus; and by that means eleven men were brought before the chief judge, and ten of them were discharged: in one case we failed in evidence. Yesterday I went on board the Proselyte and Jamaica, and was perfectly well received by the captains of those ships; and they released all the men that I applied for. The whole number that I have caused to be discharged from his Britannic Majesty's ships of war, in this quarter, since the date of my last to you, are forty-seven, and whose names are contained in the enclosed list. I have received a letter from Mr. Henry Craig, my assistant agent at Martinique. He informs me that he has obtained the discharge of forty-three Americans: he does not mention their names, but states the names of the American vessels that they had been taken out of, and the number so impressed from each vessel. If we add the number released to the Windward to the number so set at liberty here, as before mentioned, it will make in the whole ninety men.

I shall enclose you a copy of Messrs. Farmer and Moore's account for transacting the legal business, by which you will be able to form an opinion of the propriety of pursuing the mode of taking out writs where the men cannot be removed otherwise.

I find that the whole amount of my account against the United States, up to this day, is about five hundred dollars.

I have and shall continue to be as economical as possible; but there is no moving or living here without very great expense; and so many of our men have been discharged of late, that there is not a sufficient number of American vessels to employ all of them immediately, so that some expense will accrue for their support. There are also a few Americans here that have been left on shore sick, and they are now in a miserable condition; all of whom implore assistance from me.

Soon after my arrival at Jamaica, I was informed that a letter that was directed to you, and found on board Captain Latimore, had been lodged in the Admiralty office; I therefore made application for it and obtained a copy of the letter, a duplicate of which is herewith enclosed.

I have the honor to be, &c.

SIR:

I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your favor, dated March the 10th. The approbation you have been pleased to express of my conduct, in the mission which I have been honored with, affords me the highest satisfaction; and happy shall I be if my constant exertions may continue to meet your concurrence.

In my letter to you of the 22d of last month, was enclosed a list of Americans that I had caused to be released since my arrival at this island. Since the date of which I have obtained a discharge for eight more of our citizens, the names of whom shall be inserted at the bottom.

The business I am here entrusted with is perplexing beyond description, and requires all the fortitude and patience which I am capable of exercising. To the unspeakable difficulty I have almost daily to encounter with His Majesty's naval officers, (many of whom are not the most pleasant nor the most reasonable beings) I have great trouble with our seamen. Their applications to me are incessant, and I am employed both by night and day. It seems as if nearly one half of our seamen come out from America without protections. When they arrive in these seas, then their fears come on them; and those that escape being impressed before they land, will not fail to apply to me for a protection the moment their foot is on shore, and my quarters are almost continually surrounded with them; and if they are denied a protection from me for want of proof, that same fear will urge their repeated applications, until I am almost sickened with their importunity.

I have the honor to be, &c.

SILAS TALBOT.

P. S. The names of those discharged since my last, are—

James Hines,	John Snow,	Peter Mommet.

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, 4th July, 1797.

SIR:

My letters of 22d April and 7th of May last will have informed you of my having recourse to writs of habeas corpus to release our seamen from British ships of war, and of the number so released by that means; to which five more may now be added, that have been, in like manner, discharged, making up the number of sixty, in all.

I have now to inform you that there is a total stop put to all the effectual means that I have been able to devise for the release of our citizens so impressed, and, from the appearance of things, I am of the opinion that no more seamen will be discharged during the time that Admiral Sir Hyde Parker may have the command in these seas.

Admiral Sir Hyde having gained information that my applications to the civil authority of this island to obtain the release of such American citizens as were found to be detained on board His Majesty's ships of war, had been attended with some success; he immediately issued a general order to all captains and commanders of ships and vessels of war, directing them not to obey any writ of habeas corpus, nor suffer any man to leave their ships in consequence of any such writ. Since the above mentioned order was issued, writs have been obtained against Captain Elphinstone, of the Tartar frigate, to produce three Americans, named in the writ, before the Chief Justice; and against Captain Foster of the Albicore, to produce four, and also against Captain Otway of the Ceres frigate, to produce twenty Americans in like manner, before the Chief Justice. All those writs were served, but no one of them was obeyed. Attachments against the said captains have been ordered by the court, and a writ of attachment against Captain Otway was taken out fifteen days since. But the Marshal has not been able, as he says, to serve it on Captain Otway; and from all that I can learn, there is not any probability, that he will serve the writ; so that the law in this island, it seems, cannot be administered to the relief of American citizens, who are held in British slavery, many of whom, as they write to me from on board Captain Otway's ship, have been brought to the gangway and whipped for writing to their agent to try to get them discharged.

It is thought that the admiral has wrote to the governor of this island on the foregoing subject, as it is a fact that the governor has so far interfered in the business, as to hold several conferences with the Chief Justice on the business, the result of which is not known to me. The officers of the navy now consider themselves above the law, and they yesterday came up into Kingston harbor in the day time, and impressed considerable numbers of Americans, and took them down to Port Royal, notwithstanding they were furnished with protections. Their petitions and letters reach me daily, and sorry I am to say, that I cannot render them the services they request of me, relative to obtaining their discharge.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

SILAS TALBOT.

Honorable TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq. Secretary of State.

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, 17th October, 1797.

SIR:

In my last to you, of the 4th July, I mentioned the total stop that was put to the release of our seamen in this quarter, from British ships of war, by means of an order from Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, to the commanders of ships and vessels of war. I now enclose for your information, a copy of the order alluded to in said letter. There has not, however, been any very considerable cause of complaint, on account of impressing our seamen, for more than two months past, at this island. I have lately received a letter, under date of the 5th August, from Mr. Henry Craig, my assistant at Martinique, by which it appears that Admiral Harvey continues well disposed towards us: Mr. Craig's letter contains the following paragraph: "I am happy to inform you that I have been extremely fortunate in obtaining the release of many American sailors from British armed vessels; and indeed, in all cases where there was any probable cause to suppose that the person claimed was a citizen of the United States, they have been immediately released; and in all applications to Admiral Harvey, I have found the most cordial good wishes towards the Americans. We have several times petitioned for a convoy to protect the American trade through the islands, which was always readily granted."

I am under the necessity of drawing a bill of exchange of this date, for one thousand dollars, in favor of James Kent, esquire, of New York, which I trust you will be pleased to honor, at sight, and place to account of my salary. Having expended something more on the public account than the amount of one thousand dollars already received, I shall be obliged to draw for one thousand dollars more, so soon as I can find an opportunity to dispose of such a draft.

I have the pleasure to be, with great respect and esteem, sir, your obedient humble servant,

SILAS TALBOT.

Honorable TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State of the United States.

By Sir Hyde Parker, Knt. Vice Admiral of the Red, and Commander in Chief of His Majesty's ships and vessels employed at and about Jamaica.

Whereas the discharging of men from His Majesty's ships and vessels under my command, in consequence of writs of habeas corpus, is attended with the utmost inconvenience, and disadvantageous to the public service committed to my care.

You are hereby required and directed never in future to discharge any man from the ship you command, in consequence of any writ of habeas corpus, till such writ is referred to me as Commander-in-chief, (a rule observed by all the judges in England) and my orders given in consequence thereof.

Given on board the Queen, Cape Nichola Mole, 8th May, 1797.

H. PARKER.

To the Captains, Commanders, &c. of all His Majesty's ships that may at any time be at Jamaica.

By command of the Vice Admiral,

P. OSBORN.

KINGSTON, (Jamaica) 9th November, 1797.

As to our seamen, I have not heard that any of them have been detained since my last. Some few have been laid hold of, but on producing their protections from me, they were immediately released. It is to be wished that they all might come out provided with suitable protections, because, in that case, I think they would not be interrupted in their lawful employ.

No. 8.

KINGSTON, JAMAICA, December 12, 1797.

SIR:

Nothing of moment has occurred in this quarter of the West Indies, relative to our seamen since my last to you, nor have I heard of one American seaman being impressed out of any vessel for the space of some months past. There was, however, not long ago, two of our men taken when on shore, at some sailor quarters in company with a number of British seamen, and carried on board the Maidstone frigate. On my receiving the information, I went to Captain Mathews, who commands that ship, and who was then on shore. After an explanation with the captain, I requested of him to release the said men, to which he readily consented, and he gave me his word that the men should be discharged on his going on board. The Maidstone sailed the next day, but whether the men were discharged I cannot say, nor was it easily to be ascertained, as the said men did not belong to any particular vessel, but were stragglers unknown to me personally, and myself unknown to them, as I suppose.

While I reflect, sir, with pleasure on the check that is put to impressing our seamen, and the total discharge of all that were formerly on board Admiral Harvey's division to windward; yet I feel great anxiety for those impressed a long time since, and who are still detained on board ships of war, that compose Admiral Parker's squadron on this station, more especially as there is not any appearance of probability of their being released, so long as Admiral Parker has the command in these seas. If Sir Hyde should be ordered off from this station, and the command devolve upon Admiral Bligh, I have reason to expect that in such case perfect justice would be done to our representations on the subject in question. Nor is it less distressing when we contemplate the hardship, the cruel and inhuman manner our seamen are frequently treated by the French. Every little while some of those of our unfortunate men are coming in like straggling soldiers after a battle and defeat, some of whom, when taken, are stripped naked, drubbed, and then put into a small boat to make the shore or perish in the sea; and some are retaken by British ships and brought in: others make their escape by one means or another; but in all cases they are miserably poor, both in purse and appearance.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, &c.

SILAS TALBOT.

Secretary of State of the United States of America.

MARTINIQUE, February 2, 1797.

SIR:

Having been appointed by Colonel Talbot resident agent for the relief of impressed American citizens I now take the liberty to enclose you Captain Inchbald Goodrich's protest against Captain Newman of the Ceres frigate.

On the 22 ult. the Ceres anchored in this bay, and at three o'clock, A. M. commenced a severe impress among the shipping in this harbor. In this business they collected about 100 men, 50 of whom were Americans. I waited on Captain Newman, and urged the necessity of my seeing the men examined, which he finally agreed to, and they were all released, those named in the protest excepted.

I have written to Colonel Talbot at Jamaica, where the Ceres is stationed, and have no doubt but he will procure their release.

I have the honor to be, yours respectfully,

HENRY CRAIG.

To the Secretary of State.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Henry Craig, dated 16th September, 1797, to the Secretary of State.

When Colonel Talbot was in this colony, he requested, that, in order to carry the views of Government into effect, I would accept of the appointment of resident agent for the relief of American seamen, who were impressed or in any way destitute of the necessaries of life.

This being the rendezvous of the British navy, and my general acquaintance with the officers of that department, induced me to accept of this undertaking, hoping that I should be enabled to alleviate the distress of my unfortunate countrymen; nor have I been disappointed, having released more than one hundred from the different ships on this station.

I have always found the most decided compliance in Rear-Admiral Harvey to release any person who had any pretensions to citizenship of the United States.

Extracts from the correspondence of Rufus King, Esq. Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, at London.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, dated LONDON, September 8, 1796.

"Mr. Trumbull's appointment as the fifth commission in the capture questions, has prevented his acceptance of the agency for the relief and protection of our seamen. His duties must devolve on me for the present.

"A practice has obtained among our consuls to grant certificates of citizenship, or protections, as they are called, to our seamen; and I am informed that they have been efficacious in securing those who possessed them from impressment. Some abuses were unavoidable, and it is said have been discovered; in consequence of which, these consular certificates have in some instances been disregarded; and in a late conference with Lord Grenville, he asked me, whether our laws, or the President's instructions, gave to our consuls authority to grant these certificates; observing that it was not within the ordinary functions of consuls to issue documents of this nature. I told his Lordship that I would inquire concerning the authority of our consuls, and give him an answer. As the practice of granting these certificates is not peculiar to our consuls, but common with the consuls of other nations, and as our sailors are frequently found here without a certificate of citizenship, whereby they are exposed to impressment, I cannot take upon myself to instruct our consuls to discontinue the practice, though I should find no positive law or instruction that authorizes it."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, to Mr. King, dated

OCTOBER 26, 1796.

"The general and uniform practice of our consuls to give certificates of citizenship, or protections, to our seamen, may I think be very well considered as sanctioned by our Government, by implication, if it has not been done explicitly. The practice is certainly necessary, and is strikingly proper in cases where the consul's interference has procured the release of our impressed seamen; for without such certificates they would be instantly exposed to a repetition of the evil. Besides, multitudes of our seamen have gone abroad without protections, or they have lost them; but still they were not to be abandoned: and who, in foreign countries, have it in their power so well to ascertain their citizenship as our consuls? The measure was natural and necessary; and hence was practised by the consuls of other nations as well as our own."

Extract from the instructions of David Lenox, Esq. agent under the act for the relief and protection of American seamen, residing in Great Britain, dated

MARCH 24, 1797.

"That our seamen once relieved may not be again exposed to impressment, they should be furnished with certificates, in a form, which the British officers and impress-gangs will respect. On this head you will consult the minister of the United States at London, by whom a recognition of the form by the British Government and a corresponding instruction to their officers may, if judged necessary, be obtained: observing, however, that although this kind of certificate is to be invariably respected, certificates of other kinds are not thereby to be disparaged."

[The same instruction was given to Mr Trumbull, and a similar one to Mr. Talbot in 1796.]

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State, dated LONDON, April 13th, 1797.

It was before my arrival that Lord Grenville had expressed to Mr. Pinckney a dissatisfaction with the practice of granting protections to American seamen by our consuls.

Before I received your opinion on this subject, Lord Grenville had written me a letter, in which this branch of the consular power is denied, and notice given to us, that the practice must be discontinued; a copy of this letter and of mine transmitting it to our several consuls, I had the honor to send you with my letter of the 10th of December. Previous to the communication of this resolution of the British Government, it had been notified to Mr. Pinckney, that all applications for the discharge of American seamen impressed into the British service must in future come through the American minister, instead of coming from the American consuls, as had been customary. One consequence of this regulation has been, that the subject in all its details has come under my observation, and its importance, I confess, is much greater than I had supposed it: instead of a few, and those in many instances equivocal, cases I have, since the month of July past, made application for the discharge, from British men of war, of two hundred and seventy-one seamen, who, stating themselves to be Americans, have claimed my interference: of this number eighty-six have been ordered by the Admiralty to be discharged, thirty-seven more have been detained as British subjects or as American volunteers, or for want of proof that they are Americans; and to my applications for the discharge of the remaining one hundred and forty-eight, I have received no answer; the ships on board of which these seamen were detained having, in many instances, sailed before an examination was made in consequence of my applications.

It is certain, that some of those who have applied to me, are not American citizens, but the exceptions are in my opinion few, and the evidence, exclusive of certificates, has been such, as in most cases to satisfy me, that the applicants were real Americans, who have been forced into the British service, and who, with singular constancy, have generally persevered in refusing pay and bounty, though in some instances they have been in service more than two years. As the applications for my aid seemed to increase, after the suspension of the consular power to grant protections (owing to the exposed situation of our seamen, in consequence of the denial of this power) I judged it advisable, though I saw little prospect of any permanent agreement, to attempt to obtain the consent of this Government, that, under certain regulations, our consuls should again be authorized to grant certificates of citizenship to our seamen; my letter to Lord Grenville and his answer you have enclosed. I likewise send you the copy of another letter, to which I have received no answer, that I wrote to Lord Grenville, in order to expose the inconsistency with the laws and principles of British allegiance of a rule by which acknowledged Americans are detained in the British service.

LONDON, December 10th, 1796.

DEAR SIR:

My letter of the 8th September has given you information of what passed between Lord Grenville and me respecting the authority of our consuls to grant protections to seamen.

On the 3d of November I received the following letter from his lordship on that subject:

DOWNING STREET, 3d November, 1796.

"SIR:

"The consuls of the United States, residing in His Majesty's dominions, have, for some time past, been in the habit of granting to seafaring persons, certificates under their consular seal, purporting that the bearers of them are citizens of the United States, and as such liable to be called upon for the service of their own country, and that they are therefore not to be interrupted or molested by any persons whatever. I have reason to believe that these certificates have frequently been granted on very slight and insufficient evidence, and in a great number of cases to persons who were in fact British seamen.

"But, independently of this abuse, I am under the necessity of representing to you, on the part of His Majesty's Government, the insuperable objections which apply to the principle of a jurisdiction in this respect, assumed and exercised within His Majesty's dominions by the consuls of a foreign nation. And I must remark to you, that the impropriety of a proceeding so much out of the ordinary line of the consular functions, and so liable to be abused for the worst purposes, is very much aggravated by the unwarranted assumption of a power in the consuls to administer oaths to His Majesty's subjects, and others resident within these realms, concerning the matter of the said certificates.

"I had the honor of writing to Mr. Pinckney upon this subject, on the 13th of July last, requesting that he would inform me whether the consuls of the United States are in any manner authorized or instructed by their own Government to grant such certificates, and in such case, whether any and what rule of evidence or discretion is prescribed to them for their guidance in a duty of so difficult and delicate a nature.

"I apprehend that Mr. Pinckney's departure prevented his answering my letter; but as I am persuaded that no such authority can in fact have been given, the frequent instances of this practice which have lately come within my knowledge, oblige me now to request that you will have the goodness to notify to the consuls that they are in future to abstain from a proceeding which far exceeds the limits of their office, which is neither sactioned by the law and usage of nations, nor by any treaty between the two countries, and the continuance of which must be considered as an act on their part injurious to the authority of the King's Government. The earnest desire which I feel to avoid even the appearance of a misunderstanding between the two Governments, leads me to prefer this mode of notification, rather than to take any manner of signifying it to them more directly. And I avail myself, with pleasure, of this opportunity to assure you of the high consideration and esteem with which I have the honor to be, &c.

"GRENVILLE."

I thought it proper to communicate this letter to our consuls, which I did by copies accompanied with the following letter:

LONDON, November 18th, 1796.

SIR:

Enclosed I send you a copy of a letter from Lord Grenville to me, respecting the consular jurisdiction: hitherto I have not had leisure to consider the subject in the manner I wish to do, previous to the return of an answer. It has, however, appeared to me advisable to transmit to you a copy of the letter, in order that you should be informed of the decision of this Government on the points to which it refers. I am at present inclined to believe that the administration of oaths by our consuls, in these or any other cases, to British subjects, is neither necessary nor proper. The other point is more doubtful, as well as much more important, as it regards the security of our navigation and seamen. As we have no convention with this nation, defining the consular powers, they must be ascertained by the law of nations. General usage is evidence of this law, and some of its rules are to be found only in the existence of such usage. I have not discovered any thing explicit on the question in any work of reputation, and I shall be obliged to you to inquire, and as early as convenient to inform me, what is the practice on this subject of the consuls of other Powers resident in this nation. If you can procure and send me copies of similar certificates issued by the consuls of other nations, if such certificates are granted by any of them, I desire you to do so: though I would not be understood as giving a settled opinion on this point, I ought not to omit observing to you, that neither our laws respecting consuls, nor the late law for the relief and protection of American seamen, give to our consuls any authority to grant certificates of citizenship, and I have seen no instruction from the Executive that authorizes it. If the power exists, it must be derived from the law of nations. This Government denies that it can be deduced from that source, and notifies to us that we must abstain from the exercise of the power, since the same is deemed to be repugnant to the jurisdiction, and a continuance thereof will be considered as injurious to the authority of the King's Government.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

I do not consider myself authorized to instruct our consuls in this, or in any other instance. In cases in which they ask my advice, I readily give it according to my views of their privileges, and of the public welfare. So far as I have been informed, the consuls do not think it prudent, since this communication from Lord Grenville, to grant any more protections; and, in consequence thereof, I am frequently applied to by seamen on that subject.

I did not approve of that part of the late law for the relief and protection of seamen, which authorizes the collectors to grant protections. It appeared to me to be a measure of questionable policy; and I apprehend it has placed our seamen in a worse instead of a better situation, than that in which they were before.

One great evil of this regulation is, that every seaman who is without a certificate, and every one who has a certificate from any other officer than a collector, is considered as not having been able to procure a certificate from the collector, and is treated here as a British subject. The law ought to be repealed; or, what under present circumstances would be better, it might be amended by requiring every seaman who is a citizen, to prove the same in a safe and satisfactory manner, and to procure a certificate thereof from the collector. Another amendment should be added, to prohibit every other person except the collectors from granting certificates to seamen.

At present it is optional with a seaman to procure or not to procure a certificate of citizenship, or to procure it from the collector, or from any other officer. Hence these certificates are granted in a variety of forms, on different degrees of proof, and by almost every grade of magistrates; and the consequence thereof has been that they are all in some sort disregarded.

RUFUS KING.

Rufus King, Esquire, Minister, &c. to Lord Grenville.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, January 28, 1797.

MY LORD:

I have the honor to send your lordship the copy of a law of the United States, for the relief and protection of American seamen, likewise the copy of an instruction given by the President to the collectors of the several districts, which supplies an omission in this law, and prescribes the evidence on which alone certificates of citizenship may be granted by such collectors; and also a copy of the first section of the law of the United States prescribing an uniform rule of naturalization. I flatter myself that your lordship will perceive in these documents, the care and caution that the American Government have observed, in order that those only who are justly entitled, should obtain certificates of American citizenship. It is not my present purpose to enter into an examination of the precise limits of the consular jurisdiction and functions, which your lordship conceives do not extend to give a right to the American consuls to grant certificates of citizenship to the seamen of that nation, who come, or are brought within His Majesty's dominions; I think it, however, my duty to observe, that on careful inquiry I find it to have been the ancient practice of the consuls of the maritime nations, resident within His Majesty's dominions, ex officio, to grant certificates of this kind; and that this practice is still, as I am informed, pursued by the consuls of Denmark, Sweden, and Portugal, and probably by those of other nations. I ought also to add, that, from the best examination I have been able to give the subject, I cannot but be of opinion, with becoming deference for the statements of His Majesty's Government, that, under proper regulations, the exercise of this power is both an important, and especially between America and Great Britain, the most material portion of the consular rights. I make this observation, my lord, not to invite a discussion of the question, but for the sole purpose of precluding any inference that might result from its not having been made on this occasion.

The object of this communication is to represent to your lordship, that, in consequence of the relations of peace and friendship subsisting between America and Great Britain, which give, and of the fourteenth article of the treaty lately concluded between them, which confirms, to the people and inhabitants of the United States a right, securely to resort to, and to reside in, His Majesty's European dominions, great numbers of American citizens, and especially of the class which compose the seamen engaged in the American navigation, are, from time to time, arriving within, and in the prosecution of their lawful concerns, frequenting His Majesty's said European dominions, many of them have no certificates of citizenship, in some instances having omitted to obtain the same within the United States; and in others, the certificates which had been so obtained having, by the casualties of seafaring lives, been destroyed, these seamen, who cannot easily be distinguished by language or manners from those of Great Britain, are, while employed on board American ships and on shore, daily seized, and, contrary to their will, impressed into His Majesty's service, to the manifest injury of their personal rights, and to the material detriment and disadvantage of the American navigation and commerce. So long as our consuls were in the practice of granting protections to American seamen, these injuries and inconveniences were less frequent and more easily remedied. The laws of the United States authorize, but do not compel, their seamen to take out certificates of citizenship within the United States; and the practice is not uncommon that they omit to obtain such certificates, and place their dependence upon the assistance of the consuls in case of interruption in any of the ports of His Majesty's European dominions.

Some few irregularities, it is possible, may unintentionally have happened in the granting of protections by the American consuls, as no precise instructions for the regulation of their conduct, in this respect, have heretofore been given to them. To avoid similar irregularities in future, and to afford the protection which is indispensably due to the American seamen within His Majesty's European dominions—

I have the honor to submit to your lordship the following propositions: .

1. That the American consuls shall hereafter grant certificates of citizenship, in the form prescribed in the enclosed law, to such American seamen as shall prove themselves entitled to receive the same.

2. In order that no persons, except those who are so entitled, should receive such certificates, that an instruction similar to, and founded upon, that given by the President to the collectors, should be given by me to the several American consuls for the government of their conduct.

3. That instructions should be given by the proper department of His Majesty's Government, to His Majesty's naval officers, to respect such certificates issued by the American consuls.

Convinced of the disposition of His Majesty's Government to remove effectually, and as fast as possible, every cause of inquietude and discontent between the two countries, and to strengthen the good understanding and friendship which subsist between them, I persuade myself that your Lordship will see no objection sufficiently weighty to prevent the early adoption of these propositions which appear to me, my lord, to be essential to the security of the commerce and navigation of my country.

I cannot express to your lordship, in language too strong, my thorough conviction of the importance of this subject to the mutual harmony of the two countries, which it is my earnest desire should be uninterrupted and perpetual; nor can I cease to entertain the expectation that His Majesty's Government will, with as little delay as possible, meet the overtures of the United States, and proceed to those mutual discussions, which, it is believed, must lead to the permanent settlement of principles and rules, by which the seamen belonging to the respective nations, may, in all situations hereafter, be known and distinguished.

This done, the regulations that I have now the honor to submit to your lordship's consideration will cease to be necessary.

With high consideration, I have the honor to be, my lord, &c. &c.

RUFUS KING.

DOWNING STREET, March 27th, 1797.

SIR:

I have the honor of acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 28th of January last. The desire of obtaining the most accurate information on the subject to which it relates, and the unavoidable pressure of other business, have prevented me from answering it at an earlier period.

It is, I am persuaded, unnecessary for me, on this occasion, to repeat the assurances which you have so frequently received of the sincere desire of His Majesty's Government to cultivate the strictest harmony and good understanding with the United States, or to express the concern which I must thence necessarily feel at any subject on which an essential difference of opinion may be likely to exist. Under this impression, I have considered the proposals, contained in your letter, relative to the discharge from His Majesty's service of seamen alleged to be American citizens, and I can, with the most perfect truth, assure you, that I have done so with every disposition to overlook difficulties of small importance, and to soften and smooth the way, as far as could depend on me, for the adjustment of the business in question, on terms mutually satisfactory, and with a spirit of conciliation and friendship.

But I am under the necessity of representing to you that those proposals appear to be liable to very great, and, as I fear, unsurmountable difficulties; and that it seems scarcely possible for the King's Government to accede to any arrangement grounded on such a basis, without risking the total sacrifice of that on which depends the whole maritime force of Great Britain.

I mention the importance of the subject in order that you may be satisfied that the difficulties raised upon your proposals, do not rest upon light or trivial considerations; and that if the question is, in some points of view, highly interesting to the feelings of individuals, and to the general conduct of government in the United States, it is, on other considerations, one in which the highest interests of the King's dominions are essentially concerned.

If it were possible at once to find an obvious and indisputable mode of ascertaining whether a seaman is really a subject of His Majesty's dominions, or a citizen of the United States, certainly the King's Government would not hesitate to accede to any regulations for applying that rule in the easiest, most expeditious, and most effectual manner. But you must be sensible that while the laws of Great Britain render all British sailors liable to be called upon to serve in the defence of their country, individuals, who may be desirous of exempting themselves from this duty, will too frequently endeavor to protect themselves under the pretence that they are American citizens; and that for this purpose they will derive very great facilities from the similarity of language, habits, and manners. The frequency of such attempts will naturally be increased by the circumstances in which America still finds herself, and in consequence of which a large proportion of the merchant ships of the United States now is, and must for many years continue to be, navigated by foreign seamen, and particularly by British.

If therefore any rule is to be laid down by the consent of the two Governments for ascertaining, by a sort of prima facie evidence, who are the persons to whom exemption shall be allowed on the ground of their being citizens of the United States, it must reasonably be expected by Great Britain, that each rule (though it could never be free from all objection, and certain in its application to every possible case) should, however, contain such general outlines of security as to afford a just foundation for the practice to be observed on a point of so much importance.

I am sorry to be obliged to say, that the proposals which you have been instructed to make on this head, not only do not fully answer this description, but that they do not appear to me to afford any security against the utmost extent and greatest possible latitude of abuse, and that a practice founded on these proposals would not differ at all in its effect and consequences, though in name and appearance it might, from a resolution to discharge at once every British seaman on his own assertion, that he is an American citizen.

With this view, I must request you to consider in detail the provisions of the act of Congress, and of the subsequent instructions respecting the certificates of citizenship which it is now proposed to allow the consuls of the United States to grant, with the intention that full faith shall be given to such documents so framed: and I would willingly appeal to your own candor, whether any Government could ever consent that, even in matters of internal regulation, any point of national concern, however trifling, should rest on a foundation of no better security than that which is now proposed as the only safeguard against evasions already so frequently practised, and which may prove so extensive in their operation, and so dangerous in their consequences.

I must first observe, that the act does not in any manner specify the nature of the proof on which these certificates are to be granted: although some provisions on this subject are therein expressly referred to as being contained in the act, and as making the indisputable condition of granting the certificate. The insertion of those provisions is indeed so essential to the whole of the subject matter which is in question, that the omission precludes all possibility of judging of the policy, or justice, or efficacy, of the law.

The President of the United States has indeed, in order to supply this deficiency, prescribed by his instructions, certain rules for the conduct of the officers of the Federal Government in respect of this act; but these instructions (supposing them in other respects adequate to their professed object) cannot even, with the utmost respect to the authority from which they proceed, be considered as having equal force, or affording to foreign nations equal security with those provisions which, according to the tenor of the act now in question, ought to be contained in the body of the act itself. It would, by no means, be my wish to raise or to discuss any doubtful question on the respective powers or functions of the component parts of a foreign Government, and if I err in the little I am about to say on this subject, your knowledge will at once enable you to correct any mistake into which I may be led. But when in a new case the supreme legislative power of that Government does, in the very first provision it makes on the subject, announce its regulations on this point as a matter of legislative enactment, it is impossible for other Governments, deeply interested in these regulations, to avoid, at least, inquiring how far under the want of such enactment, any rules for the same purpose are likely to be effectually enforced by the sanction of any other authority: and to this remark I have only to add, that such a doubt will be found to apply with peculiar force to a case where no penalties have been, or as it is conceived could, under that sanction, be provided as a restraint on frauds, though carried to any extent. But the objections to the regulations themselves are still more important; so that even if the President's instructions were made law by any future act of Congress, or if a power now unquestionably exists, or should hereafter be expressly created in the executive Government of the United States to provide such regulations, and to enforce them by adequate penalties, we should still be compelled to say that they were insufficient for the object of affording to Great Britain that security against fraud which must be a principal object of her intention in any final settlement of this business.

The evidence which is required by those instructions, as a foundation for granting the certificates of citizenship, is such as would not be admitted in any other case of the most trifling civil or political right. Such evidence would not even afford a reasonable presumption of the fact of birth, residence, or naturalization, and still less do the instructions hold out any adequate security that the person to whom even this proof applies, shall be the same with him who may be described in the certificate, or with him who may afterwards become the bearer of it.

Thus in the first and most simple case to which the President's instructions relate, a British sailor might apply to the collector of the customs at Boston for a certificate of citizenship, and support his application either by an extract of a pretended register of births in Georgia, or any other distant State, purporting to be certified by the proper officer of some religious society there, and supported by an affidavit that the applicant is the person mentioned in the extract, or merely by an affidavit that the applicant was born in Georgia, and on this ground the certificate is to be granted of necessity, and without further inquiry.

The extract of such a register, and the signature thereto as described above, are so easily fabricated, and the fabrication is so impossible to be detected, that they can evidently give no security against fraud, and accordingly they are dispensed with in the instruction itself, which in express terms required the certificate to be granted on the simple affidavit of birth.

On this affidavit, therefore, the whole rests. It is not precisely specified in the instruction, whether the custom-house officer is himself to administer this oath, or whether he is to admit (as I imagine the practice is) any affidavit said to be sworn by a credible witness and before a magistrate of the United States, both perhaps residing at the distance of many hundred miles from the collector to whom the affidavit is produced, and the names of both being equally unknown to him. In the latter supposition he is, of course, wholly unable to verify the identity of the claimant, or the authenticity of the paper, or the signature; or indeed, the existence either of the magistrate or the witness. But even if all these were duly ascertained, or if the affidavit is to be sworn before the custom-house officer himself, the fact of birth will still rest on the deposition of one person only, and that taken without adverse parties, and with no interest or means in the person before whom it is sworn to detect a falsehood. And when the certificate has in this manner, and on these grounds, been granted, not the smallest security is provided that the person obtaining it shall not immediately transfer it into other hands, and if he pleases, apply again to the same or another collector for another similar certificate to be granted to him on the same grounds; so that putting an extreme case, five hundred such papers granted one day in strict conformity to the instructions, might the very next day be transferred to the whole crew of a British man of war. I have instanced this, because it is the first, the simplest, and the least objectionable of all the cases supposed in the instructions of the President; but if you will apply the same examination to the others, it cannot fail to strike you how utterly inadequate all these provisions are to the discovery of truth, or the prevention of fraud. It is a great additional difficulty in all these cases, that it is not required by the law for the relief and protection of American seamen, that the certificate should distinguish, or in any manner specify, the grounds upon which it is granted. Where so much latitude is open for abuse, even this restriction, inadequate as it is to the total prevention of frauds, might, in some degree, have operated to check them; but even this is omitted, and instances have already occurred to prove by fact what was naturally to be foreseen, that no faith whatever is due to certificates granted under the act in question.

To such an extent are the frauds already arrived, that very recently I have had occasion to be acquainted with the circumstances of a case, in which a seaman described in a certificate, granted by a collector in the United States, to be an American seaman and citizen, has since been proved to be a native of North Britain, and to have gone to America, for the first time, no longer ago than in the month of July, 1794.

I am further under the necessity of remarking, that both the laws in question and the President's instructions include some cases, (particularly with regard to the subjects of other Powers settling within the United States) to the principles of which this Government cannot accede. No British subject can, by such a form of renunciation as that which is prescribed in the American law of naturalization, divest himself of his allegiance to his sovereign. Such a declaration of renunciation made by any of the King's subjects would, instead of operating as a protection to them, be considered as an act highly criminal on their part; and, as in the proposed certificates there is no specification which can show what are the grounds of the protection claimed, it cannot be known whether, even supposing all the facts unquestionably true, the person to whom it was granted may not still be a British subject, liable, as such, to be called upon to serve his country, and incapable of receiving protection from any foreign State. I have hitherto reasoned on these provisions as applicable to the certificates granted by collectors in the United States; but it cannot escape your penetration and judgment, that every one of the objections before stated apply with additional force to the proposal of certificates to be granted by the consuls of the United States resident in Europe, who can hardly be supposed, in any single instance, to possess the means of investigating or ascertaining any one disputed point. And it is difficult to conceive how any such consul, if desirous of acting honestly in discharge of a duty of such high importance, could satisfy his own conscience as to the grounds on which he is to affirm and to certify to others a matter of fact, respecting which he can have so little cause or means of knowledge.

With respect to the practice which may have been adopted by the consuls of the foreign Powers residing in His Majesty's dominions, of granting such certificates to individuals of their respective nations, you, sir, must be sensible that the circumstance of language alone, independent of many other means of knowledge which do not exist as with respect to America, are, in a very great degree, if not wholly, sufficient to guard against deception in those cases: but in regard to British seamen, and those of the United States, the similarity of language, manners, and habits, and the undeniably large proportion of the American navigation which is carried on by British sailors, must, as I have already mentioned, present such difficulties as to render it impossible for such a trust to be correctly exercised to the satisfaction of either Government. For the reasons which I have here stated, the force of which I am confident no candid mind can dispute, I am under the necessity of declining, on the part of His Majesty's Government, to accede to the propositions contained in your letter. If any other proposals can be made less liable to objection, they will be considered with candor and liberality. It is not expected that, on so difficult and delicate a business, arrangements can at once be brought forward wholly free from all objections, or such as to supersede the necessity of frequent revisal, improvement, and addition, in order to meet the different means of evasion that may be resorted to; but it is certainly not too much to ask that the rules adopted in the first instance shall at least afford some security against the most extensive and the most dangerous consequences to the maritime power and safety of Great Britain. In the course of what I have said in this letter, I have adverted to two very material defects in the present system, both which might, as I think, be remedied by the Legislature of the United States. The first is the want of adequate penalties to enforce, in all the parties concerned, the strictest attention to prevent frauds in applying for and granting these certificates; the second is the inserting, in the body of the certificate, the nature and particulars of the proof on which it is granted. I am far from thinking that, even with these additions, the system would still be such as could admit of the adoption of your proposal; but I have mentioned these as improvements which have occurred to me. It is probable that your own knowledge of the subject may enable you to suggest others, or that there may occur to the Government of the United States means of removing or lessening the objections here stated.

In the mean time, you may be assured that those facilities will be continued to you which you have hitherto experienced, in all your applications to His Majesty's Government, for the release of seamen alleged to be American citizens; and that every representation from you on that subject will be investigated with the utmost promptitude, and with those friendly dispositions, for the sincerity and effect of which I can with confidence appeal to your own experience since you have resided in this country.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

GRENVILLE.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, November 30th, 1796.

MY LORD:

I have the honor to return the letter addressed to John Maxwell from his wife, which your lordship some time since transmitted to me, as containing evidence of improper conduct on the part of the American consul at Bristol. I sent this letter to Mr. Vanderhorst, the consul referred to, with a request that he would furnish such explanations relative to this case as should be in his power. From the communications I have received from Mr. Vanderhorst, extracts from which I take the liberty to enclose for your lordship's information, I flatter myself that it will appear that the unfavorable inferences which have been drawn from this letter, respecting the conduct of Mr. Vanderhorst, are not well founded.

In your lordship's letter of the 21st of September, in answer to my application for the discharge of Maxwell, an American citizen, impressed and detained on board His Majesty's ship Sandwich, the reason assigned against his discharge is, "that he is married and settled at Bristol;" and I understand that the orders of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty for the discharge of American seamen usually contain a proviso, that the discharge is not to operate in favor of any person who has entered on board any of His Majesty's ships, or who is married or settled within any of His Majesty's dominions. Without admitting or contesting, on this occasion, the rule of English law, that a subject cannot divest himself of his natural allegiance, I take the liberty to request your lordship's attention to the diversity of practice, so much to the disadvantage of the American citizens, that prevails in the application of this rule.

If Great Britain requires the acquiescence of foreign nations in this law, so far as regards the requisition of her subjects married and settled abroad, or voluntarily engaged in foreign service, is she not bound, in like manner, to observe it herself, in respect to the subjects of foreign Powers, under similar circumstances, in her service, or within her dominions? If to the demand of a foreigner in her service, by the nation to which he belongs, Great Britain answers that such foreigner cannot be delivered, because he has voluntarily engaged to serve His Majesty, or is married, or settled within His Majesty's dominions, is she not bound by her own principles to admit the validity of the same answer from such foreign nation, when she requires the surrender of British subjects found in a similar predicament in the service or within the territory of such foreign nation? Justice, which is always impartial, furnishes the proper answer to these questions.

Admitting, then, that the voluntary contract of an American citizen to serve on board a British ship, or the marriage or settlement of such citizen within His Majesty's dominions, is the foundation of a right in His Majesty's Government to refuse the requisition of the United States of America that such citizen should be discharged from His Majesty's service, do we not thereby establish a principle that at once condemns and puts an end to the practice of His Majesty's naval officers, in entering American ships in search of, and for the purpose of impressing British seamen, since all seamen found on board such ships are there of choice, and by voluntary contract, to serve in the American employ.

But if neither of these circumstances can be considered as justly giving a right to His Majesty's Government to refuse the discharge of American citizens, does it not result that the usual proviso connected with the orders for the discharge of such citizens, and which is assigned as a reason against the discharge of John Maxwell, is without any just foundation, and consequently operates to the disadvantage and injury of the American citizens?

With the highest consideration and esteem, I have the honor to be, my lord,

Your lordship's obedient and very humble servant,

RUFUS KING.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 5, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate and
Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The first despatches from our envoys extraordinary, since their arrival at Paris, were received at the Secretary of State's office at a late hour the last evening. They are all in a character which will require some days to be deciphered, except the last, which is dated the 8th of January, 1798. The contents of this letter are of so much importance to be immediately made known to Congress, and to the public, especially to the mercantile part of our fellow citizens, that I have thought it my duty to communicate them to both Houses, without loss of time.

JOHN ADAMS.

No. 5.

PARIS, January 8, 1798.

DEAR SIR:

We embrace an unexpected opportunity to send you the 'Redacteur' of the 5th instant, containing the message of the Directory to the council of five hundred, urging the necessity of a law to declare, as good prizes, all neutral ships having on board merchandises and commodities, the production of England, or of the English possessions, that the flag, as they term it, may no longer cover the property. And declaring, further, that the ports of France, except in case of distress, shall be shut against all neutral ships, which, in the course of their voyage, shall have touched at an English port. A commission has been appointed to report on the message, and it is expected that a decree will be passed in conformity to it.

Nothing new has occurred since our last, in date of the 24th ultimo. We can only repeat that there exists no hope of our being officially received by this Government, or that the objects of our mission will be in any way accomplished. We have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES C. PINCKNEY,
J. MARSHALL,
E. GERRY.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq.

Postscript to a triplicate of the Envoys' letter, No. 5, received March 30, 1798.

The law above mentioned has been passed unanimously by the council of five hundred, and we enclose a journal containing the account. There is no doubt but that it will be adopted, without opposition, by the council of ancients.

Message to the Council of Five Hundred, of the 15th Nivose, 6th year, (January 4, 1798.)

CITIZEN REPRESENTATIVES:

On this day, the 15th Nivose, and at the very hour at which the Executive Directory addresses this message to you, the municipal administrators, the justices of the peace, the commissaries of the Directory, and the superintendents of the customs, are proceeding, in all the chief places of the departments, in all the ports, and in all the principal communes of the republic, to seize the English merchandise now in France, or introduced into its territory in contravention of the law of the 10th Brumaire, 5th year, (Oct. 31st, 1796.)

Such is the first act by which, now that peace is given to the continent, the war declared long since against England, is about to assume the real character which becomes it. The French will not suffer a power, which seeks to found its prosperity upon the misfortunes of other nations, to raise its commerce upon the ruin of that of other states, and which, aspiring to the dominion of the seas, wishes to introduce, every where, the articles of its own manufacture, and to receive nothing from foreign industry, any longer to enjoy the fruit of the guilty speculations.

The English Government has kept in pay, during the war, the coalesced forces, with the produce of its manufactures. It has violated all the principles of the law of nations, in order to shackle the relations of neutral powers; it has caused to be seized the provisions, corn, and commodities, which it supposed to be destined for France: it has declared contraband every thing which it thought could be useful to the republic: it desired to starve it. All the citizens call for vengeance.

When it had to fear the capture of vessels sailing under its flag, it corrupted foreign captains to induce it to take on board their vessels English merchandise, and thus to introduce it, by stratagem, by fraud, or otherwise, into other states, and especially into the French republic.

The neutral Powers should have perceived, that, by this conduct, their merchants took part in the war, and that they lent assistance to one of the belligerent powers.

We serve a party, as well when we procure for it the means of augmenting its forces, as when we unite ourselves to those which it has. The neutral Powers should have perceived, that England, by stopping the vessels of other Powers, laden in their respective ports, and destined for France, by permitting articles coming from her own manufactories alone to circulate, aimed at an exclusive commerce, and that it would be necessary to seek reparation for such an attempt.

The ordinance of the marine, and the regulation of 1794, have declared lawful prize the vessels and their cargoes in which is found English merchandise belonging to enemies. These provisions should be extended. The interest of Europe requires it.

The Directory thinks it urgent and necessary to pass a law, declaring that the character of vessels, relative to their quality of neutral or enemy, shall be determined by their cargo, and the cargo shall be no longer covered by the flag: in consequence, that every vessel found at sea, having on board English provisions and merchandise as her cargo, in whole or in part, shall be declared lawful prize, whosoever may be the proprietor of these provisions or merchandise; which shall be reputed contraband, for this cause alone, that they come from England or her possessions.

It would be useful to declare, at the same time, that except in the case of distress, the ports of the republic shall be shut to all foreign vessels which, in the course of their voyage, shall have entered those of England.

The Executive Directory requests you, citizens representatives, to adopt these measures. No neutral or allied Power can mistake their object, nor complain of them, unless it be already abandoned to England. The infallible effect of the measure is to enhance the value of the produce of their own soil and industry, to increase the prosperity of their commerce, to repel every thing that comes from England, and essentially to influence the conclusion of the war.

Such are the motives which induce the Executive Directory to invite you, citizens representatives, to take the objects of this message into the most prompt consideration.

LAGARDE, Secretary General.

Plan of a Decree reported by M. Villers to the Council of Five Hundred, in its sitting of the 11th of January, 1798, translated from a Paris paper, entitled Journal du Soir, of the same day, enclosed in the triplicate of the Envoys' letter, No. 5, dated January 8, 1798.

"1st. The character of a vessel, relative to the quality of neuter or enemy, is determined by her cargo.

"In consequence, every vessel loaded, in whole or in part, with English merchandise, is declared lawful prize, whoever the owner of the said merchandise may be.

"2. Every foreign vessel which, in the course of her voyage, shall have entered an English port, shall not enter France, except in case of distress: she shall depart thence as soon as the causes of her entry shall have ceased."

This decree was immediately and unanimously adopted.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 137. [2d SESSION.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MARCH 19, 1798.

UNITED STATES, March 19, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate
and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The despatches from the envoys extraordinary of the United States to the French republic, which were mentioned in my message to both Houses of Congress, of the 5th instant, have been examined and maturely considered.

While I feel a satisfaction in informing you that their exertions for the adjustment of the differences between the two nations have been sincere and unremitted, it is incumbent on me to declare that I perceive no ground of expectation that the objects of their mission can be accomplished on terms compatible with the safety, the honor, or the essential interests of the nation.

This result cannot, with justice, be attributed to any want of moderation on the part of this Government, or to any indisposition to forego secondary interests for the preservation of peace. Knowing it to be my duty, and believing it to be your wish, as well as that of the great body of the people, to avoid, by all reasonable concessions, any participation in the contentions of Europe, the powers vested in our envoys were commensurate with a liberal and pacific policy, and that high confidence which might justly be reposed in the abilities, patriotism, and integrity of the characters to whom the negotiation was committed. After a careful review of the whole subject, with the aid of all the information I have received, I can discern nothing which could have insured or contributed to success, that has been omitted on my part, and nothing further which can be attempted, consistently with maxims for which our country has contended, at every hazard, and which constitute the basis of our national sovereignty.

Under these circumstances I cannot forbear to reiterate the recommendations which have been formerly made, and to exhort you to adopt, with promptitude, decision, and unanimity, such measures as the ample resources of the country afford, for the protection of our seafaring and commercial citizens; for the defence of any exposed portions of our territory; for replenishing our arsenals, establishing foundries, and military manufactures; and to provide such efficient revenue as will be necessary to defray extraordinary expenses, and supply the deficiencies which may be occasioned by depredations on our commerce.

The present state of things is so essentially different from that in which instructions were given to the collectors to restrain vessels of the United States from sailing in an armed condition, that the principle on which those orders were issued has ceased to exist. I therefore deem it proper to inform Congress that I no longer conceive myself justifiable in continuing them, unless in particular cases, where there may be reasonable ground of suspicion, that such vessels are intended to be employed contrary to law.

In all your proceedings it will be important to manifest a zeal, vigor, and concert, in defence of the national rights, proportioned to the danger with which they are threatened.

JOHN ADAMS.

FRANCE.

REPORTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 26, 1798.

MR. SEWALL, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the protection of commerce and the defence of the country, submitted the following report:

That an English ship, the Oracabissa, in October last, being at anchor within the bar of the harbor of Charleston, in South Carolina, where she had come in distress, was attacked by the crew of an armed vessel called the Vertitude, or Fortitude, commanded by a Captain Jourdain, and said to be a French privateer from Cape François, and was there seized, plundered, and burnt, in violation of the peace and neutrality of the United States, and in contempt of their jurisdictional limits. Strenuous exertions were made, under the orders of the Governor of South Carolina, to repel this daring outrage, and to afford a suitable protection to the vessel of a nation in amity with us, which had peaceably entered a harbor of the United States. The exertions, unhappily, were without effect. The English vessel was completely destroyed, and the privateer escaped with impunity. On the next day the same privateer captured two American vessels, the ship Pallas, of Charleston, and the brigantine Mary, of Savannah, when near the same harbor, which they were endeavoring to enter.

After stating these facts, fully supported, as the committee apprehend, by the documents referred to them, it is scarcely necessary to observe that a regard to our national character, thus insulted, and to the safety of those ports and harbors of the United States which are more immediately exposed to their violations, requires a continued attention to the defence of our jurisdictional limits. In addition to the provisions already authorized and recommended, the committee are of opinion that several extensive inlets and important harbors, especially in Georgia and South Carolina, may be most effectually defended by galleys or floating batteries, and therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized, by law, to provide, arm, and equip, not exceeding —— galleys, or floating batteries, and to cause the same to be stationed and employed where he shall judge most conducive to the public safety and defence.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 139. [2d SESSION.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, APRIL 3, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the request of the House of Representatives, expressed in their resolution of the second of this month, I transmit, to both Houses, those instructions to, and despatches from, the envoys extraordinary of the United States to the French republic, which were mentioned in my message of the 19th of March last, omitting only some names, and a few expressions, descriptive of the persons.

I request that they may be considered in confidence, until the members of Congress are fully possessed of their contents, and shall have had opportunity to deliberate on the consequences of their publication; after which time I submit them to your wisdom.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, April 3, 1798.

LETTERS OF CREDENCE FOR MESSRS. PINCKNEY, MARSHALL, AND GERRY, ENVOYS TO FRANCE.

John Adams, President of the United States of America, to the Executive Directory of the French republic.

CITIZENS DIRECTORS:

Desirous of terminating all differences between the United States of America and the French republic, and of restoring that harmony and good understanding, and that commercial and friendly intercourse, which, from the commencement of their political connexion, until lately, have so happily subsisted; I have nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, appointed Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall, and Elbridge Gerry, distinguished citizens of these States, jointly and severally, envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French republic, for the purpose of accomplishing the great objects above mentioned: Wherefore, I pray you, citizens Directors, to give full credence to what they, and each of them, shall say to you in these respects, in behalf of the United States, and also when they shall assure you of the sincerity of our wishes for the welfare of the French republic.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the United States of America, at Philadelphia, the thirteenth day of July, in the year 1797, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-second.

JOHN ADAMS.

By the President of the United States.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State.

FULL POWERS TO MESSRS. PINCKNEY, MARSHALL, AND GERRY, ENVOYS TO FRANCE.

John Adams, President of the United States of America, to all whom these presents shall concern—Greeting:

Know ye, that for the purpose of terminating all differences between the United States of America and the French republic, and of restoring and confirming perfect harmony and good understanding, and re-establishing a commercial and friendly intercourse between them, and reposing especial trust and confidence in the integrity, prudence, and abilities, of Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall, and Elbridge Gerry, citizens of the United States, I have nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed the said Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall, and Elbridge Gerry, jointly and severally, envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States to the French republic, hereby giving and granting to them, and any and each of them, full power and authority, and also a general and special command, for, and in the name of, the United States, to meet and confer with the ministers, commissioners, or deputies, of the French republic, being furnished with the like full powers, whether separately, or jointly, and with them to treat, consult, and negotiate, of and concerning all claims, and all matters, and causes of difference, subsisting between the United States and the French republic, for the purpose of satisfying and terminating the same in a just and equitable manner; and also of and concerning the general commerce between the United States and France, and all other the dominions of the French republic; and to conclude and sign a treaty or treaties, convention or conventions, touching the premises; transmitting the same to the President of the United States of America for his final ratification, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, if such advice and consent shall be given.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at the City of Philadelphia, the twenty-second day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, and of the independence of the United States of America, the twenty-first.

JOHN ADAMS.

By the President of the United States.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State.

Instructions to Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall, and Elbridge Gerry, Esquires, Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 15, 1797.

GENTLEMEN:

It is known to you, that the people of the United States of America entertained a warm and sincere affection for the people of France, ever since their arms were united in the war with Great Britain, which ended in the full and formal acknowledgment of the independence of these States. It is known to you that this affection was ardent, when the French determined to reform their Government, and establish it on the basis of liberty; that liberty in which the people of the United States were born, and which, in the conclusion of the war above mentioned, was finally and firmly secured. It is known to you that this affection rose to enthusiasm, when the war was kindled between France and the Powers of Europe, which were combined against her for the avowed purpose of restoring the monarchy; and every where vows were heard for the success of the French arms. Yet, during this period, France expressed no wish that the United [States should depart from their neutrality. And while no duty required us to enter into the war, and our best interests urged us to remain at peace, the Government determined to take a neutral station: which being taken, the duties of an impartial neutrality became indispensably binding. Hence the Government early proclaimed to our citizens the nature of those duties, and the consequences of their violation.

The minister of France, Mr. Genet, who arrived about this time, by his public declarations, confirmed the idea that France did not desire us to quit the ground we had taken. His measures, however, were calculated to destroy our neutrality and to draw us into the war.

The principles of the proclamation of neutrality, founded on the law of nations, which is the law of the land, were afterwards recognized by the National Legislature, and the observance of them enforced by specific penalties in the act of Congress, passed the 5th of June, 1794. By these principles and laws the acts of the Executive, and the decisions of the courts of the United States were regulated.

A Government, thus fair and upright in its principles, and just and impartial in its conduct, might have confidently hoped to be secure against formal official censure; but the United States have not been so fortunate. The acts of their Government in its various branches, though pure in principle and impartial in operation, and conformable to their indispensable rights of sovereignty, have been assigned as the cause of the offensive and injurious measures of the French republic. For proofs of the former, all the acts of the Government may be vouched; while the aspersions so freely uttered by the French ministers, the refusal to hear the ministers of the United States specially charged to enter on amicable discussions on all the topics of complaint, the decrees of the Executive Directory and of their agents, the depredations on our commerce, and the violences against the persons of our citizens, are evidences of the latter. These injuries and depredations will constitute an important subject of your discussions with the Government of the French republic; and for all these wrongs you will seek redress.

In respect to the depredations on our commerce, the principal objects will be, to agree on an equitable mode of examining and deciding the claims of our citizens, and the manner and periods of making them compensation. As to the first, the 7th article of the British, and the 21st of the Spanish treaty, present approved precedents to be adopted with France. The proposed mode of adjusting those claims, by commissioners appointed on each side, is so perfectly fair, we cannot imagine that it will be refused. But when the claims are adjusted, if payment in specie cannot be obtained, it may be found necessary to agree, in behalf of our citizens, that they shall accept public securities, payable with interest at such periods as the state of the French finances shall render practicable. These periods you will endeavor as far as possible to shorten.

Not only the recent depredations, under color of the decrees of the Directory of the 2d of July, 1796, and the 2d of March, 1797, or under the decrees of their agents, or the illegal sentences of their tribunals, but all prior ones, not already satisfactorily adjusted, should be put in this equitable train of settlement. To cancel many or all of the last mentioned claims, might be the effect of the decree of the Executive Directory of the 2d of March last, reviving the decree of the 9th of May, 1793; but this being an ex post facto regulation, as well as a violation of the treaty between the United States and France, cannot be obligatory on the former. Indeed, the greater part, probably nearly all the captures and confiscations in question have been committed in direct violation of that treaty or of the law of nations. But the injuries arising from the capture of enemies' property, in vessels of the United States, may not be very extensive; and if for such captured property the French Government will, agreeably to the law of nations, pay the freight and reasonable demurrage, we shall not, on this account, any further contend. But of ship timber and naval stores taken and confiscated by the French, they ought to pay the full value; because our citizens continued their traffic in those articles, under the faith of the treaty with France. On these two points we ought to expect that the French Government will not refuse to do us justice: and the more, because it has not, at any period of the war, expressed its desire that the commercial treaty should in these respects be altered.

Besides the claims of our citizens for depredations on their property, there are many arising from express contracts made with the French Government or its agents, or founded on the seizure of their property in French ports. Other claims have arisen from the long detention of a multitude of our vessels in the ports of France. The wrong hereby done to our citizens was acknowledged by the French Government, and, in some, perhaps in most of the cases, small payments towards indemnifications have been made: the residue still remains to be claimed.

All these just demands of our citizens will merit your attention. The best possible means of compensation must be attempted. These will depend on what you shall discover to be practicable in relation to the French finances. But an exception must be made in respect to debts due to our citizens by the contracts of the French Government and its agents, if they are comprehended in any stipulation; and an option reserved to them, jointly or individually, either to accept the means of payment which you shall stipulate, or resort to the French Government, directly, for the fulfilment of its contracts.

Although the reparation for losses sustained by the citizens of the United States, in consequence of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations, or forcible seizures or detentions, is of very high importance, and is to be pressed with the greatest earnestness, yet it is not to be insisted on as an indispensable condition of the proposed treaty.

You are not, however, to renounce these claims of our citizens, nor to stipulate that they may be assumed by the United States as a loan to the French Government.

In respect to the alterations of the commercial treaty with France, in the two cases which have been principal subjects of complaint on her part, viz: enemies' property in neutral ships, and the articles contraband of war; although France can have no right to claim the annulling of stipulations at the moment when, by both parties, they were originally intended to operate; yet, if the French Government press for alterations, the President has no difficulty in substituting the principles of the law of nations, as stated in the 17th and 18th articles of our commercial treaty with Great Britain, to those of the 23d and 24th articles of our commercial treaty with France: and, in respect to provisions and other articles not usually deemed contraband, you are to agree only on a temporary compromise, like that in the 18th article of the British treaty, and of the same duration. If, however, in order to satisfy France, now she is at war, we change the two important articles before mentioned, then the 14th article of the French treaty, which subjects the property of the neutral nation found on board enemies' ships to capture and condemnation, must of course be abolished.

We have witnessed so many erroneous constructions of the treaty with France, even in its plainest parts, it will be necessary to examine every article critically, for the purpose of preventing, as far as human wisdom can prevent, all future misinterpretations. The kind of documents necessary for the protection of the neutral vessels should be enumerated and minutely described; the cases in which a sea-letter should be required may be specified; the want of a sea-letter should not of itself be a cause of confiscation, where other reasonable proof of property is produced; and, where such proof is furnished, the want of a sea-letter should go no further than to save the captor from damages for detaining and bringing in the neutral vessel. The proportion of the vessel's crew which may be foreigners should be agreed on. Perhaps it will be expedient to introduce divers other regulations conformably to the marine laws of France. Whenever these are to operate on the commerce of the United States, our safety requires that, as far as possible, they be fixed by treaty. And it will be desired to stipulate against any ex post facto law or regulation, under any pretence whatever.

Great Britain has often claimed a right, and practised upon it, to prohibit neutral nations carrying on a commerce with her enemies which had not been allowed in time of peace. On this head, it will be desirable to come to an explicit understanding with France, and, if possible, to obviate the claim by an express stipulation.

Such extensive depredations have been committed on the commerce of neutrals, and especially of the United States, by the citizens of France, under pretence that her enemies (particularly Great Britain) have done the same things, it will be desirable to have it explicitly stipulated that the conduct of an enemy towards the neutral Power shall not authorize or excuse the other belligerent Power in any departure from the law of nations or the stipulations of the treaty; especially that the vessels of the neutral nation shall never be captured or detained, or their property confiscated or injured, because bound to or from an enemy's port, except the case of a blockaded port, the entering into which may be prevented according to the known rule of the law of nations. And it may be expedient to define a blockaded place or port to be one actually invested by land or naval forces, or both, and that no declaration of a blockade shall have any effect without such actual investment. And no commercial right whatever should be abandoned which is secured to neutral Powers by the European law of nations.

The foregoing articles being those which the French Government has made the ostensible grounds of its principal complaints, they have naturally been first brought into view. But the proposed alterations and arrangements suggest the propriety of revising all our treaties with France. In such revision, the first object that will attract your attention is the reciprocal guaranty, in the 11th article of the treaty of alliance. This guaranty we are perfectly willing to renounce. The guaranty by France of the liberty, sovereignty, and independence of the United States, will add nothing to our security; while, on the contrary, our guaranty of the possessions of France in America will perpetually expose us to the risk and expense of war, or to disputes and questions concerning our national faith.

When Mr. Genet was sent as the minister of the French republic to the United States, its situation was embarrassed, and the success of its measures problematical. In such circumstances, it was natural that France should turn her eye to the mutual guaranty; and, accordingly, it was required, in Mr. Genet's instructions, to be "an essential clause in the new treaty," which he was to propose, and on the ground "that it nearly concerned the peace and prosperity of the French nation, that a people whose resources increase beyond all calculation, and whom nature has placed so near their rich colonies, should become interested, by their own engagements, in the preservation of those islands." But, at this time, France, powerful by her victories, and secure in her triumphs, may less regard the reciprocal guaranty with the United States, and be willing to relinquish it. As a substitute for the reciprocal guaranty, may be proposed a mutual renunciation of the same territories and possessions that were subjects of the guaranty and renunciation in the 6th and 11th articles of the treaty of alliance. Such a renunciation on our part would obviate the reason assigned in the instruction to Mr. Genet before cited, of future danger from the rapidly growing power of the United States. But if France insists on the mutual guaranty, it will be necessary to aim at some modification of it.

The existing engagement is of that kind which, by writers on the law of nations, is called a general guaranty; of course the casus fœderis can never occur except in a defensive war. The nature of this obligation is understood to be that, when a war really and truly defensive exists, the engaging nation is bound to furnish an effectual and adequate defence, in co-operation with the power attacked: whence it follows that the nation may be required, in some circumstances, to bring forward its whole force. The nature and extent of the succors demandable not being ascertained, engagements of this kind are dangerous on account of their uncertainty. There is always hazard of doing too much or too little, and, of course, in being involved in involuntary rupture.

Specific succors have the advantage of certainty, and are less liable to occasion war. On the other hand, a general guaranty allows a latitude for the exercise of judgment and discretion.

On the part of the United States, instead of troops or ships of war, it will be convenient to stipulate for a moderate sum of money, or quantity of provisions, at the option of France; the provisions to be delivered at our own ports in any future defensive wars. The sum of money, or its value in provisions, ought not to exceed two hundred thousand dollars a year, during any such wars. The reciprocal stipulation on the part of France may be to furnish annually the like sum of money, or an equivalent in military stores and clothing for troops, at the option of the United States, to be delivered in the ports of France.

Particular caution, however, must be used in discussing this subject, not to admit any claims on the ground of the guaranty, in relation to the existing war; as we do not allow that the casus fœderis applies to it. And if the war should continue after your arrival in France, and the question of the guaranty should not be mentioned on her part, you may yourselves be silent on the subject, if you deem it most prudent.

It will be proper here to notice such articles of the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and France, as have been differently construed by the two Governments, or which it may be expedient to amend or explain.

Art. II. The assent of the United States, in their treaty with Great Britain, to the doctrine of the law of nations respecting enemies' property in neutral ships, and ship timber and naval stores, and, in some cases, provisions, as contraband of war, the French Government has chosen to consider as a voluntary grant of favors, in respect to commerce and navigation, to Great Britain, and that, consequently, the same favors have become common to France. This construction is so foreign from our ideas of the meaning and design of this article, it shows the necessity of reviewing all the articles, and however clear they may appear, of attempting to obviate future misconstructions, by declaratory explanations or a change of terms.

Art. V. France has repeatedly contended that the imposition of fifty per cent. per ton, on French vessels arriving in the United States, is contrary to the fifth article of the treaty. The arguments in support of this pretension are unknown; but it is presumed to be unfounded. The reciprocal right of laying "duties or imposts of what nature soever," equal to those imposed on the most favored nations, and without any other restrictions, seems to be clearly settled by the 3d and 4th articles. The 5th article appears to have been intended merely to define or qualify the rights of American vessels in France. It is, however, desirable that the question be understood, and all doubt concerning it removed. But the introduction of a principle of discrimination between the vessels of different foreign nations, and in derogation of the powers of Congress to raise revenue by uniform duties on any objects whatever, cannot be hazarded. The naturalization of French vessels will, of course, be considered as inadmissible.

Art. VIII. The stipulation of doing us good offices, to secure peace to the United States with the Barbary powers, has never yet procured us any advantage. If, therefore, the French Government lays any stress on this stipulation, as authorizing a claim for some other engagement from us in favor of France, it may be abandoned; and especially if its abrogation can be applied as a set-off against some existing French claim.

Art. XIV. If the alterations already proposed are made in the 23d or 24th articles, then the 14th article, as before observed, must be abolished.

Art. XVII. The construction put on this article by the Government of the United States is conceived to be reasonable and just, and is, therefore, to be insisted on. The tribunals of the respective countries will consequently be justified in taking cognizance of all captures made within their respective jurisdictions, or by illegal privateers; and those of one country will be deemed illegal which are fitted out in the country of the other remaining neutral; seeing to permit such arming would violate the neutral duties of the latter.

It will be expedient to fix explicitly the reception to be given to public ships of war of all nations. The French ministers have demanded that the public ships of the enemies of France, which at any time, and in any part of the world, had made prize of a French vessel, should be excluded from the ports of the United States, although they brought in no prize with them. In opposition to this demand, we have contended that they were to be excluded only when they came in with French prizes. And the kind of asylum to be afforded in all other circumstances is described in Mr. Jefferson's letter to Mr. Hammond, dated the 9th of September, 1793, in the following words: "Thus, then, the public ships of war of both nations (English and French) enjoy a perfect equality in our ports; first, in cases of urgent necessity; second, in cases of comfort or convenience; and third, in the time they choose to continue." And such shelter and accommodation are due to the public ships of all nations, on the principle of hospitality among friendly nations.

It will also be expedient explicitly to declare that the right of asylum stipulated for the armed vessels of France and their prizes gives no right to make sale of those prizes.

But when prize ships are so disabled as to be incapable of putting to sea again, until refitted, and when they are utterly disabled, some provision is necessary relative to their cargoes. Both cases occurred last year. The Government permitted, though with hesitation and caution, the cargoes to be unloaded, one of the vessels to be repaired, and part of the prize goods sold to pay for the repairs, and the cargo of the vessel that was found unfit even to go to sea again, was allowed to be exported as prize goods, even in neutral bottoms. The doubts on these occasions arose from the 24th article of the British treaty, forbidding the sale of the prizes of privateers, or the exchanging of the same in any manner whatever. But as French prizes were entitled to an asylum in our ports, it was conceived to be a reasonable construction of it, to allow of such proceedings as those above mentioned, to prevent the total loss of vessels and cargoes. The 25th article of the British treaty demands attention; as it is therein stipulated that no future treaty shall be made that shall be inconsistent with that or the 24th article. Another doubt arose, whether the British treaty did not, in good faith, require the prohibition of the sale of prizes made by the national ships of France, as well as of those made by her privateers, especially seeing our treaty with France gave her no right to sell any prizes whatever; but, upon the whole, it was conceived that the United States having before allowed the sale of such prizes, and the prohibition in the 24th article of the treaty being distinctly pointed against the sale of the prizes of privateers, it was thought proper to permit the former practice to continue, until the Executive should make and publish a prohibition of the sale of all prizes, or that Congress should pass a prohibitory law.

ART. XXII. If in new modelling the treaty with France, the total prohibition of the sale of prizes in the ports of the party remaining neutral should not be agreed on, at least the right of each power to make at its pleasure such prohibition, whether they are prizes of national ships or privateers, should be acknowledged, for the reason more than once suggested—to prevent a repetition of claims upon unfounded constructions; such as, under the present article, that a prohibition to an enemy of either party is a grant to the other of the thing forbidden.

ART. XXIII and XXIV. These have been already considered, and the alterations proposed have been mentioned.

There have been so many unjust causes and pretences assigned for capturing and confiscating American vessels, it may, perhaps, be impossible to guard against a repetition of them in any treaty which can be devised. To state the causes and pretences that have been already advanced by the Government of France, its agents, and tribunals, as the grounds of the capture and condemnation of American vessels and cargoes, would doubtless give pain to any man of an ingenuous mind, who should be employed on the part of France to negotiate another treaty, or a modification of the treaties which exist. It is not desired, therefore, to go further into detail on these matters than shall be necessary to guard, by explicit stipulations, against future misconstructions and the mischiefs they will naturally produce.

Under pretence that certain ports were surrendered to the English by the treachery of the French and Dutch inhabitants, Victor Hugues and Lebas, the special agents of the Executive Directory, at Guadaloupe, have declared that all neutral vessels bound to or from such ports, shall be good prize.

Under the pretence that the British were taking all neutral vessels bound to or from French ports, the French agents at St. Domingo, (Santhonax and others) decreed that all American vessels bound to or from English ports, should be captured; and they have since declared such captured vessels to be good prize. The French consuls in Spain have, on the same ground, condemned a number of American vessels, merely because they were destined to, or coming from, an English port.

Under the pretence that the sea-letters or passports prescribed by the commercial treaty, for the mutual advantage of the merchants and navigators of the two nations, to save their vessels from detention and other vexations, when met with at sea, by presenting so clear a proof of the property, are an indispensable document to be found on board, the French confiscate American vessels destitute of them, even when they acknowledge the property to be American.

Because horses and their military furniture, when destined to any enemy's port, are, by the 24th article of the commercial treaty, declared contraband, and as such by themselves only liable to confiscation, Hugues and Lebas decreed all neutral vessels, having horses or any other contraband goods on board, should be good prize; and they accordingly condemned vessels and cargoes.

The ancient ordinances of the French monarchs required a variety of papers to be on board neutral vessels, the want of any one of which is made a cause of condemnation; although the 25th article of the commercial treaty mentions what certificate shall accompany the merchant vessels and cargoes of each party, and which, by every reasonable construction, ought to give them protection.

It will therefore be advisable to guard against abuses by descending to particulars: to describe the ship's papers which shall be required, and to declare that the want of any other shall not be a cause for confiscation: to fix the mode of manning vessels as to the officers, and the proportion of the crews who shall be citizens; endeavoring to provide, in respect to American vessels, that more than one-third may be foreigners. This provision will be important to the southern States, which have but few native seamen.

The marine ordinances of France will show what regulations have been required to be observed by allied as well as neutral Powers in general, to ascertain and secure the property of neutrals. Some of these regulations may be highly proper to be adopted; while others may be inconvenient and burthensome. Your aim will be to render the documents and formalities as few and as simple as will consist with a fair and regular commerce.

ART. XXV and XXVII. These two articles should be rendered conformable to each other. The 27th says that, after the exhibition of the passport, the vessel shall be allowed to pass without molestation or search, without giving her chase, or forcing her to quit her intended course. The 25th requires that besides the passport, vessels shall be furnished with certain certificates, which of course must also be exhibited. It will be expedient to add that, if in the face of such evidence, the armed vessel will carry the other into port, and the papers are found conformable to treaty, the captors shall be condemned in all the charges, damages, and interest thereof, which they shall have caused. A provision of this nature is made in the 11th article of our treaty with the United Netherlands.

ART. XXVIII. The prohibited goods here mentioned have no relation to contraband, but merely to such as by the laws of the country are forbidden to be exported. Yet in the case of exporting horses from Virginia, which no law prohibited, in the winter of 1796, this article was applied by the French minister to horses, which by the French treaty are contraband of war. And a letter from the minister to Victor Hugues and Lebas, informing them that the American Government refused to prevent such export of horses by the British, is made one ground for their decree above mentioned.

ART. XXX. The vessels of the United States ought to be admitted into the ports of France in the same manner as the vessels of France are admitted into the ports of the United States. But such a stipulation ought not to authorize the admission of vessels of either party into the ports of the other, into which the admission of all foreign vessels shall be forbidden by the laws of France and of the United States, respectively. With this restriction, the principles of the 14th article of the treaty with Great Britain afford a liberal and unexceptionable precedent. A restriction like that here referred to, will be found in the first paragraph of the third article of the British treaty.

The commerce to the French colonies in the East and West Indies, will doubtless be more or less restricted, according to the usage of other European nations. Yet on account of the disarranged condition of the French navigation, probably a larger latitude of trade with their colonies will be readily permitted for a term of years: and perhaps the mutual advantages thence resulting will be found so great as to induce afterwards a prolongation of that term, to which the course of habit or business may contribute.

While between the United States and France there shall subsist a perfect reciprocity in respect to commerce, we must endeavor to extend our trade to her colonies to as many articles as possible. Of these the most important are provisions of all kinds, as beef, pork, flour, butter, cheese, fish, grain, pulse, live stock, and every other article serving for food, which is the produce of the country, horses, mules, timber, planks, and wood of all kinds, cabinet ware and other manufactures of the United States; and to obtain in return all the articles of the produce of those colonies, without exception, at least to the value of the cargoes carried to those colonies.

There have been different constructions of the consular Convention. The French have contended for the execution of their consular decisions, by the marshal or other officer of the United States; and their minister of justice has formally stated in a report to the minister of foreign affairs, that the judicial sentences of the American consuls in France will be executed by certain officers of justice in that country. The legal opinion of the law officers of the United States, which the Government has adopted, opposes such a construction. The French have also contended that deserters from French vessels ought to be apprehended by the judicial officers of the United States, upon other evidence than the original shipping paper, or rôle d'équipage; whereas the district judges have insisted that the consular Convention requires the original rôle to be produced. This claim was lately revived by the consul general of the French republic. The correspondence on this occasion will be joined to the other documents which accompany these instructions.

The United States cannot consent to the erecting of foreign tribunals within their jurisdiction. We consider the judicial authority of consuls, as described in the consular Convention, to be voluntary, not compulsory, in the country where they reside; and that their decisions, if not obeyed by the parties respectively, must be enforced by the laws of their proper country; and such a provision you will see has been made in France, where a penalty of fourteen hundred livres is imposed on the citizen who refuses obedience to a consular decision in a foreign state.

The consular Convention will expire in about four years; and if any great difficulties arise in settling the terms of a new one, that which exists must take its course: but if the French Government should be silent on the subject of the consular Convention, silence may be observed on your part.

The ports of the United States being frequented by the vessels of different belligerent Powers, it became necessary to regulate the times of their sailing. The President, therefore, adopted what was understood to be the received rule in Europe; and ordered that, after the sailing of a vessel of one of the belligerent Powers, twenty-four hours should elapse before an armed vessel of an enemy of the former should set sail. This rule has not been duly respected by the armed vessels of France and Great Britain.

As the tranquillity of the United States requires that no hostile movements be commenced within their jusisdiction, and the interests of commerce demand an entire freedom to the departure of vessels from their ports, it may be expedient expressly to recognize the above mentioned rule.

It will also be expedient to agree on the extent of territorial jurisdiction on the seacoast, and in what situations bays and sounds may be said to be land-locked, and within the jurisdiction of the sovereign of the adjacent country.

On the supposition that a treaty will be negotiated to alter and amend the treaties which now exist between France and the United States, the following leading principles, to govern the negotiation, are subjoined:

1. Conscious integrity authorizes the Government to insist, that no blame or censure be directly, or indirectly, imputed to the United States. But, on the other hand, however exceptionable in the view of our own Government, and in the eyes of an impartial world, may have been the conduct of France, yet she may be unwilling to acknowledge any aggressions, and we do not wish to wound her feelings, or to excite resentment. It will therefore be best to adopt, on this point, the principle of the British treaty, and "terminate our differences in such manner, as, without referring to the merits of our respective complaints and pretensions, may be the best calculated to produce mutual satisfaction and good understanding."
2. That no aid be stipulated in favor of France during the present war.
3. That no engagement be made inconsistent with the obligations of any prior treaty.
4. That no restraint on our lawful commerce with any other nation be admitted.
5. That no stipulation be made, under color of which tribunals can be established within our jurisdiction, or personal privileges claimed by French citizens incompatible with the complete sovereignty and independence of the United States, in matters of policy, commerce, and government.

It will be expedient to limit the duration of the treaty to a term of from ten to twenty years. Such changes in the circumstances of the two parties are likely to happen within either of those periods, as to give one or both good reason to desire a change in the conditions of the treaty. From this limitation may be excepted such articles as are declaratory of a state of peace, or as are intended to regulate the conduct of the two nations at the commencement of, or during a state of war, or which are founded in morality and justice, and are, in their nature, of perpetual obligation. Of this kind may be considered the tenth article of the treaty with Great Britain; which therefore may very properly be introduced into the treaty with France.

Finally, the great object of the Government being to do justice to France and her citizens, if in any thing we have injured them; to obtain justice for the multiplied injuries they have committed against us, and to preserve peace; your style and manner of proceeding will be such as shall most directly tend to secure these objects. There may be such a change of men and measures in France as will authorize, perhaps render politic, the use of strong language in describing the treatment we have received. On the other hand, the French Government may be determined to frustrate the negotiation, and throw the odium on this country; in which case, any thing like warmth and harshness would be made the pretext. If things remain in their present situation the style of representation will unite, as much as possible, calm dignity with simplicity, force of sentiment with mildness of language, and be calculated to impress an idea of inflexible perseverance, rather than of distrust or confidence.

With these instructions you will receive the following documents:

1. The printed state papers, containing the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the French minister, Mr. Genet.
2. The letter, dated January 16th, 1797, from the Secretary of State to General Pinckney, and the documents therein referred to, in which all the known complaints of the French Government, since the recall of Mr. Genet, are exhibited and discussed.
3. A report from the Secretary of State to the House of Representatives, dated the 27th of February, 1797, exhibiting the state of American claims which had been presented to the French Government, (but few of which had been satisfied) together with some further information relative to the depredations by the officers and people of that nation on the commerce of the United States.
4. A report made by the Secretary of State to the President of the United States, on the 21st of June, 1797, and by him laid before Congress on the 22d.
5. Certain original depositions, protests, and other papers relative to the French spoliations on the commerce, and personal insults and injuries to the citizens of the United States.
6. The documents laid before the House of Representatives, the 17th of May, 1797, relative to General Pinckney's mission to Paris, and comprehending some papers relative to the capture and condemnation of American vessels by the French.
7. The correspondence with the French Consul General, Létombe, relative to the consular convention.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 3, 1798.

The names designated by the letters W. X. Y. Z. in the following copies of letters from the envoys of the United States to the French republic, are, in the originals, written at full length, in ciphers. For the same reason that single letters are thus taken to designate certain persons named in the letters, other words descriptive of them are omitted.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

DESPATCHES FROM THE ENVOYS TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

No. 1.

PARIS, October 22, 1797.

DEAR SIR:

All of us having arrived at Paris on the evening of the 4th instant, on the next day we verbally, and unofficially, informed the Minister of Foreign Affairs therewith, and desired to know when he would be at leisure to receive one of our secretaries with the official notification. He appointed the next day at two o'clock, when Major Rutledge waited on him with the following letter:

CITIZEN MINISTER: The United States of America being desirous of terminating all differences between them and the French republic, and of restoring that harmony and good understanding, and that commercial and friendly intercourse, which from the commencement of their political connexion until lately have so happily subsisted, the President has nominated, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, has appointed us, the undersigned, jointly and severally, envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French republic, for the purpose of accomplishing these great objects. In pursuance of such nomination and appointment, and with such view, having come to Paris, we wish, citizen minister, to wait on you at any hour you will be pleased to appoint, to present the copy of our letters of credence; and whilst we evince our sincere and ardent desire for the speedy restoration of friendship and harmony between the two republics, we flatter ourselves with your concurrence in the accomplishment of this desirable event. We request you will accept the assurances of our perfect esteem and consideration,

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY,
JOHN MARSHALL,
ELBRIDGE GERRY.

PARIS, October 6, in the 22d year of American Independence.

To this letter the minister gave a verbal answer, that he would see us the day after the morrow, (the 8th) at one o'clock. Accordingly, at that hour and day we waited on the minister at his house, where his office is held, when, being informed he was not at home, the Secretary General of the department told Major Rutledge that the minister was obliged to wait on the Directory, and requested we would suspend our visit till three o'clock; at which hour we called. The minister we found was then engaged with the Portuguese minister, who retired in about ten minutes, when we were introduced and produced the copy of our letters of credence, which the minister perused and kept. He informed us, "that the Directory had required him to make a report relative to the situation of the United States with regard to France, which he was then about, and which would be finished in a few days, when he would let us know what steps were to follow." We asked if cards of hospitality were in the mean time necessary? He said they were, and that they should be delivered to us; and he immediately rung for his secretary, and directed him to make them out. The conversation was carried on by him in French, and by us in our own language.

The next day cards of hospitality were sent to us and our secretaries, in a style suitable to our official character.

On Saturday, the 14th, Major Mountflorence informed General Pinckney that he had had a conversation with Mr. Osmond, the private and confidential secretary of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who told him that the Directory were greatly exasperated at some parts of the President's speech, at the opening of the last session of Congress, and would require an explanation of them from us. The particular parts were not mentioned. In another conversation, on the same day, the secretary informed the major that the minister had told him it was probable we should not have a public audience of the Directory till such time as our negotiation was finished; that probably persons might be appointed to treat with us, but they would report to him, and he would have the direction of the negotiation. The major did not conceal from Mr. Osmond his intention to communicate these conversations to us.

In the morning of October the 18th, Mr. W., of the house of ——, called on General Pinckney and informed him that a Mr. X., who was in Paris, and whom the General had seen, * * * * * was a gentleman of considerable credit and reputation, * * * * * and that we might place great reliance on him.

In the evening of the same day, Mr. X. called on General Pinckney, and after having sat some time, * * * whispered him that he had a message from M. Talleyrand to communicate when he was at leisure. General Pinckney immediately withdrew with him into another room; and, when they were alone, Mr. X. said that he was charged with a business in which he was a novice; that he had been acquainted with M. Talleyrand, * * * * and that he was sure he had a great regard for [America] and its citizens; and was very desirous that a reconciliation should be brought about with France; that, to effectuate that end, he was ready, if it was thought proper, to suggest a plan, confidentially, that M. Talleyrand expected would answer the purpose. General Pinckney said he should be glad to hear it. M. X. replied that the Directory, and particularly two of the members of it, were exceedingly irritated at some passages of the President's speech, and desired that they should be softened; and that this step would be necessary previous to our reception. That, besides this, a sum of money was required for the pocket of the Directory and ministers, which would be at the disposal of M. Talleyrand; and that a loan would also be insisted on. M. X. said if we acceded to these measures, M. Talleyrand had no doubt that all our differences with France might be accommodated. On inquiry, M. X. could not point out the particular passages of the speech that had given offence, nor the quantum of the loan, but mentioned that the douceur for the pocket was twelve hundred thousand livres, about fifty thousand pounds sterling. General Pinckney told him, his colleagues and himself, from the time of their arrival here, had been treated with great slight and disrespect; that they earnestly wished for peace and reconciliation with France; and had been entrusted by their country with very great powers, to obtain these ends on honorable terms; that, with regard to the propositions made, he could not even consider of them before he had communicated them to his colleagues; that, after he had done so, he should hear from him. After a communication and consultation had, it was agreed that General Pinckney should call on M. X. and request him to make his propositions to us all; and, for fear of mistake or misapprehension, that he should be requested to reduce the heads into writing. Accordingly, on the morning of October 19, General Pinckney called on M. X., who consented to see his colleagues in the evening, and to reduce his propositions to writing. He said his communication was not immediately with M. Talleyrand, but through another gentleman in whom M. Talleyrand had great confidence. This proved afterwards to be M. Y.

At six in the evening, M. X. came and left with us the first set of propositions, which, translated from the French, are as follows: "A person who possesses the confidence of the Directory, on what relates to the affairs of America, convinced of the mutual advantages which would result from the re-establishment of the good understanding between the two nations, proposes to employ all of his influence to obtain this object. He will assist the commissioners of the United States in all the demands which they may have to make from the Government of France, inasmuch as they may not be contradictory to those which he proposes himself to make, and of which the principal will be communicated confidentially. It is desired that in the official communications there should be given a softening turn to a part of the President's speech to Congress, which has caused much irritation. It is feared that, in not satisfying certain individuals in this respect, they may give way to all their resentment. The nomination of commissioners will be consented to on the same footing as they have been named in the treaty with England, to decide on the reclamations which individuals of America may make on the Government of France, or on French individuals. The payment which, agreeably to the decisions of the commissioners, shall fall to the share of the French Government, are to be advanced by the American Government itself. It is desired that the funds which, by this means, shall enter again into the American trade, should be employed in new supplies for the French colonies. Engagements of this nature, on the part of individuals reclaiming, will always hasten, in all probability, the decisions of the French commissioners; and perhaps it may be desired that this clause should make a part of the instructions which the Government of the United States should give to the commissioners they may choose. The French Government desires, besides, to obtain a loan from the United States; but so that that should not give any jealousy to the English Government, nor hurt the neutrality of the United States. This loan shall be masked by stipulating, that the Government of the United States consents to make the advances for the payment of the debts contracted by the agents of the French Government with the citizens of the United States, and which are already acknowledged, and the payment ordered by the Directory, but without having been yet effectuated. There should be delivered a note to the amount of these debts. Probably this note may be accompanied by ostensible pieces, which will guarantee to the agents the responsibility of the United States, in case any umbrage should cause an inquiry. There shall also be first taken from this loan certain sums for the purpose of making the customary distributions in diplomatic affairs." The person of note mentioned in the minutes, who had the confidence of the Directory, he said, before us all, was M. Talleyrand. The amount of the loan he could not ascertain precisely, but understood it would be according to our ability to pay. The sum which would be considered as proper, according to diplomatic usage, was about twelve hundred thousand livres. He could not state to us what parts of the President's speech were excepted to, but said he would inquire and inform us. He agreed to breakfast with Mr. Gerry the morning of the 21st, in order to make such explanations as we had then requested, or should think proper to request; but, on the morning of the 20th, M. X. called, and said that M. Y., the confidential friend of M. Talleyrand, instead of communicating with us through M. X. would see us himself and make the necessary explanations. We appointed to meet him the evening of the 20th at seven o'clock, in General Marshall's room. At seven, M. Y. and M. X. entered; and the first mentioned gentleman, being introduced to us as the confidential friend of M. Talleyrand, immediately stated to us the favorable impressions of that gentleman towards our country—impressions which were made by the kindness and civilities he had personally received in America. That impressed by his solicitude to repay these kindnesses, he was willing to aid us in the present negotiation by his good offices with the Directory, who were, he said, extremely irritated against the Government of the United States, on account of some parts of the President's speech, and who had neither acknowledged nor received us, and consequently have not authorized M. Talleyrand to have any communications with us. The minister therefore could not see us himself, but had authorized his friend M. Y. to communicate to us certain propositions, and to receive our answers to them; and to promise, on his part, that if we would engage to consider them as the basis of the proposed negotiation, he would intercede with the Directory to acknowledge us, and to give us a public audience. M. Y. stated to us, explicitly and repeatedly, that he was clothed with no authority; that he was not a diplomatic character; that he was not * * * he was only the friend of M. Talleyrand, and trusted by him; that, with regard to himself, he had * * * * * * and that he earnestly wished well to the United States. He then took out of his pocket a French translation of the President's speech, the parts of which, objected to by the Directory, were marked, agreeably to our request to M. X., and are contained in the exhibit A. Then he made us the second set of propositions, which were dictated by him and written by M. X. in our presence, and delivered to us, and which, translated from the French, are as follows: "There is demanded a formal disavowal in writing, declaring that the speech of the citizen president, Barras, did not contain any thing offensive to the Government of the United States, nor any thing which deserved the epithets contained in the whole paragraph. Secondly, reparation is demanded for the article by which it shall be declared, that the decree of the Directory there mentioned did not contain any thing contrary to the treaty of 1778, and had none of those fatal consequences that the paragraph reproaches to it. Thirdly, it is demanded that there should be an acknowledgment, in writing, of the depredations exercised on our trade by the English and French privateers. Fourthly, the Government of France, faithful to the profession of public faith, which it has made not to intermeddle in the internal affairs of foreign Governments with which it is at peace, would look upon this paragraph as an attack upon its loyalty, if this was intended by the President. It demands, in consequence, a formal declaration that it is not the Government of France, nor its agents, that this paragraph meant to designate. In consideration of these reparations, the French republic is disposed to renew with the United States of America a treaty which shall place them reciprocally in the same state that they were in 1778. By this new treaty, France shall be placed, with respect to the United States, exactly on the same footing as they stand with England, in virtue of the last treaty which has been concluded between them. A secret article of this new treaty would be a loan to be made by the United States to the French republic; and, once agreed upon the amount of the loan, it would be endeavored to consult the convenience of the United States with respect to the best method of preventing its publicity."

On reading the speech M. Y. dilated very much upon the keenness of the resentment it had produced, and expatiated largely on the satisfaction he said was indispensably necessary as a preliminary to negotiation. "But, said he, gentlemen, I will not disguise from you, that this satisfaction being made, the essential part of the treaty remains to be adjusted; il faut de l'argent—il faut beaucoup d'argent;" you must pay money, you must pay a great deal of money. He spoke much of the force, the honor, and the jealous republican pride of France; and represented to us strongly the advantages which we should derive from the neutrality thus to be purchased. He said that the receipt of the money might be so disguised as to prevent its being considered as a breach of neutrality by England; and thus save us from being embroiled with that power. Concerning the twelve hundred thousand livres little was said; that being completely understood, on all sides, to be required for the officers of Government, and, therefore, needing no further explanation. These propositions, he said, being considered as the admitted basis of the proposed treaty, M. Talleyrand trusted that, by his influence with the Directory, he could prevail on the Government to receive us. We asked whether we were to consider it as certain, that, without a previous stipulation to the effect required, we were not to be received. He answered that M. Talleyrand himself was not authorized to speak to us the will of the Directory, and consequently could not authorize him. The conversation continued until half after nine, when they left us; having engaged to breakfast with Mr. Gerry the next morning.

October the 21st, M. X. came before nine o'clock; M. Y. did not come until ten: he had passed the morning with M. Talleyrand. After breakfast the subject was immediately resumed. He represented to us, that we were not yet acknowledged or received; that the Directory were so exasperated against the United States, as to have come to a determination to demand from us, previous to our reception, those disavowals, reparations, and explanations, which were stated at large last evening. He said that M. Talleyrand and himself were extremely sensible of the pain we must feel in complying with this demand; but that the Directory would not dispense with it; that, therefore, we must consider it as the indispensable preliminary to obtain our reception, unless we could find the means to change their determination in this particular; that if we satisfied the Directory in these particulars, a letter would be written to us to demand the extent of our powers, and to know whether we were authorized to place them precisely on the same footing with England; whether, he said, our full powers were really and substantially full powers; or, like those of Lord Malmesbury, only illusory powers; that, if to this demand our answer should be affirmative, then France would consent that commissioners should be appointed to ascertain the claims of the United States, in like manner as under our treaty with England; but from their jurisdiction must be withdrawn those which were condemned for want of a rôle d'équipage; that being a point on which Merlin, while minister of justice, had written a treatise, and on which the Directory were decided. There would, however, be no objection to our complaining of these captures in the course of the negotiation; and if we could convince Merlin by our reasoning, the minister would himself be satisfied with our so doing. We required an explanation of that part of the conversation, in which M. Y. had hinted at our finding means to avert the demand concerning the President's speech. He answered, that he was not authorized to state those means, but that we must search for them and propose them ourselves. If, however, we asked his opinion as a private individual, and would receive it as coming from him, he would suggest to us the means which, in his opinion, would succeed. On being asked to suggest the means, he answered, money; that the Directory were jealous of its own honor and of the honor of the nation; that it insisted on receiving from us the same respect with which we had treated the King; that this honor must be maintained in the manner before required, unless we substituted, in the place of those reparations, something, perhaps, more valuable, that was money. He said further, that if we desired him to point out the sum which he believed would be satisfactory, he would do so. We requested him to proceed; and he said that there were thirty-two millions of florins, of Dutch inscriptions, worth ten shillings in the pound, which might be assigned to us at twenty shillings in the pound; and he proceeded to state to us the certainty that, after a peace, the Dutch Government would repay us the money; so that we should ultimately lose nothing, and the only operation of the measure would be, an advance from us to France of thirty-two millions, on the credit of the Government of Holland. We asked him whether the fifty thousand pounds sterling, as a douceur to the Directory, must be in addition to this sum. He answered in the affirmative. We told him that, on the subject of the treaty, we had no hesitation in saying that our powers were ample; that, on the other points proposed to us, we would retire into another room, and return in a few minutes with our answer.

We committed immediately to writing the answer we proposed, in the following words: "Our powers respecting a treaty are ample; but the proposition of a loan, in the form of Dutch inscriptions, or in any other form, is not within the limits of our instructions; upon this point, therefore, the Government must be consulted; one of the American ministers will, for the purpose, forthwith embark for America; provided the Directory will suspend all further captures on American vessels, and will suspend proceedings on those already captured, as well where they have been already condemned, as where the decisions have not yet been rendered; and that where sales have been made, but the money not yet received by the captors, it shall not be paid until the preliminary questions, proposed to the ministers of the United States, be discussed and decided:" which was read as a verbal answer; and we told them they might copy it if they pleased. M. Y. refused to do so; his disappointment was apparent; he said we treated the money part of the proposition as if it had proceeded from the Directory; whereas, in fact, it did not proceed even from the minister, but was only a suggestion from himself, as a substitute to be proposed by us, in order to avoid the painful acknowledgment that the Directory had determined to demand of us. It was told him that we understood that matter perfectly; that we knew the proposition was in form to be ours; but that it came substantially from the minister. We asked what had led to our present conversation? And General Pinckney then repeated the first communication from M. X. (to the whole of which that gentleman assented) and we observed that those gentlemen had brought no testimonials of their speaking any thing from authority; but that, relying on the fair characters they bore, we had believed them when they said they were from the minister, and had conversed with them, in like manner, as if we were conversing with M. Talleyrand himself; and that we could not consider any suggestion M. Y. had made as not having been previously approved of; but yet, if he did not choose to take a memorandum in writing of our answer, we had no wish that he should do so; and further, if he chose to give the answer to his proposition the form of a proposition from ourselves, we could only tell him that we had no other proposition to make, relative to any advance of money on our part; that America had sustained deep and heavy losses by French depredations on our commerce, and that France had alleged so [many] complaints against the United States, that on those subjects we came fully prepared, and were not a little surprised to find France unwilling to hear us; and making demands upon us which could never have been suspected by our Government, and which had the appearance of our being the aggressing party. M. Y. expressed himself vehemently on the resentment of France; and complained that, instead of our proposing some substitute for the reparations demanded of us, we were stipulating certain conditions to be performed by the Directory itself; that he could not take charge of such propositions; and that the Directory would persist in its demand of those reparations which he at first stated. We answered that we could not help it; it was for the Directory to determine what course its own honor and the interests of France required it to pursue; it was for us to guard the interest and honor of our country. M. Y. observed that we had taken no notice of the first proposition, which was, to know whether we were ready to make the disavowal, reparations, and explanations, concerning the President's speech. We told him that we supposed it to be impossible that either he, or the minister, could imagine that such a proposition could require an answer; that we did not understand it as being seriously expected; but merely as introductory to the subjects of real consideration.

He spoke of the respect which the Directory required, and repeated, that it would exact as much as was paid to the ancient kings. We answered that America had demonstrated to the world, and especially to France, a much greater respect for her present government than for her former monarchy; and that there was no evidence of this disposition which ought to be required, that we were not ready to give. He said that we should certainly not be received; and seemed to shudder at the consequences. We told him, that America had made every possible effort to remain on friendly terms with France; that she was still making them: that if France would not hear us, but would make war on the United States, nothing remained for us but to regret the unavoidable necessity of defending ourselves.

The subject of our powers was again mentioned; and we told him, that America was solicitous to have no more misunderstandings with any republic, but especially with France; that she wished a permanent treaty, and was sensible that no treaty could be permanent, which did not comport with the interests of the parties; and, therefore, that he might be assured, that our powers were such as authorized us to place France on equal ground with England, in any respects in which an equality might be supposod to exist at present between them, to the disadvantage of France. The subject of the rôle d'équipage was also mentioned; and we asked what assurance we could have, if France insisted on the right of adding to the stipulations of our treaty, or of altering them by municipal regulations, that any future treaty we could make should be observed. M. Y. said that he did not assert the principle of changing treaties by municipal regulations; but that the Directory considered its regulation concerning the rôle d'équipage as comporting with the treaty. We observed to him, that none of our vessels had what the French termed the rôle d'équipage, and that if we were to surrender all the property which had been taken from our citizens in cases where their vessels were not furnished with such a rôle, the Government would be responsible to its citizens for the property so surrendered; since it would be impossible to undertake to assert, that there was any plausibility in the allegation, that our treaty required a rôle d'équipage.

The subject of disavowals, &c. concerning the President's speech was again mentioned; and it was observed that the constitution of the United States authorized and required our President to communicate his ideas on the affairs of the nation; that, in obedience to the constitution, he had done so; that we had not power to confirm or invalidate any part of the President's speech ; that such an attempt could produce no other effect than to make us ridiculous to the Government and to the citizens at large of the United States; and to produce, on the part of the President, an immediate disavowal and recall of us as his agents: that, independent of this, all America was acquainted with the facts stated by the President; and our disavowing them would not change the public sentiment concerning them.

We parted with mutual professions of personal respect, and with full indications on the part of M. Y. of his expectation that we should immediately receive the threatened letter.

The nature of the above communication will evince the necessity of secrecy; and we have promised Messrs. X. and Y. that their names shall, in no event, be made public.

We have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY,
J. MARSHALL,
E. GERRY.

P. S. October 27th, 1797. The definitive articles of peace are signed between the French republic and the emperor: the particulars you will find in the public prints. The Portuguese minister is ordered to quit France, as the treaty with Portugal has not been yet ratified by the Queen. The treaty itself is declared by the Directory to be void. Since our arrival in Paris the tribunal of cassation has rejected captain Scott's petition complaining of the condemnation of his vessel by the civil tribunal for the want of a rôle d'équipage. Mr.  in behalf of the owners of the American vessels, who have appealed in the last resort to the tribunal of cassation, informs, that notwithstanding all the arguments  made use of  to put off the hearing of the Rosanna, as a diplomatic case, till the issue of our negotiations is known, that case is set down for hearing, and will come on the 29th or 30th instant. The same  also says, that it is obvious, that the tribunal have received instructions from the officers of the Government to hasten their decisions, and that it was hardly worth while to  for all our petitions in cassation would be rejected. Our advocates  decline giving their sentiments on this subject  under an apprehension of committing themselves.

Col. PICKERING, Secretary of the United States.

Paragraphs of the President's Speech, referred to in Letter No. 1, under title of Exhibit A.

1. With this conduct of the French Government it will be proper to take into view the public audience given to the late minister of the United States, on his taking leave of the Executive Directory. The speech of the President discloses sentiments more alarming than the refusal of a minister, because more dangerous to our independence and union, and at the same time studiously marked with indignities against the Government of the United States. It evinces a disposition to separate the people of the United States from the Government; to persuade them, that they have different affections, principles, and interests, from those of their fellow-citizens, whom they themselves have chosen to manage their common concerns; and thus to produce divisions fatal to our peace. Such attempts ought to be repelled with a decision, which shall convince France and the world, that we are not a degraded people, humiliated under a colonial spirit of fear, and sense of inferiority, fitted to be the miserable instruments of foreign influence, and regardless of national honor, character, and interest.

II. The diplomatic intercourse between the United States and France being at present suspended, the Government has no means of obtaining official information from that country; nevertheless there is reason to believe that the Executive Directory passed a decree on the 2d of March last, contravening, in part, the treaty of amity and commerce of 1778, injurious to our lawful commerce, and endangering the lives of our citizens. A copy of this decree will be laid before you.

III. While we are endeavoring to adjust all our differences with France, by amicable negotiation, the progress of the war in Europe, the depredations on our commerce, the personal injuries to our citizens, and the general complexion of affairs, render it my indispensable duty to recommend to your consideration effectual measures of defence.

IV. It is impossible to conceal from ourselves, or the world, what has been before observed, that endeavors have been employed to foster and establish a division between the Government and people of the United States. To investigate the causes which have encouraged this attempt is not necessary. But to repel, by decided and united councils, insinuations so derogatory to the honor, and aggressions so dangerous to the constitution, union, and even independence of the nation, is an indispensable duty.

Answer of M. Barras, President of the Executive Directory, to the speech of Mr. Monroe, on taking leave, to which the speech of the President of the United States refers.

M. le ministre plénipotentiare des Etats Unis d'Amérique.

En présentant aujourd'hui au Directoire Exécutif vos lettres de rappel, vous donnez à l'Europe un spectacle bien étrange.

La France, riche de sa liberté, entourée du cortège de ses victoires, forte de l'estime de ses alliés, ne s'abaissera pas a calculer les suites de la condescendance du gouvernement Américain pour les suggestions de ses anciens tyrans. La république Française espère, au surplus, que les successeurs de Colombus, Ramhiph* et Penn, toujours fiers de leur liberté, n'oublieront jomais qu'ils la doivent à la France. Ils péseront dans leur sagesse la magnanime bienveillance du peuple Français avec les astucieuses caresses de quelques perfides qui méditent de le ramener à son antique esclavage. Assurez, M. le ministre, le bon peuple Américain que, comme lui, nous adorons la liberté; que toujours il aura notre estime, et qu'il trouvera das le peuple Français, la générosité républicaine qui sait accorder la paix comme elle sait faire respecter sa souveraineté.

Quant à vous, M. le ministre plénipotentiaire, vous avez combattu pour les vrais intérêts de votre patrie. Partez avec nos regrets. Nous rendons en vous un représentant à l'Amérique, et nous retenons le souvenir du citoyen dont les qualités personelles honoraient ce titre.

Mr. minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

By presenting to-day your letters of recall to the Executive Directory, you give to Europe a very strange spectacle.

France, rich in her liberty, surrounded by a train of victories, strong in the esteem of her allies, will not abase herself by calculating the consequences of the condescension of the American Government to the suggestions of her former tyrants. Moreover, the French republic hopes, that the successors of Columbus, Ramhiph,* and Penn, always proud of their liberty, will never forget that they owe it to France. They will weigh in their wisdom, the magnanimous benevolence of the French people with the crafty caresses of certain perfidious persons who meditate bringing them back to their former slavery. Assure the good American people, sir, that, like them, we adore liberty; that they will always have our esteem, and that they will find in the French people, republican generosity, which knows how to grant peace, as it does to cause its sovereignty to be respected.

As to you, Mr. minister plenipotentiary, you have combated for principles; you have known the true interests of your country. Depart with our regret. In you we give up a representative to America, and retain the remembrance of the citizen whose personal qualities did honor to that title.

No. 2.

PARIS, November 8, 1797.

DEAR SIR:

We now enclose you, in thirty-six quarto pages of cipher, and in eight pages of ciphered exhibits, the sequel to the details commenced in No. 1, dated the 22d of last month, and have the honor to be, &c.

C. C. PINCKNEY,
J. MARSHALL,
E. GERRY.

Colonel PICKERING.

OCTOBER, 27, 1797.

About twelve we received another visit from M. X. He immediately mentioned the great event announced in the papers, and then said, that some proposals from us had been expected on the subject on which we had before conversed: that the Directory were becoming impatient, and would take a decided course with regard to America, if we could not soften them. We answered, that on that subject we had already spoken explicitly, and had nothing further to add. He mentioned the change in the state of things which had been produced by the peace with the emperor, as warranting an expectation of a change in our system; to which we only replied, that this event had been expected by us, and would not, in any degree, affect our conduct. M. X. urged, that the Directory had, since this peace, taken a higher and more decided tone with respect to us, and all other neutral nations, than had been before taken; that it had been determined, that all nations should aid them, or be considered and treated as their enemies. We answered, that such an effect had already been contemplated by us, as probable, and had not been overlooked when we gave to this proposition our decided answer; and further, that we had no powers to negotiate for a loan of money; that our Government had not contemplated such a circumstance in any degree whatever; that if we should stipulate a loan, it would be a perfectly void thing, and would only deceive France, and expose ourselves. M. X. again expatiated on the power and violence of France: he urged the danger of our situation, and pressed the policy of softening them, and of thereby obtaining time. The present men, he said, would very probably not continue long in power, and it would be very unfortunate if those who might succeed, with better dispositions towards us, should find the two nations in actual war. We answered, that if war should be made on us by France, it would be so obviously forced on us, that, on a change of men, peace might be made with as much facility as the present differences could be accommodated. We added, that all America deprecated a war with France; but that our present situation was more ruinous to us than a declared war could be; that at present our commerce was plundered unprotected; but that if war was declared, we should seek the means of protection. M. X. said, he hoped we should not form a connexion with Britain; and we answered, that we hoped so too; that we had all been engaged in our Revolutionary war, and felt its injuries; that it had made the deepest impression on us; but that if France should attack us, we must seek the best means of self-defence. M. X. again returned to the subject of money: Said he, gentlemen, you do not speak to the point; it is money: it is expected that you will offer money. We said that we had spoken to that point very explicitly: we had given an answer. No, said he, you have not: what is your answer? We replied, it is no; no; not a sixpence. He again called our attention to the dangers which threatened our country, and asked, if it would not be prudent, though we might not make a loan to the nation, to interest an influential friend in our favor. He said we ought to consider what men we had to treat with; that they disregarded the justice of our claims, and the reasoning with which we might support them; that they disregarded their own colonies, and considered themselves as perfectly invulnerable with respect to us; that we could only acquire an interest among them by a judicious application of money, and it was for us to consider, whether the situation of our country did not require that these means should be resorted to. We observed, that the conduct of the French Government was such as to leave us much reason to fear, that should we give the money, it would effect no good purpose, and would not produce a just mode of thinking with respect to us. Proof of this must first be given us. He said, that when we employed a lawyer, we gave him a fee, without knowing whether the cause would be gained or not; but it was necessary to have one, and we paid for his services, whether those services were successful or not: so, in the present state of things, the money must be advanced for the good offices the individuals were to render, whatever might be the effect of those good offices. We told him there was no parallel in the case; that a lawyer, not being to render the judgment, could not command success; he could only endeavor to obtain it; and consequently, we could only pay him for his endeavors; but the Directory could decide on the issue of our negotiation. It had only to order, that no more American vessels should be seized, and to direct those now in custody to be restored, and there could be no opposition to the order. He said, that all the members of the Directory were not disposed to receive our money: that Merlin, for instance, was paid from another quarter, and would touch no part of the douceur which was to come from us. We replied, that we had understood that Merlin was paid by the owners of the privateers: and he nodded an assent to the fact. He proceeded to press this subject with vast perseverance. He told us that we paid money to obtain peace with the Algerines, and with the Indians; and that it was doing no more to pay France for peace.

To this it was answered, that when our Government commenced a treaty with either Algiers or the Indian tribes, it was understood that money was to form the basis of the treaty, and was its essential article; that the whole nation knew it, and was prepared to expect it as a thing of course; but that in treating with France, our Government had supposed, that a proposition, such as he spoke of, would, if made by us, give mortal offence. He asked if our Government did not know, that nothing was to be obtained here without money? We replied, that our Government had not even suspected such a state of things. He appeared surprised at it, and said, that there was not an American in Paris who could not have given that information. We told him, that the letters of our minister had indicated a very contrary temper in the Government of France; and had represented it as acting entirely upon principle, and as feeling a very pure and disinterested affection for America. He looked somewhat surprised; and said briskly to General Pinckney, Well, sir, you have been a long time in France and in Holland; what do you think of it? General Pinckney answered, that he considered M. X. and M. Y. as men of truth, and, of consequence, he could have but one opinion on the subject. He stated, that Hamburg, and other States of Europe, were obliged to buy a peace; and that it would be equally for our interest to do so. Once more he spoke of the danger of a breach with France, and of her power, which nothing could resist. We told him that it would be in vain for us to deny her power, or the solicitude we felt to avoid a contest with it; that no nation estimated her power more highly than America, or wished more to be on amicable terms with her; but that one object was still dearer to us than the friendship of France, which was our national independence: that America had taken a neutral station: she had a right to take it: no nation had a right to force us out of it: that to lend a sum of money to a belligerent power, abounding in every thing requisite for war but money, was to relinquish our neutrality, and take part in the war; to lend this money, under the lash and coercion of France, was to relinquish the government of ourselves, and to submit to a foreign Government imposed upon us by force: that we would make at least one manly struggle before we thus surrendered our national independence: that our case was different from that of one of the minor nations of Europe; they were unable to maintain their independence, and did not expect to do so: America was a great, and, so far as concerned her self-defence, a powerful nation—she was able to maintain her independence; and must deserve to lose it, if she permitted it to be wrested from her—that France and Britain had been at war for near fifty years of the last hundred, and might probably be at war for fifty years of the century to come; that America had no motives which could induce her to involve herself in those wars; and that if she now preserved her neutrality and her independence, it was most probable that she would not in future be afraid, as she had been for four years past—but if she now surrendered her rights of self-government to France, or permitted them to be torn from her, she could not expect to recover them, or to remain neutral in any future war. He said that France had lent us money during our revolutionary war, and only required that we should now exhibit the same friendship for her. We answered, that the cases were very different; that America solicited a loan from France, and left her at liberty to grant or refuse it: but that France demanded it from America, and left us no choice on the subject. We also told him that there was another difference in the cases; that the money was lent by France for great national and French objects; it was lent to maim a rival and an enemy whom she hated; that the money, if lent by America, would not be for any American objects, but to enable France to extend still further her conquests. The conversation continued for nearly two hours; and the public and private advance of money was pressed and re-pressed in a variety of forms. At length M. X. said that he did not blame us; that our determination was certainly proper, if we could keep it; but he showed decidedly his opinion to be that we could not keep it. He said that he would communicate, as nearly as he could, our conversation to the minister, or to M. Y. to be given by him to the minister; we are not certain which. We then separated. On the 22d of October, M. Z. a French gentleman of respectable character, informed Mr. Gerry, that M. Talleyrand, Minister of Foreign Relations, who professed to be well disposed towards the United States, had expected to have seen the American ministers frequently in their private capacities; and to have conferred with them individually on the objects of their mission; and had authorized M. Z. to make this communication to Mr. Gerry. The latter sent for his colleagues; and a conference was held with M. Z. on the subject; in which General Pinckney and General Marshall expressed their opinions, that not being acquainted with M. Talleyrand, they could not, with propriety, call on him; but that, according to the custom of France, he might expect this of Mr. Gerry, from a previous acquaintance in America. This Mr. Gerry reluctantly complied with on the 23d, and with M. Z. called on M. Talleyrand, who, not being then at his office, appointed the 28th for the interview. After the first introduction, M. Talleyrand began the conference. He said that the Directory had passed an arrêt, which he offered for perusal, in which they had demanded of the envoys an explanation of some parts, and a reparation for others, of the President's speech to Congress, of the 16th of May last: he was sensible, he said, that difficulties would exist on the part of the envoys relative to this demand; but that by their offering money, he thought he could prevent the effect of the arrêt. M. Z. at the request of Mr. Gerry, having stated that the envoys have no such powers, M. Talleyrand replied, they can in such case take a power on themselves; and proposed that they should make a loan. Mr. Gerry then addressed M. Talleyrand distinctly in English, which he said he understood, and stated, that the uneasiness of the Directory resulting from the President's speech was a subject unconnected with the objects of the mission: that M. Barras, in his speech to Mr. Monroe, on his recall, had expressed himself in a manner displeasing to the Government and citizens of the United States; that the President, as the envoys conceived, had made such observations on M. Barras's speech as were necessary to vindicate the honor of the United States; that this was not considered by our Government as a subject of dispute between the two nations; that having no instructions respecting it, we could not make any explanations or reparations relating to it; and that M. Talleyrand himself was sufficiently acquainted with the constitution of the United States, to be convinced of the truth of these observations. Mr. Gerry further stated, that the powers of the envoys, as they conceived, were adequate to the discussion and adjustment of all points of real difference between the two nations; that they could alter and amend the treaty; or, if necessary, form a new one; that the United States were anxiously desirous of removing all causes of complaint between themselves and France, and of renewing their former friendship and intercourse, on terms which should be mutually honorable and beneficial to the two nations; but not on any other terms; that as to a loan, we had no powers whatever to make one; that if we were to attempt it, we should deceive himself and the Directory likewise, which, as men of honor, we could not do; but that we could send one of our number for instructions on this proposition, if deemed expedient, provided that the other objects of the negotiation could be discussed and adjusted; that as he had expressed a desire to confer with the envoys individually, it was the wish of Mr. Gerry that such a conference should take place, and their opinions thus be ascertained, which he conceived corresponded with his own in the particulars mentioned. M. Talleyrand, in answer said, he should be glad to confer with the other envoys individually, but that this matter about the money must be settled directly, without sending to America; that he would not communicate the arrêt for a week; and that if we could adjust the difficulty respecting the speech, an application would nevertheless go to the United States for a loan. A courier arriving at this moment from Italy, and M. Talleyrand appearing impatient to read the letters, Mr. Gerry took leave of him immediately. He followed to the door, and desired M. Z. to repeat to Mr. Gerry, what he, M. Talleyrand, had said to him. Mr. Gerry then returned to his quarters with M. Z. took down the particulars of this interview, as before stated, sent for Generals Pinckney and Marshall, and read it to them in the presence of M. Z. who confirmed it. Generals Pinckney and Marshall then desired M. Z. to inform M. Talleyrand that they had nothing to add to this conference, and did not wish that the arrêt might be delayed on their account.

October 29.

M. X. again called on us. He said, M. Talleyrand was extremely anxious to be of service to us, and had requested that one more effort should be made to induce us to enable him to be so. A great deal of the same conversation which had passed at our former interviews was repeated. The power and the haughtiness of France was again displayed to us. We were told that the destruction of England was inevitable; and that the wealth and arts of that nation would naturally pass over to America, if that event should find us in peace. To this observation we replied, that France would probably forbid America to receive them, in like manner as she had forbid Switzerland to permit the residence, in its country, of a British minister. We told him also, that we were sensible of the value of peace, and therefore sought it, unremittingly, but that it was real peace we sought for, and real peace only which could be desirable.

The sum of his proposition was, that if we would pay, by way of fees, (that was his expression) the sum of money demanded for private use, the Directory would not receive us: but would permit us to remain at Paris as we now were; and we should be received by M. Talleyrand, until one of us could go to America and consult our Government on the subject of the loan. These were the circumstances, he said, under which the minister of Portugal had treated. We asked him if, in the mean time, the Directory would order the American property, not yet passed into the hands of the privateersmen, to be restored? He said, explicitly, that they would not. We asked him, whether they would suspend further depredations on our commerce? He said they would not: but M. Talleyrand observed, that on this subject we could not sustain much additional injury; because the winter season was approaching, when few additional captures could be made. We told him that France had taken violently from America more than fifteen millions of dollars, and treated us, in every respect, as enemies, in return for the friendship we had manifested for her; that we had come to endeavor to restore harmony to the two nations, and to obtain compensation for the injuries our countrymen had sustained; and that in lieu of this compensation, we were told, that if we would pay twelve hundred thousand livres, we might be permitted to remain in Paris; which would only give us the benefit of seeing the plays and operas of Paris for the winter, that we might have time to ask from our country to exhaust her resources for France, whose depredations would be continued. He again stated, that by this procedure we should suspend a war; and that perhaps in five or six months power might change hands.

We told him that what we wished to see in France was a temper sincerely friendly to the United States, and really disposed to do us justice; that if we could perceive this, we might not so much regard a little money, such as he stated to be usual, although we should hazard ourselves by giving it; but that we saw only evidences of the most extreme hostility towards us: war was made upon us so far as France could make it in the present state of things; and it was not even proposed, that on receiving our money this war should cease; we had no reason to believe that a possible benefit could result from it; and we desired him to say that we would not give a shilling, unless American property unjustly captured was previously restored, and further hostilities suspended; and that unless this was done, we did not conceive that we could even consult our Government concerning a loan; that if the Directory would receive us and commence negotiations, and any thing occurred which rendered a consultation of the Government necessary, one of us would return to America for that purpose. He said that without this money we should be obliged to quit Paris; and that we ought to consider the consequences: the property of the Americans would be confiscated, and their vessels in port embargoed. We told him that unless there was a hope of a real reconciliation, these evils could not be prevented by us; and the little delay we might obtain would only increase them; that our mission had induced many of our countrymen to trust their vessels in the ports of France, and if we remained at Paris, that very circumstance would increase the number; and consequently the injury which our countrymen would sustain, if France could permit herself so to violate her own engagements and the laws of nations. He expressed a wish, that M. Y. should see us once more. We told him that a visit from M. Y., as a private gentleman, would always be agreeable to us; but if he came only with the expectation that we should stipulate advances of money, without previously establishing a solid and permanent reconciliation, he might save himself the trouble of the application, because it was a subject we had considered maturely, and on which we were immoveable. He parted with us, saying, if that was the case, it would not be worth while for M. Y. to come. In the evening, while General Pinckney and General Marshall were absent, M. Y. and M. X. called, and were invited by Mr. Gerry to breakfast with us the next morning.

October 30.

Immediately after breakfast the subject was resumed. M. Y. spoke without interruption for near an hour. He said that he was desirous of making a last effort to serve us, by proposing something which might accommodate the differences between the two nations; that what he was now about to mention, had not, by any means, the approbation of the Directory; nor could M. Talleyrand undertake further than to make from us the proposition to the Directory, and use his influence for its success; that last week M. Talleyrand could not have ventured to have offered such propositions; but that his situation had been very materially changed by the peace with the Emperor; by that peace he had acquired, in a high degree, the confidence of the Directory, and now possessed great influence with that body; that he was also closely connected with Bonaparte and the generals of the army in Italy, and was to be considered as firmly fixed in his post, at least for five or six months; that, under these circumstances, he could undertake to offer, in our behalf, propositions which, before this increase of influence, he could not have hazarded. M. Y. then called our attention to our own situation, and to the force France was capable of bringing to bear upon us. He said that we were the best judges of our capacity to resist, so far as depended on our own resources, and ought not to deceive ourselves on so interesting a subject. The fate of Venice was one which might befall the United States. But he proceeded to observe it was probable we might rely on forming a league with England. If we had such a reliance it would fail us. The situation of England was such as to compel Pitt to make peace on the terms of France. A variety of causes were in operation, which made such an effect absolutely certain. To say nothing of the opposition in England to the minister and to the war, an opposition which the fears of the nation would increase; to say nothing of a war against England which was preparing in the north—an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men, under the command of Bonaparte, spread upon the coast of France, and aided by all the vast resources of his genius, would, most probably, be enabled to invade England; in which event their Government would be overturned. But should this invasion not be absolutely effected, yet the alarm it would spread through the nation, the enormous expense it must produce, would infallibly ruin them, if it was to be continued, and would drive them to save themselves by a peace; that, independent of this, France possessed means which would infallibly destroy their Bank and their whole paper system. He said he knew very well it was generally conjectured that Bonaparte would not leave Italy, and the army which had conquered under him, and which adored him; he assured [us that] nothing could be more unfounded than the conjecture; that Bonaparte had for more than ten days left Italy for Rastadt, to preside over the Congress which was formed for adjusting the affairs of the empire. He said that Pitt himself was so confident of the absolute necessity of peace, that, after the naval victory over the Dutch, he had signified his readiness to treat on the same terms which he had offered before that action. We could not then rely on the assistance of England. What, he asked, would be our situation, if peace should be made with England before our differences with France would be accommodated? But, he continued, if even England should be able to continue the war, and America should unite with her, it would not be in our power to injure France. We might indeed wound her ally, but if we did it would be so much the worse for us. After having stated the dangers attending us, if we should engage in the war, he proceeded to the advantages we might derive from a neutral situation, and insisted at large on the wealth which would naturally flow into our country from the destruction of England. He next proceeded to detail the propositions which are, in substance, in the paper annexed, marked A, except that he insisted that we should engage to use our influence with our Government for the loan. He stated, expressly, that the propositions were to be considered as made by us; that M. Talleyrand would not be responsible for the success of any one of them; he would only undertake to use his influence with the Directory in support of them. The proposition, he said, concerning a suspension of hostilities on the part of France, was one which proceeded entirely from himself; M. Talleyrand had not been consulted upon it, and he could not undertake to say that that gentleman would consent even to lay it before the Directory. The propositions for an advance to the Government of France of as much money as was due from it to our citizens on contract, and as might be determined to be due for vessels improperly captured and condemned, was, he said, indispensable, unless we made that it was unnecessary to make any other: for the others would not be received. He expatiated on the vast advantages we should derive from delay; it was, he said, absolutely to gain our cause. He returned to the danger of our situation and the policy of making with France any accommodation which France would assent to. Perhaps, said he, you believe that, in returning and exposing to your countrymen the unreasonableness of the demands of this Government, you will unite them in their resistance to those demands; you are mistaken; you ought to know that the diplomatic skill of France, and the means she possesses in your country, are sufficient to enable her, with the French party in America, to throw the blame which will attend the rupture of the negotiations on the federalists, as you term yourselves, but on the British party, as France terms you; and you may assure yourselves this will be done. He concluded with declarations of being perfectly disinterested, and declared that his only motives for speaking thus freely, were his friendship for M. Talleyrand, and his wish to promote the interests and peace of the United States. We told him that the freedom with which he had spoken, and which was agreeable to us, would induce us to speak freely also: and for once to accompany our view of the present state of things with a retrospect of the past: that America was the only nation upon earth which felt and had exhibited a real friendship for the republic of France; that among the empires round her which were compelled to bend beneath her power and to obey her commands, there was not one which had voluntarily acknowledged her Government, or manifested for it, spontaneously, any mark of regard. America alone had stepped forward and given the most unequivocal proofs of a pure and sincere friendship, at a time when almost the whole European world, when Austria, Germany, Prussia, Russia, Spain, Sardinia, Holland, and Britain, were leagued against France; when her situation was, in truth, hazardous, and it was dangerous to hold even friendly intercourse with her, America alone stood forward and openly and boldly avowed her enthusiasm in favor of the republic, and her deep and sincere interest in its fate. From that time to the present, the Government and people of the United States have uniformly manifested a sincere and ardent friendship for France, and have, as they conceive, in no single instance, given to this republic just cause of umbrage; if they have done so, they wish it to be pointed out to them. After the determination of France to break off all regular intercourse with them, they have sent three envoys extraordinary to endeavor to make such explanations as might produce reconciliation; these envoys are prepared to investigate, and wish to investigate any measures which may have given offence, and are persuaded that they can entirely justify the conduct of their Government. To this distant, unoffending, friendly republic, what is the language and the conduct of France? Wherever our property can be found, she seizes and takes it from us; unprovoked, she determines to treat us as enemies, and our making no resistance produces no diminution of hostility against us; she abuses and insults our Government, endeavors to weaken it in the estimation of the people, recalls her own minister, refuses to receive ours, and when extraordinary means are taken to make such explanations as may do away misunderstandings, and such alterations in the existing relations of the two countries as may be mutually satisfactory, and may tend to produce harmony, the envoys who bear these powers are not received; they are not permitted to utter the amicable wishes of their country, but, in the haughty style of a master, they are told that, unless they will pay a sum to which their resources scarcely extend, that they may expect the vengeance of France, and, like Venice, be erased from the list of nations; that France will annihilate the only free republic upon earth, and the only nation in the universe which has voluntarily manifested for her a cordial and real friendship! What impression must this make on the mind of America, if, without provocation, France was determined to make war upon us, unless we purchased peace? We could not easily believe that even our money would save us; our independence would never cease to give offence, and would always furnish a pretext for fresh demands. On the advantages of neutrality it was unnecessary to say any thing; all the efforts of our Government were exerted to maintain it, and we would never willingly part with it. With respect to a political connexion with Britain, we told him that America had never contemplated it. Whether the danger he represented that Government to be in was or was not real, we should not undertake to decide. Britain, we believed, had much reason to wish for peace, and France had much reason to wish for peace also; if peace already existed it would not change the course America would pursue. M. Y. manifested the most excessive impatience; he interrupted us and said: This eloquent dissertation might be true; America might have manifested, and he believed had manifested great friendship for France, and had just complaints against her; but he did not come to listen to those complaints. The minister would, on our request, make for us certain propositions to the Directory; he had stated them to us, and all the answer he wished was, yes or no; did we or did we not solicit the minister to make the propositions for us? We told him that, without going further into the discussion, we chose to remark one or two things; they were, that the existing treaty gave to France certain advantages, which were very essential: that, especially, the American coast afforded a protection near two thousand miles in extent to the prizes made by France on her enemies, and refused that protection to the prizes taken from her; that she might be assured that in case of war these advantages would be lost for ever. We also told him we were convinced that France miscalculated on the parties in America; that the extreme injustice offered to our country would unite every man against her. M. X. informed us that M. Talleyrand would not consent even to lay this proposition before the Directory, without previously receiving the fifty thousand pounds, or the greater part of it. M. Y. left in writing his propositions, and we returned the answer annexed, and marked B.

NOVEMBER 1.

It was at length agreed that we should hold no more indirect intercourse with the Government.

NOVEMBER 3.

M. X. called on us, and told General Pinckney and General Marshall, (Mr. Gerry not being within) that M. Y. wished once more to see us. We answered, that we should at any time be glad to see M. Y. as a private gentleman; but that if his object was only to repeat his propositions for money, it was perfectly unnecessary to do so; because, on that subject, it was impossible for us to change the answer we had already given. We told him further, that we considered it as degrading our country to carry on further such an indirect intercourse as we had for some time submitted to, and had determined to receive no propositions, unless the persons who bore them had acknowledged authority to treat with us. He said, that perhaps M. Y. might have written powers from the minister, and we replied, that if he had we should receive his communications with pleasure. He spoke of a probable peace with England, and having requested us to be at home in the afternoon, left us.

About three o'clock he came, and, after some conversation, in which we repeated in substance what is stated above, he showed us a paper, which he said was a copy of a letter prepared for us by M. Talleyrand, requesting an explanation of part of the President's speech, and which he said would be sent, unless we came into the propositions which had been made us. We wished to take a copy of it, which he declined permitting, saying he was forbidden to allow it. We spoke of the letter coming to us as a measure we had no expectation of preventing; and he said he could not understand that we wished it delayed. To which we answered, that the delay of a few days could not be desired, unless a hope existed that the Directory might become more friendly to our country. He said that intelligence had been received from the United States, that if Colonel Burr and Mr. Madison had constituted the mission, the differences between the two nations would have been accommodated before this time. He added, as a fact he was not instructed to communicate, that M. Talleyrand was preparing a memorial to be sent out to the United States, complaining of us as being unfriendly to an accommodation with France. We replied to his intelligence from the United States, that the minister's correspondents in America took a good deal on themselves, when they undertook to say how the Directory would have received Colonel Burr and Mr. Madison; and that with respect to the memorial of M. Talleyrand, it would not be easy for him to convince our countrymen that the statements we should make were untrue: if, however, we were confident that our conduct would be condemned, M. Talleyrand might be assured that the fear of censure would not induce us to deserve it: but that we should act in a manner which our own judgments and consciences would approve of; and we trusted we should be supported by the great body of candid and honest men. In this conversation we again stated, that America had taken a neutral position; that she had faithfully sought to preserve it; that a loan of money to one of the belligerent Powers was directly to take part in the war; and that to take part in the war against her own judgment and will, under the coercion of France, was to surrender our independence.

Exhibit A, enclosed in the Envoys' letter, No. 2, dated November 8, 1797.

I. The American envoys shall remain here for six months, in the same manner, and upon the same footing, with regard to etiquette, as did M. D'Aranjo, the envoy of Portugal.

II. There shall be named a commission of five members, agreeably to a form to be established, for the purpose of deciding upon the reclamations of the Americans, relative to the prizes made on them by the French privateers.

III. The American envoys will engage that their Government shall pay the indemnifications, or the amount of the sums already decreed to the American creditors of the French republic, and those which shall be adjudged to the claimants by the commissioners. This payment shall be made under the name of an advance to the French republic, who will repay it in a time and manner to be agreed upon.

IV. One of the American envoys shall return to America, to demand of his Government the necessary powers to purchase, for cash, the thirty-two millions of Dutch rescriptions, belonging to the French republic, in case the envoys should conclude a treaty which shall be approved by the two nations.

V. In the interval, the definitive treaty shall proceed for the termination of all differences existing between the French republic and the United States, so as that the treaty may be concluded immediately on the return of the deputy.

VI. The question of the rôle d'équipage shall remain suspended until the return of the deputy, and the commission shall not pronounce upon any reclamation where this point shall be in question.

VII. During the six months granted for the going and returning of the deputy, hostilities against the Americans shall be suspended, as well as the process for condemnation before the tribunals; and the money of the prizes already condemned, in the hands of the civil officers of the nation, shall remain there without being delivered to the privateers-men, until the return of the deputy.

Exhibit B, received with the Envoys' letter, No. 2, dated November 8, 1797.

The envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States cannot avoid observing the very unusual situation in which they are placed, by the manner in which they are alone permitted to make communications on the objects of their mission: they are called upon to pledge their country to a very great amount, to answer demands which appear to them as extraordinary as they were unexpected, without being permitted to discuss the reason, the justice, or the policy on which those demands are founded, and not only without assurances that the rights of the United States will, in future, be respected, but without a document to prove that those to whom they are required to open themselves without reserve, and at whose instance they are called on to sacrifice so much, are empowered, even by the minister, to hold any communication with them: yet such is the anxious and real solicitude of the envoys to seize any occasion which may afford a hope, however distant, of coming to those explanations which they so much wish to make with this republic, that they pass over the uncommon and informal modes which have been adopted, and will only consider the propositions themselves.

I. The ministers of the United States will permit no personal considerations to influence their negotiations with the French republic. Although they expected that the extraordinary means adopted by their Government to reconcile itself to that of France would have been received with some degree of attention, yet they are too solicitous to enter upon the important and interesting duty of their mission, to permit themselves to be restrained by forms or etiquette.

II. On this article it is believed there can be no disagreement.

III. This article, as explained, would oblige the United States to advance, not to their own citizens, but to the Government of France, sums equivalent to the depredations made by the corsairs of the republic on the American commerce, and to the contracts made with their citizens by France; and this advance, instead of benefitting the citizens of the United States, would leave them precisely what they now are, the creditors of the French republic: the more extensive the depredations, and the more considerable the contracts uncomplied with, the more would the Government of France receive from the United States. Independent of these objections, the ministers of the United States cannot engage to assume, in any form, the debts due from France to their fellow-citizens; they have no such power.

IV. If the negotiations be opened, and the propositions for a loan, or any other propositions, exceeding the powers of the ministers, be made, the Government of the United States will be consulted thereon with expedition.

V. This, or any proposition having for its object the claims of the two nations on each other, or an accommodation of differences, will be embraced with ardor by the ministers of the United States.

VI. It cannot escape notice, that the question of the rôle d'équipage may involve in it every vessel taken from the United States: the ministers, however, consider it, and wish to take it up, as a subject of negotiation.

VII. On this article it is only to be observed, that the season of the year is such as probably to render a return, within six months, of the envoy, who might sail to the United States, impracticable: provision should be made for such an event.

If the difficulties attending the propositions for a loan, and a compensation for past injuries be such as to require time for their removal, the ministers of the United States propose that the discussions on the relative situation of the two countries, may commence in the usual forms; that the relation to each other may be so regulated as to obviate future misunderstandings; and that the adjustment of the claims of the citizens of the United States, whose vessels have been captured, may be made after a decision on the point first mentioned.

No diplomatic gratification can precede the ratification of the treaty.

No. 3.

PARIS, November 27, 1797.

DEAR SIR:

On the 11th instant we transmitted the following official letter to the Minister of Foreign Affairs:

"PARIS, Nov. 11, in the 22d year of American independence.

"CITIZEN MINISTER: The undersigned envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the French republic, had the honor of announcing to you, officially, on the 6th of October, their arrival at Paris, and of presenting to you, on the 8th, a copy of their letters of credence. Your declaration at that time, that a report on American affairs was then preparing, and would in a few days be laid before the Directory, whose decision thereon should, without delay, be made known, has hitherto imposed silence on them. For this communication they have waited with that anxious solicitude which so interesting an event could not fail to excite, and with that respect which is due to the Government of France. They have not yet received it; and so much time has been permitted to elapse, so critical is the situation of many of their countrymen, and so embarrassing is that of the undersigned, both as it respects themselves and the Government they represent, that they can no longer dispense with the duty of soliciting your attention to their mission.

"The United States, citizen minister, at an epoch which evinced their sincerity, have given incontestable proofs of their ardent friendship, of their affection for the French republic. These were the result, not of her unparalleled prowess and power, but of their confidence in her justice and magnanimity; and in such high estimation was the reciprocity of her friendship held by them, as to have been a primary object of national concern. The preservation of it was dear to them, the loss of it a subject of unfeigned regret, and the recovery of it, by every measure which shall consist with the rights of an independent nation, engages their constant attention. The Government of the United States, we are authorized to declare, has examined, with the most scrupulous justice, its conduct towards its former friend. It has been led to this by a sincère desire to remove, of itself, every just cause of complaint; conceiving that, with the most upright intentions, such cause may possibly exist; and although the strictest search has produced no self-reproach, although the Government is conscious that it has uniformly sought to preserve with fidelity its engagements to France, yet far from wishing to exercise the privilege of judging for itself, on its own course of reasoning, and the lights in its own possession, it invites fair and candid discussion; it solicits a reconsideration of the past; it is persuaded its intentions, its views, and its actions, must have been misrepresented and misunderstood; it is convinced that the essential interests of both nations will be promoted by reconciliation and peace; and it cherishes the hope of meeting with similar dispositions on the part of the Directory.

"Guided by these sentiments, the President of the United States has given it in charge to the undersigned to state to the Executive Directory the deep regret which he feels at the loss or suspension of the harmony and friendly intercourse which subsisted between the two republics, and his sincere wish to restore them; to discuss candidly the complaints of France, and to offer frankly those of the United States. And he has authorized a review of existing treaties, and such alterations thereof as shall consist with the mutual interest and satisfaction of the contracting parties.

"This task the undersigned are anxious to commence; and truly happy will they be, if their exertions can in any degree contribute to restore that friendship, that mutual interchange of good offices, which it is alike their wish and their duty to effect between the citizens of the two republics.

"The undersigned pray you, citizen minister, to present this communication to the Executive Directory, and to receive the assurances of their most perfect consideration.

"CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY,
"J. MARSHALL,
"ELBRIDGE GERRY.

"To the MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS of the French republic."

No answer having been given to it on the 21st instant, we requested Major Rutledge to wait on the minister, and inquire of him whether he had communicated the lettter to the Directory, and whether we might expect an answer. He replied, that he had submitted our letter to them, and that they would direct him what steps to pursue, of which we should be informed. We have not, however, hitherto received any official intimation relative to this business: we are not yet received; and the condemnation of our vessels, for want of a rôle d'équipage, is unremittingly continued. Frequent and urgent attempts have been made to inveigle us again into negotiation with persons not officially authorized, of which the obtaining of money is the basis: but we have persisted in declining to have any further communication relative to diplomatic business with persons of that description; and we mean to adhere to this determination. We are sorry to inform you that the present disposition of the Government of this country appears to be as unfriendly towards ours as ever, and that we have very little prospect of succeeding in our mission.

We have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY,
J. MARSHALL,
E. GERRY.

No. 4.

PARIS, December 24, 1797.

DEAR SIR:

We have not yet received any answer to our official letter to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, dated the 11th of ast month, and mentioned in No. 3; but reiterated attempts have been made to engage us in negotiation with persons not officially authorized; and you will find, by the exhibits marked A, B, and C, herewith sent, some important information relative to the views and intentions of the French Government with respect to ours. We are all of opinion that, if we were to remain here for six months longer, without we were to stipulate the payment of money, and a great deal of it, in some shape or other, we should not be able to effectuate the objects of our mission, should we be even officially received; unless the projected attempt on England was to fail, or a total change take place in the persons who at present direct the affairs of this Government. In this situation of matters, we are determined, by the 10th of next month, should they remain as they are, to transmit another letter to the minister, representing, as far as may be expedient, the views of our Government.

We have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY,
J. MARSHALL,
E. GERRY.

Colonel PICKERING, Secretary of State.

Exhibit A, enclosed in the Envoys' letter, No. 4.

On the 14th of December, M. X. called on me, in order, as he said, to gain some information relative to some lands in * * *, purchased by * * *, for whom * * *. Soon afterwards, General Marshall came in, and then Mr. Gerry's carriage drove into the yard. Here is Mr. Gerry, said General Marshall. I am glad of it, said M. X., for I wished to meet all of you gentlemen, to inform you that M. Y. had another message to you from M. Talleyrand. I immediately expressed my surprise at it, as M. Talleyrand, M. Y., and he, all knew our determination to have no further communication on the subject of our mission with persons not officially authorized. He replied, that determination was made six weeks ago; and it was presumed that we had changed our opinion. I said that I had not; and I did not believe that my colleagues had. At that moment, Mr. Gerry entered the room, and I privately acquainted him with the object of M. X.'s visit. General Marshall, Mr. Gerry, and myself, then withdrew into another room, and immediately agreed to adhere to our former resolution. M. X. was then called in; when I acquainted him, in a few words, with our determination; and Mr. Gerry expatiated more at large on the propriety of our acting in this manner, and on the very unprecedented way in which we had been treated since our arrival.

On the 20th of December, a lady, who is well acquainted with M. Talleyrand, expressed to me her concern that we were still in so unsettled a situation; but, adds she, why will you not lend us money? If you would but make us a loan, all matters would be adjusted: and, she added, when you were contending for your revolution, we lent you money. I mentioned the very great difference there was between the situation of the two countries at that period and the present, and the very different circumstances under which the loan was made us, and the loan was now demanded from us. She replied, we do not make a demand; we think it more delicate that the offer should come from you: but M. Talleyrand has mentioned to me (who am surely not in his confidence) the necessity of your making us a loan; and I know that he has mentioned it to two or three others; and that you have been informed of it: and I will assure you that, if you remain here six months longer, you would not advance a single step further in your negotiations without a loan. If that is the case, I replied, we may as well go away now. Why that, possibly, said she, might lead to a rupture, which you had better avoid: for we know we have a very considerable party in America, who are strongly in our interest. There is no occasion to enter into a further detail of the conversation. I have only noted this part of it as expressive of what I believe (as far as relates to the loan and a party in America in their favor) to be the sentiments of the French Government with regard to us.

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY.

DECEMBER 21, 1797.

Exhibit B, enclosed in the Envoys' letter No. 4.

Extract from General Marshall's Journal.

December 17, 1797. I stepped into Mr. Gerry's apartment, where I saw M. Y. He expressed his regret at having been disabled to dine with us at M. de Beaumarchais' by an inveterate tooth-ache. He then asked me whether I had seen M. de Beaumarchais lately? I told him not since he dined with us; and that he had left us, much indisposed. He then observed that he had not known until lately that I was the advocate for that gentleman in his cause against the State of Virginia; and that M. de Beaumarchais, in consequence of that circumstance, had expressed sentiments of high regard for me. I replied, that M. de Beaumarchais' cause was of great magnitude, and very uncertain issue; and, consequently, that a portion of the interest he felt in it would very naturally be transferred to his advocate. He immediately said (low and apart) that M. de Beaumarchais had consented, provided his claim could be established, to sacrifice fifty thousand pounds sterling of it, as the private gratification which had been required of us; so that the gratification might be made without any actual loss to the American Government. I answered, that a gratification on any terms, or in any form, was a subject which we approached with much fear and difficulty, as we were not authorized by our Government to make one; nor had it been expected that one would be necessary: that I could not undertake to say whether my colleagues would consent to it, in any state of things; but I could undertake to say no one of us would consent to it, unless it was preceded or accompanied by a full and entire recognition of the claims of our citizens, and a satisfactory arrangement on the objects of our mission. He said it was in the expectation of that event only that he mentioned it. We parted; and I stated the conversation to General Pinckney, who was disinclined to any stipulation of the sort, and considered it as a renewal of the old reprobated system of indirect unauthorized negotiation.

Having been originally the counsel of M. de Beaumarchais, I had determined, and so I had informed General Pinckney, that I would not, by my voice, establish any agreement in his favor; but that I would positively oppose any admission of the claim of any French citizen, if not accompanied with the admission of the claims of the American citizens for property captured and condemned for want of a rôle d'équipage. My reason for conceiving that this ought to be stipulated expressly was a conviction that, if it was referred to commissioners, it would be committing absolutely to chance as complete a right as any individuals ever possessed. General Pinckney was against admitting the claim at any rate.

After my return, Mr. Gerry came into my room, and told me that M. Y. had called on him, to accompany him on a visit to M. Talleyrand; that he proposed seeing M. Talleyrand, and returning the civility of the dinner; and endeavoring to bring about some intercourse between him and us.

December 18. General Pinckney and Mr. Gerry met in my room; and Mr. Gerry detailed to us the conversations mentioned in our public letter. The proposition relative to the claim of M. de Beaumarchais is entirely different from my understanding of it, in the very brief statement made to me by M. Y. We resolved that we would rigidly adhere to the rule we had adopted, to enter into no negotiation with persons not formally authorized to treat with us. We came also to the determination to prepare a letter to the minister of foreign relations, stating the object of our mission, and discussing the subjects of difference between the two nations, in like manner as if we had been actually received; and to close the letter with requesting the Government to open the negotiation with us, or to grant us our passports.

Exhibit C, enclosed in the Envoys' letter, No. 4.

December 13. Mr. Gerry accidentally calling on General Pinckney, found M. X. and was soon informed that his object was to obtain another interview between the ministers and M. Y. on the affairs of their mission. General Marshall happening also to be there, we retired into another room, and immediately agreed to adhere to our former determination, not to have any more informal communications. M. X. having been called in, General Pinckney briefly communicated our determination: and Mr. Gerry observed that he was much hurt by this proposition; that the ministers had already proceeded further in this mode of communication than, perhaps, they could justify; that they had refused six weeks ago to renew it; and that some regard ought to be paid to their feelings, which had been sufficiently mortified; that the proposition was disrespectful to the envoys, as it betrayed a belief that they had lost the sense of their dignity, and were, indeed, incompetent to their office; that, had there been but one envoy extraordinary, he ought to have had an audience in a few days; and that, for three to remain between two and three months in this situation was too humiliating, too debasing, for any nation to submit to it; that, for his own part, had he been sent to any other nation in Europe, with two other envoys, he would not have consented to have remained in such a state ten days; that, knowing the great desire of the Government and nation of the United States to be at peace with France, he had, with his colleagues, submitted to this indignity, at the risk of the severe censure of the former. Having also inquired of M. X. at what time M. Talleyrand could be seen, the former said he would inquire of M. Y. who, on the 16th, in the evening, sent, in Mr. Gerry's absence from his lodgings, a billet, as follows: "M. Y. has the honor to present his respects to Mr. Gerry, and to inform him that he will have the honor to wait on him tomorrow morning, at ten o'clock, to go together to the Minister of Foreign Relations. He is, with respect," &c. On the morning of the 17th, M. Y. came in while Mr. Gerry was at breakfast, not having received an answer to his note; and Mr. Marshall coming in, M. Y. took him aside, and conferred with him a considerable time; after which, the former and the rest of the family left the room: and M. Y. and Mr. Gerry being together, Mr. Gerry told him that his object in seeing M. Talleyrand was to return a civility, by requesting him to fix a day for dining with Mr.

G. who intended to invite his colleagues; by this interview to promote, if possible, a better understanding between the minister and the American envoys. And Mr. G. also proposed to confer with the minister on the disagreeable situation the envoys were in, and to state to him some reports which appear to be founded, respecting a proposition before the Directory for sending off all Americans in a short period; but Mr. Gerry added that he could not hear a word on the subject of the mission, or the preliminaries to a negotiation, as the envoys had determined unanimously against any informal communications on the subject. M. Y. in answer, said that Mr. Marshall had just heard him on a subject of this kind, and that we might consider it, as he did, merely as a conversation between ourselves. He then stated that two measures, which M. Talleyrand proposed, being adopted, a restoration of friendship between the republics would follow immediately: the one was a gratuity of fifty thousand pounds sterling, the other a purchase of thirty-two millions of the Dutch rescriptions; that, as to the first, M. de Beaumarchais had recovered, in a cause depending in Virginia, between that State and himself, one hundred and forty-five thousand pounds sterling; that there was an appeal from the judgment; that he would sign an act to relinquish forty-five thousand pounds, if the whole should be finally recovered, leaving only one hundred thousand pounds for himself; that the forty-five thousand pounds might accrue to the United States, who would, in that case, lose but a small part of the fifty thousand pounds; that the purchase of sixteen millions of rescriptions would amount to but one million, three hundred and thirty-three thousand [pounds,] six shillings, and eight pence sterling, which, with an interest of five per cent. would be certainly paid by the Government of Holland to the United States, and leave them without any loss; that more than half the sum may now be hired in Holland, on the credit of the rescriptions, and an easy arrangement be made for payment, by short instalments, which might be obtained also by a loan; that it was worthy the attention of the envoys to consider, whether by so small a sacrifice they would establish a peace with France, or whether they would risk the consequences; that, if nothing could be done by the envoys, arrangements would be made forthwith to ravage the coasts of the United States by frigates from St. Domingo; that small States, which had offended France, were suffering by it; that Hamburgh, and other cities in that quarter, would, within a month or two, have their Governments changed; that Switzerland would undergo the same operation; and that Portugal would probably be in a worse predicament; that the expedition against England would be certainly pursued; and that the present period was the most favorable, if we wished to adopt any measure for a pacification. Mr. Gerry, in answer, said that, if the French were disposed to pursue with vengeance the United States, they might, perhaps, ravage their coasts, and injure them in this way, but they never could subdue them: the measure he thought utterly impracticable, even if attempted by France and her allies. To which M. Y. assented. Mr. Gerry observed further, that the ravages alluded to would undoubtedly closely connect the United States and Great Britain, and prevent the former from returning to the friendship which they have ever had for France; that, as to the propositions, he should express no opinion on them; that his situation, and that of his colleagues, was extremely difficult; that the Directory were exclusively prejudiced against the Government of the United States, and considered them as the friends of Great Britain; that, if the envoys could have an opportunity of being heard, they could remove such impressions, and show that the Government were the friends of France as much as of Great Britain: but that the envoys were now in the most painful situation; that they were treated, in the eyes of all Europe, and of the American Government and nation, with the utmost contempt, and were submitting to indignities which they could not reconcile to their feelings, or justify to their constituents. M. Y. said that the observations were just, but that the American envoys had not experienced worse treatment than other ministers, nor indeed as bad; that the envoy of Portugal was again ordered to depart; and that but little ceremony was observed to the envoys in general. M. Y. and Mr. Gerry then took a ride to M. Talleyrand's bureau, who received them politely; and after being seated, Mr. Gerry observed to M. Talleyrand, in English, slowly, that M. Y. had stated to him that morning some propositions as coming from M. Talleyrand, respecting which Mr. Gerry could give no opinion; that his object at this interview was to request of him information whether he would fix a time for taking a dinner with Mr. Gerry, at which he proposed to invite his colleagues; that he wished for more frequent interviews of some kind or other between himself and the envoys, conceiving that many imaginary difficulties which obstructed the negotiation would vanish by this means, and that those which were real would be surmounted; that, conceiving the delicate part which the minister of France had to act at this time, he did not wish M. Talleyrand to accept the invitation, if it would subject him to inconveniences; that he wished to speak on another subject, and it was painful to him to acknowledge that the precarious situation of the envoys was such, as to render it impossible for them to take measures for decent arrangements; that, a short time since, he had supposed measures were taking a favorable turn, but that lately he had received, from various quarters, information of a report made by the minister of the interior, and under the consideration of the Directory, for sending all Americans from Paris in twenty-four hours; that he could not be responsible for the truth of the information, but it appeared to him, as well from the various quarters from which it came, as from the intelligence of the person who gave it, to be highly probable; that, if this was the case, it was unnecessary for the Directory, as he conceived, to pass any arret, as it respected the envoys, for that they would depart from Paris whenever it was hinted as the wish of the Directory; that, for his own part, he should feel more at ease, until we were received, to reside in a city of some other nation than that of France; and to return to Paris on notice that the Directory were disposed to open the negotiation. M. Talleyrand appeared to be very uneasy at this declaration, but avoided saying a word on it. He said that the information M. Y. had given me was just, and might always be relied on, but that he would reduce to writing his propositions, which he accordingly did; and after he had shown them to Mr. Gerry, he burnt the paper. The substance was as follows. [See No. 1. below.]

He then said that he accepted of the invitation; that he would dine with him the decade after the present, in which he was engaged.

Mr. Gerry did not repeat all that he had said to M. Y. having no doubt he would communicate the whole to M. Talleyrand: and after expressing a friendship for the French republic, and a warm desire to renew the former attachment of the two republics, which M. Talleyrand warmly reciprocated, Mr. Gerry bade M. Talleyrand adieu, leaving with him M. Y.

That the envoys should come forward generally, and say:

"France has been serviceable to the United States, and now they wish to be serviceable to France. Understanding that the French republic has sixteen millions of Dutch rescriptions to sell, the United States will purchase them at par, and will give her further assistance when in their power.

"The first arrangement being made, the French Government will take measures for reimbursing the equitable demands of America arising from prizes, and to give free navigation to their ships in future."

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, MAY 4, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate and
Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I now transmit to Congress copies of all the communications from our envoys extraordinary, received since their arrival in Paris, excepting those before presented by me to both Houses.

No. 6.

PARIS, February 7, 1798.

DEAR SIR:

We transmit to you, in this enclosure, our last letter to the Minister of Foreign Relations. Though dated the 17th ult. it was not, on account of the time taken to translate so long a letter, delivered till the 31st. In our communications here, although we have, agreeably to your instructions, written in our own language, we have at the same time taken the precaution, lest our meaning should be misrepresented or misunderstood, to accompany them with an accurate translation. We have not yet received any answer to this communication, and should no notice be taken of it in a few days, we shall apply in a more explicit manner for our passports.

The councils have passed the decree mentioned in No. 5, as having been recommended by the Directory, to capture and condemn all neutral vessels laden in part, or in whole, with the manufactures or productions of England, or its possessions. We enclose you the official copy of the report on that subject, and shall represent to this Government the injustice and injury which it must inevitably occasion us.

We have the honor to be, &c.

CHARLES C. PINCKNEY,
J. MARSHALL,
E. GERRY.

Colonel PICKERING, Secretary of the United States.

To the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

The undersigned, ministers plenipotentiary and envoys extraordinary from the United States of America to the French republic, have been hitherto restrained, by the expectation of entering on the objects of their mission in the forms usual among nations, from addressing to the Executive Directory, through you, those explanations and reclamations with which they are charged by the Government they represent. If this expectation is to be relinquished, yet the unfeigned wish of the United States to restore that harmony between the two republics, which they have so unremittingly sought to preserve, renders it the duty of the undersigned to lay before the Government of France, however informal the communication may be deemed, some considerations, in addition to those heretofore submitted, relative to the subsisting differences between the two nations.

Openly and repeatedly have France and America interchanged unequivocal testimonials of reciprocal regard. These testimonials were given by the United States, with all the ardor and sincerity of youth. It is still believed that, on the part of France, they were likewise the offspring of real esteem. They were considered on the other side of the Atlantic as evidencing a mutual friendship, to be as durable as the republics themselves. Unhappily the scene is changed, and America looks round in vain for the ally or the friend. The contrast, both of language and of conduct, which the present so avowedly exhibits to a portion of the past, has been repeatedly attributed by France to a disposition alleged to exist in the Government of the United States, unfriendly to this republic, and partial towards its enemies.

That Government, astonished at a reproach so unfounded in fact, so contradicted by its declarations and its conduct, could scarcely consider the charge as serious, and has ever cherished the hope, that a candid review of its conduct founded on the documents, and aided by the arguments with which the Executive Directory has been furnished, would have rescued it from the injurious suspicion. This hope seems not to have been realized. The undersigned, therefore, deem it proper to precede their application for that justice which they claim from France, by an effort to remove the cause which is alleged to have produced the injuries of which they complain. With this view, they pray the attention of the Executive Directory to a serious and candid reconsideration of the leading measures adopted by the Government of the United States, and they persuade themselves that, however various and multiplied the channels may be through which misinformation, concerning the dispositions of that Government, may have been received, yet this reconsideration must remove unfounded prejudices, and entirely exculpate the American nation from an accusation it knows to be unfounded, and believes to be supported by no single fact.

When that war which has been waged with such unparalleled fury, which, in its vast vicissitudes of fortune, has alternately threatened the very existence of the conflicting parties, but which, in its progress, has surrounded France with splendor, and added still more to her glory than to her territory; when that war first involved those nations with whom the United States were in habits of friendly intercourse, it became incumbent on their Government to examine their situation, their connexions, and their duties. America found herself at peace with all the belligerent Powers; she was connected with some of them by treaties of amity and commerce, and with France by a treaty of alliance also. These several treaties were considered with the most serious attention, and with a sincere wish to determine, by fair construction, the obligations which they really imposed. The result of this inquiry was a full conviction, that her engagements by no means bound her to take part in the war, but left her so far the mistress of her own conduct, as to be at perfect liberty to observe a system of real neutrality. It is deemed unnecessary to analyze those treaties, in order to support the propriety of this decision, because it is not recollected ever to have been questioned, and is believed not to admit of doubt.

Being bound by no duty to enter into the war, the Government of the United States conceived itself bound by duties the most sacred to abstain from it. Contemplating man, even in a different society, as the natural friend of man, a state of peace, though unstipulated by treaty, was considered as imposing obligations not to be wantonly violated.

These obligations, created by the laws of nature, were in some instances strengthened by solemn existing engagements, of which good faith required a religious observance.

To a sense of moral right, other considerations of the greatest magnitude were added, which forbade the Government of the United States to plunge them unnecessarily into the miseries of the bloody conflict then commencing. The great nations of Europe, either impelled by ambition, or by existing or supposed political interests, peculiar to themselves, have consumed more than a third of the present century in wars. Whatever causes may have produced so afflicting an evil, they cannot be supposed to have been entirely extinguished, and humanity can scarcely indulge the hope, that the temper or condition of man is so altered as to exempt the next century from the ills of the past.

Strong fortifications, powerful navies, immense armies, the accumulated wealth of ages, and a full population, enable the nations of Europe to support those wars in which they are induced to engage, by motives which they deem adequate, and by interests exclusively their own. In all respects different is the situation of the United States: possessed of an extensive unsettled territory, on which bountiful nature has bestowed, with a lavish hand, all the capacities for future legitimate greatness, they indulge no thirst for conquest, no ambition for the extension of their limits. Encircled by no dangerous Powers, they neither fear, nor are jealous of their neighbors, and are not, on that account, obliged to arm for their own safety. Separated from Europe by a vast and friendly ocean, they are but remotely, if at all, affected by those interests which agitate and influence this portion of the globe. Thus circumstanced, they have no motive for a voluntary war: on the contrary, the most powerful considerations urge them to avoid it. An extensive and undefended commerce, peculiarly necessary to a nation which does not manufacture for itself, which is, and for a long time to come will be, almost exclusively agricultural, would have been its immediate and certain victim. The surplus produce of their labor must have perished on their hands, and that increase of population so essential to a young country, must, with their prosperity, have sustained a serious check. Their exertions, too, would not have been considerable, unless the war had been transferred to their own bosom.

Great as are the means and resources of the United States for self-defence, it is only in self-defence that those resources can be completely displayed. Neither the genius of the nation, nor the state of its finances, admit of calling its citizens from the plough, but to defend their own liberty and their own fire sides. How criminal must have been that government which could have plunged its constituents into a war, to which they were neither impelled by duty nor solicited by interest; in which they committed so much to hazard; in which they must suffer, in order to act efficiently, and could only display their energy in repelling invasion? But motives still more powerful than the calamities of the moment have influenced the Government of the United States.

It was perhaps impossible to have engaged voluntarily in the existing conflict, without launching into the almost boundless ocean of European politics; without contracting habits of national conduct, and forming close political connexions which must have compromitted the future peace of the nation, and have involved it in all the future quarrels of Europe. A long train of armies, debts, and taxes, checking the growth, diminishing the happiness, and perhaps endangering the liberty of the United States, must have followed the adoption of such a system. And for what purpose should it have been adopted? For what purpose should America thus burthen herself with the conflicts of Europe? Not to comply with any engagements she has formed; not to promote her own views, her own objects, her own happiness, or her own safety; but to move as a satellite around some greater planet, whose laws she must of necessity obey. In addition to these weighty considerations, it was believed that France would derive more benefit from the neutrality of America than from her becoming a party in the war.

The determination, then, of the Government of the United States to preserve that neutral station, in which the war found them, far from manifesting a partiality for the enemies of France, was only a measure of justice to itself and to others, and did not even derogate from that predilection for this republic which it has so repeatedly expressed and displayed. Having avowed this determination, increased motives of honor and of duty commanded its faithful observance. It is not a principle which remains now to be settled, that a fraudulent neutrality is no neutrality at all; and that the nation, which would be admitted to its privileges, must also perform the duties it enjoins. Had the Government of the United States declared itself neutral, indulged its partialities by granting favors unstipulated by treaty, to one of the belligerent powers which it refused to another, it could no longer have claimed the immunities of a situation of which the obligations were forgotten; it would have become a party to the war as certainly as if war had been openly and formally declared, and it would have added to the madness of wantonly engaging in such a hazardous conflict, the dishonor of insincere and fraudulent conduct: it would have attained, circuitously, an object which it could not plainly avow or directly pursue, and would have tricked the people of the United States into a war which it could not venture openly to declare.

It was matter of real delight to the Government and people of America, to be informed that France did not wish to interrupt the peace they enjoyed.

The undersigned have been induced to rest upon this first necessary and decisive step, taken by their Government, although its propriety may not be controverted, from a conviction, that if the right of the United States, to observe a fair and honest neutrality be established, the general charges of an unfriendly disposition, made against them by France, must be relinquished, because the facts, by which those charges are supported, will be found to have grown inevitably out of that situation.

This measure was accompanied by another, which, in repelling so astonishing a charge as partiality for the enemies of France, deserves to be noticed. Soon after the Government of the United States had notified to its citizens the duties which its neutrality enjoined, Mr. Genet, the first minister from this republic, arrived at Philadelphia: although his conduct had been such as to give cause for serious alarm; although before he was even acknowledged as a minister, or had reached the authority which could inspect his credentials, he had assumed the functions of the Government to which he was deputed, yet that Government resolved to see in him, only the representative of a republic, to which it was sincerely attached, gave him the same warm and cordial reception which he had experienced from its citizens, without a single exception, from Charleston to Philadelphia. The then situation of France deserves to be remembered.

While the recollection adds, citizen minister, to the glory with which your nation is encircled, it establishes the sincerity of the United States.

The most formidable combination the world had ever seen, threatened the extermination of this republic. Austria, Germany, Prussia, Britain, Spain, Holland, and Sardinia, were in arms against France, and Russia was leagued in the coalition. Nor was this all. The republic, distracted by internal divisions, contained numerous enemies within its own bosom, and a considerable portion of its proper force was arrayed against itself. In such a state of things, the most sanguine might fear, and the most ardent hesitate. Confident in their strength, and relying on success, the coalesced Powers sought to arm, in their cause, the residue of the world, and deemed it criminal to acknowledge the sovereignty of the republic. The nations of Europe, even those who had not entered into the contest, were either themselves unwilling to acknowledge this sovereignty, or were deterred by fear from doing so. Had the partialities of America been against France, this example would have been followed. According to the rules of ordinary calculation, the measure would have been safe, and consequently a Government, feeling the attachments now so unjustly attributed to that of the United States, would have indicated those attachments by its adoption. Far from pursuing such a system, the United States, unawed by the strength of the coalition, received with open arms the minister of this republic, acknowledged with enthusiasm the Government which had deputed him, overlooked his extraordinary attacks on their sovereignty, and manifested a cordial friendship for his nation, and a sincere wish for its success.

Scarcely were the first ceremonies of his reception over, when Mr. Genet displayed a disposition to usurp and exercise, within the United States, the choicest and most important duties and powers of sovereignty. He claimed the privileges of arming and embodying the citizens of America within their own territory, to carry on from thence expeditions against nations with whom they were at peace; of fitting out and equipping, within their limits, privateers, to cruise on a commerce destined for their ports; of erecting within their jurisdiction, an independent judiciary, and of arraigning their Government at the bar of the people. The undersigned will not ask in what manner France would have treated any foreign minister, who should have dared so to conduct himself towards this republic? But in what manner would the American Government have treated such a minister, if the representative of a nation it viewed with coldness, or even indifference? In what manner would it have treated him, had he been the representative of any other nation than France? No man acquainted with that Government can doubt how these inquiries ought to be answered. From the minister of France alone could this extraordinary conduct be borne with temper. To have continued to bear it, without perceiving and feeling its extreme impropriety, would have been to have merited the contempt as well of France as of the other Powers of the earth. The Government of the United States did feel it; but far from transferring to his nation that resentment, which such conduct could not fail to excite, it distinguished strongly between the Government and its minister, and the representations it made were in the language of a friend afflicted, but not irritated, by the injuries it complained of. The recall of that minister was received with universal joy, as a confirmation that his whole system of conduct was attributable only to himself; and not even the publication of his private instructions could persuade the American Government to ascribe any part of it to this republic.

At the same time the exertions of the United States to pay up the arrearages of their debt to France, which had been unavoidably permitted to accumulate, their disinterested and liberal advances to the sufferers of St. Domingo, thrown suddenly upon them, without provisions or money, whose recommendation was, that they were Frenchmen and unfortunate; the perseverance with which they apologized for and ascribed any occasional injuries they sustained to the force of circumstances; the interest which they continued openly to take in all the fortunes of this republic, manifested partialities of a very different sort from those which have been so unjustly attributed to them.

At this period too, a great principle was brought into discussion, the dispassionate consideration of which is essential to the fair estimate of the charges made by France against the Government of the United States. The property of French citizens was taken by British cruisers and ships of war, out of American bottoms, and the American Government submitted to the practice. The propriety of submitting to it, depends entirely on the naked right of the captors, under the existing circumstances of the case, to exercise such a power. The circumstances were these: In the treaty of commerce made between France and the United States in February, 1778, it was stipulated in substance, that neither party should take out of the vessels of the other, the goods of its enemy, but that the character of the bottom should be imparted to its cargo. With England the United States had made no stipulation on the subject.

It follows, then, that the rights of England, being neither diminished nor increased by compact, remained precisely in their natural state, and were to be ascertained by some pre-existing acknowledged principle.

This principle is to be searched for in the law of nations. That law forms, independent of compact, a rule of action by which the sovereignties of the civilized world consent to be governed. It prescribes what one nation may do without giving just cause of war, and what, of consequence, another may and ought to permit, without being considered as having sacrificed its honor, its dignity, or its independence.

What then is the doctrine of the law of nations on this subject? Do neutral bottoms of right, and independent of particular compact, protect hostile goods? The question is to be considered on its mere right, uninfluenced by the wishes or the interests of a neutral or belligerent Power.

It is a general rule, that war gives to a belligerent Power a right to seize and confiscate the goods of his enemy. However humanity may deplore the application of this principle, there is, perhaps, no one to which man has more universally assented, or to which jurists have more uniformly agreed. Its theory and its practice have unhappily been maintained in all ages. This right, then, may be exercised on the goods of an enemy wherever found, unless opposed by some superior right. It yields by common consent to the superior right of a neutral nation to protect, by virtue of its sovereignty, the goods of either of the belligerent Powers, found within its jurisdiction. But can this right of protection, admitted to be possessed by every Government within its mere limits, in virtue of its absolute sovereignty, be communicated to a vessel navigating the high seas?

It is supposed that it cannot be so communicated; because the ocean being common to all nations, no absolute sovereignty can be acquired in it. The rights of all are equal, and must necessarily check, limit, and restrain each other. The superior right, therefore, of absolute sovereignty, to protect all property within its own territory, ceases to be superior when the property is no longer within its own territory, and may be encountered by the opposing acknowledged right of a belligerent Power to seize and confiscate the goods of his enemy. If the belligerent permits the neutral to attempt, without hazard to himself, thus to serve and aid his enemy, yet he does not relinquish the right of defeating that attempt whenever it shall be in his power to defeat it. Thus it is admitted that an armed vessel may stop and search at sea a neutral bottom, and may take out goods which are contraband of war, without giving cause of offence, or being supposed in any degree to infringe neutral rights. But this practice could not be permitted within the rivers, harbors, or other places of a neutral, where its sovereignty was complete. It follows, then, that the full right of affording protection to all property whatever, within its own territory, which is inherent in every Government, is not transferred to a vessel navigating the high seas. The right of a belligerent over the goods of his enemy within his reach, is as complete as his right over contraband of war; and it seems a position not easily to be refuted, that a situation that will not protect the one, will not protect the other. A neutral bottom, then, does not, of right, in cases where no compact exists, protect from his enemy the goods of a belligerent Power.

To this reasoning, the practice of nations has conformed, and the common understanding of mankind seems to have assented. Vattel, b. 3. § 115, says, positively, "that effects belonging to an enemy, found on board a neutral ship, are seizable by the rights of war."

Vattel is believed to be supported by the most approved writers on the same subject. It is deemed unnecessary to multiply citations to this point, because France herself is supposed to have decided it. In her maritime ordonnance of the year 1744, which is considered as having been in force in 1778, enemy goods in neutral bottoms, generally, are declared liable to seizure and confiscation. From the operation of this rule are excepted the vessels of Denmark and the United Provinces, to whom special treaties secured the exception. In the ordonnance, too, of the 26th July, 1778, the first article of which is considered as forbidding the cruisers of France to stop and bring into port neutral vessels, having on board the goods of an enemy, a power is reserved to revoke the privilege granted to neutrals by that article, if the enemy should not grant the same privilege within six months from the publication of that regulation. This clearly indicates a conviction, that the exemption from the capture of the goods of an enemy, which should be found on board the vessel of a neutral power, not having stipulated such exemption by treaty, was a privilege granted by the ordonnance, and that the mere revocation of the ordonnance would abolish the privilege, and restore the ancient rule. It will not be contended that France continued in a long course of practice and of legislation opposed to her own opinion of the law of nations. It must, then, be considered as the opinion of France that, under that law, neutral bottoms afford no protection to the goods of an enemy. This principle, thus admitted to have been established, is supposed by some to have been changed by the armed neutrality. A new law of nations, it is contended, was introduced by that confederation. But who were the parties to that federation, and what was its object? The northern maritime Powers of Europe united to protect, by force, in their own bottoms, during the then existing war, the goods of either and of all the belligerent Powers. The compact in its own nature was confined with respect to its object and its duration. It did not purport to change, nor could it change permanently and universally, the rights of nations not becoming parties to it. It did indeed hold forth the promise of future, more permanent, and more general engagements for the same object, but such engagements were never formed. How then can this temporary and partial convention be considered as altering, radically and generally, principles which have been universally adopted, and in the modification of which all have an interest? Would France herself admit that a combination, such as that which constituted the armed neutrality, may rightfully change the law of nations, and establish a new code of universal obligation? It is believed that no nation on earth would more perseveringly oppose such an invasion of its sovereignty.

There seems, then, to be no solid ground for maintaining that the general law of nations has been at all varied by the armed neutrality.

It remains to inquire whether the treaties between France and the United States, pledge either nation to assert and establish the principle, that free bottoms make free goods.

The treaty of amity and commerce, concluded the 6th February, 1778, stipulates reciprocally for the right of trading with, and protecting the goods of, the enemy of either party in the vessels of the other, and in turn surrenders its own goods found in the vessels of an enemy, but it contains no clause imposing on either party the duty of extending the principle, or of supporting its application to other nations. The stipulations of that treaty are negative as well as affirmative. They specify as well the disabilities intended to be created, and the duties to be imposed, as the privileges designed to be granted. Had it been intended that either nation should have been bound to maintain this principle in its intercourse with others, or should have been in any degree incapacitated from prosecuting freely that intercourse, without the previous admission of the principle, a stipulation to that effect would have been made. No such stipulation having been made, the parties cannot be presumed to have intended it. Indeed it would have been madness in the United States, under their actual circumstances, to have formed such an agreement. There being no express stipulation to this effect, it cannot be supposed to have been implied. Nations forming a solemn compact, which ought to regulate their conduct towards each other, which is to be resorted to as the standard for adjusting their differences, do not leave to implication such delicate and important points. Indeed, if a great principle not mentioned is permitted to be implied, the object of a written agreement, which is itself to evidence all the obligation it creates, is totally defeated. But who is to make the implication, and to what extent is implication to be allowed? It is very easy to perceive, that the doctrine of implying in contracts stipulations never formed, would destroy all certainty of construction, and open a boundless field of controversy to the contracting parties.

It results from the very nature of a contract which affects the rights of the parties, but not of others, and from the admission of a general rule of action, binding independent of compact, which may be changed by consent, but is only changed so far as that consent is actually given, that a treaty between any two nations must leave to all others those rights which the law of nations acknowledges; and must leave each of the contracting parties subject to the operation of such rights. For the truth of this position, believed to be so clear in itself, and which it is supposed the history of all Europe will illustrate, the ordonnance of 1744, already quoted, is considered as furnishing an unequivocal authority. By that ordonnance the law of nations is applied to all those neutrals with whom France had not stipulated that the equality of their bottoms should be imparted to their cargoes, while those with whom such stipulations had been made are exempted from the application of the law.

The desire of establishing universally the principle that neutral bottoms shall make neutral goods, is, perhaps, felt by no nation on earth more strongly than by the United States. Perhaps no nation is more deeply interested in its establishment. It is an object they keep in view, and which, if not forced by violence to abandon it, they will pursue in such manner as their own judgment may dictate as being best calculated to attain it; but the wish to establish a principle is essentially different from a determination that it is already established. The interests of the United States could not fail to produce the wish: their duty forbid them to indulge it when deciding on a mere right. However solicitous America might be to pursue all proper means, tending to obtain for this principle the assent of all or any of the maritime Powers of Europe, she never conceived the idea of obtaining that consent by force.

The United States will only arm to defend their own rights: neither their policy nor their interests permit them to arm, in order to compel a surrender of the rights of others. These and other considerations, which have been submitted to the Government of France, produced, on the part of the United States, a decision, that their bottoms could not of right protect the goods of a belligerent Power from an enemy not bound to respect the principle. This decision was founded on the most perfect conviction that it was enjoined by the law of nations; and that good faith, respect for truth, and for the duties of an upright and honest judgment, rendered it indispensable. This conviction remains unshaken. If those articles, which still appear conclusive to the American Government, have not the same operation on the judgment of France, they must at least be sufficient to evince the sincerity with which that Government has acted, and to prove that its conduct, in this respect, was produced by a sense of duty, and not by any partiality for a nation, against which it was, at that time, considerably irritated by other causes.

The undersigned, citizen minister, rely too implicitly on your candor and discernment, to apprehend that you will estimate improperly the motives which, on this essential point, have influenced and guided the United States.

The early decision of the American Government on this subject was immediately avowed, openly and amply supported by Mr. Jefferson, the then Secretary of State, in his letter to Mr. Genet, dated the 24th July, 1793; and in his letter to Mr. Morris, dated 16th August in the same year. The arguments, which those letters contain, were supposed to have satisfied the Government of France, since its ministers in the United States no longer controverted the principle they supported. Indeed, those arguments appeared too conclusive to permit a doubt concerning the success which would attend them.

In August, 1794, when Mr. Monroe, the then minister of the United States to this republic, was received into the bosom of the Convention, France obviously did not consider the acknowledgment of this established principle of the law of nations as indicating a partiality towards her enemy. The language used on the occasion could only have been used to the minister of a nation, whose friendship was valued, and whose conduct had evinced the sincerity of its professions. It was then declared "that the sweetest, the frankest fraternity united in effect the two republics," and that "their union would be for ever indissoluble." These declarations, made long after America had avowed its neutrality, and had avowed its acquiescence, under the principle that a belligerent Power, unrestrained by particular treaty, may of right take out of the bottoms of a neutral, the goods of its enemy, demonstrate that neither that neutrality nor that acquiescence induced the want of a proper regard for France. The Government of the United States still cherishes the hope that this true and fair estimate then made of its conduct, may be soon resumed by a nation, whose friendship it has assiduously and unremittingly cultivated by all those means which good faith and justice could permit it to use.

After the discussion of this interesting question was supposed to have been closed, and France was believed to have been entirely content with that system in which the United States found themselves bound to persevere, some complaints were made, not against the principles adopted by the Government, but against the application of those principles to particular cases, supposed not to come within them. The neutrality of the United States could not permit prize to be made of those vessels belonging to nations with whom they were at peace, within their jurisdiction, or by privateers fitted out in their own ports. Regulations to this effect were necessarily made; and to enforce the observance of those regulations was a duty not to be dispensed with. The right of one of the belligerent Powers to obtain the release of a vessel, captured under such circumstances, was as sacred as the right of the captor to a vessel taken on the high seas, and which, according to the usages of war, was lawful prize. The United States were bound to respect the rights of both. To do so, it was necessary to examine the facts; for which purpose, a tribunal, in which both parties might be fairly heard, was unavoidable. Some complaints were made of particular vexations, and each complaint has heretofore been particularly attended to. It is believed to be unnecessary to review these several cases, because the undersigned are entirely persuaded that explanations already given, must have been completely satisfactory. Should any of them be still considered as furnishing subject for complaint, the undersigned will proceed to its investigation, with the most sincere desire to attain truth, and to redress the wrong, if any has been committed.

During this period, the causes of complaint against France, on the part of the United States, were by no means inconsiderable. Their commerce was not exempt from depredations, believed to be entirely unwarrantable, made upon it by the cruisers of this republic.

On the 9th of May, 1793, the National Convention passed a decree relative to the commerce of neutrals—the first article of which is in these words: "The French ships of war and privateers may stop and bring into the ports of the republic such neutral vessels as are loaded, in whole or in part, either with provisions belonging to neutrals, and destined for enemy's ports, or with merchandise belonging to enemies." In consequence of the remonstrances of the American minister, the Convention, on the 23d May, declared "that the vessels of the United States are not comprised in the regulations of the decree of the 9th May." On the 28th of the same month, the Convention repealed the decree of the 23d: on the 1st July, they re-established it; on the 27th July, it was again repealed. Under the decree of the 9th May, the vessels of the United States were captured, brought into the ports of France, and their cargoes disposed of. Could this decree, citizen minister, be regarded otherwise than as infringing the laws of nations, the rights of neutrals, and the particular engagements subsisting between France and the United States.

When, on the 8th of June, in the same year, the British Government issued a similar order; its injustice produced a ferment throughout America, indicating strong dispositions immediately to oppose its execution by force. The letter of Mr. Jefferson, the then Secretary of State, to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at London, dated the 7th September, 1793, and remonstrating against the order of the 5th June, contains so much justness of sentiment and strength of argument, as to have been quoted by your predecessor, in his letter to Mr. Monroe of the 9th March, 1796.

It cannot escape you, citizen minister, that the arguments of Mr. Jefferson, concerning the order of the 8th June, apply conclusively to the decree of the 9th May; and that to them are to be added, those arguments which are to be drawn from the hardship of being absolutely compelled, without any alternative, to part with the cargoes in France, and those also which are drawn from the duties imposed by an express and solemn treaty.

Nothing can demonstrate more conclusively the real temper of the United States, than the difference between the reception given to the decree of the Convention of the 9th May, and that which was given to the order of the British cabinet of the 8th June.

A large number of American vessels, too, were for a long time detained at Bordeaux, very much to the injury of the owners, without assigning a motive for such detention, or putting it in the power of the Government to conjecture the cause of a measure, which so deeply affected the interest of their fellow-citizens—these and other embarrassments were experienced, but they could not diminish the attachment of the United States to France. In the midst of them, prayers were offered up, through the whole extent of the American continent, for the success of this republic. The Government, feeling the same sentiment, displayed it, at least as far as was compatible with the decent deportment required from a nation not a party in the war, and professing neutrality. Such would not have been the conduct of a Government and people, in secret unfriendly to France.

Very strong and just resentments were at that time inspired by the hostile conduct of Britain. The instructions of June, 1793, whereby American vessels, laden with provisions for France, were brought into the ports of Britain, there to sell such cargoes, or to give security to sell them in other ports in amity with England, and the still more offensive order of November the 6th, in the same year, whereby vessels laden with the produce of a French colony, or carrying provisions to such colony, were ordered to be brought in for adjudication; added to the pre-existing causes of mutual irritation, had produced such a state of things, as to render it obvious that the injuries complained of by America must be entirely done away, or that war was the inevitable consequence.

This state of things was not so altered by the order of the 8th of January, 1794, revoking that of the sixth of November, 1793, as to promise a different result. But as a nation preferring peace to war will ever make a peaceful demand of reparation for injuries sustained, before that reparation is sought by the sword; and as the policy of America has ever been, "to pursue peace with unremitting zeal, before the last resource, which has so often been the scourge of nations, and could not fail to check the advanced prosperity of the United States, was contemplated," an envoy extraordinary was deputed to His Britannic Majesty. "Carrying with him a full knowledge of the existing temper and sensibility of his country, it was expected that he would vindicate its rights with firmness, and cultivate peace with sincerity."

Truly desirous, as the American Government was, of preserving peace with Britain, its determination was unalterable, not to preserve it, nor to receive compensation for injuries sustained, nor security against their future commission, at the expense of the smallest of its engagements to France. Explicit and positive instructions to this effect were given to Mr. Jay, and those instructions were freely communicated to the minister of this republic, then at Philadelphia. The negotiation of the American envoy terminated in a treaty in many respects desirable to the United States.

But, however desirable its objects might be, the Government of the United States would not have hesitated to reject them, had they been accompanied with any stipulation violating or weakening its engagements to France. But it has been able to discern no such stipulation; the twenty-fifth article of that treaty guards the rights of this republic by the following clause: "Nothing in this treaty contained shall, however, be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns or States." The treaty with France being a "former and existing public treaty," and it being thus provided that nothing contained in the treaty with Britain "should be construed or operate contrary to it," the Government of the United States did not apprehend that the treaty with Britain could be considered as affecting its relations to France. But such was its attention to its ally, that the instrument was, previous to its ratification, submitted to the consideration of the minister of this republic, who was invited to communicate freely to the Government of the United States such observations upon it as he might judge proper. Mr. Adet, in a letter addressed to Mr. Randolph, dated 12th Messidor, 3d year of the French republic, (30th June, 1795) expresses his sense of this procedure in the following words: "this frank measure is to me a sure guaranty of the friendship of the American Government towards France, and of the fidelity with which it always marks its conduct towards a faithful ally." He then stated those reflections to which the reading of the treaty had given birth. The articles which relate to enemy goods in neutral bottoms are mentioned without a comment. He contended, that the list of contraband was swelled, and that the 23d, 24th, and 25th articles of the treaty with Britain, ceded to that power advantages inconsistent with the previous cessions to France. This letter was answered by Mr. Randolph, on the 6th of July following, who proves, that no article was enumerated in the list of contraband, in the treaty between the United States and Britain, which was not of that description, previous to its formation, and independent of it; noticed briefly the subject of enemy goods in neutral bottoms; and demonstrated, that the objections of Mr. Adet to the 23d, 24th, and 25th articles were entirely founded on a misconstruction of them. This misconstruction was so apparent, that Britain has never claimed it, nor would the American Government ever have admitted it. The letter of Mr. Randolph closes the subject of enemy contraband, and of enemy property taken out of neutral bottoms, with a paragraph, to which, citizen minister, your attention is solicited: "Hitherto, however, (says he) I have spoken upon principles of right. Upon any other principles, and more especially upon those of hardship and injury to a friend, it shall be a topic of the negotiation now opening between us. With the temper which will pervade the whole of it, I cannot doubt that some modification may be devised, and it may be separated from the general treaty, so as not to be delayed by it."

It was then apparent, that the Government of the United States, actuated by that friendship which transcends the line of strict obligation, was willing, gratuitously, to release her ally from those stipulations of a former treaty, which, in the course of events, were deemed to operate unfavorably to her. This readiness to concede, marked that friendship the more strongly, as the situations in which the two nations found themselves could not have been unforeseen, but was the very situation for which the article provides. The answer of Mr. Randolph concludes, with requesting an opportunity to remove any remaining doubts, should there be such, by further explanations: no remaining doubts were stated, and therefore, as well as for its contents, the letter was believed to be entirely satisfactory to Mr. Adet, and it was hoped, that this Government, as well as that of America, would consider the treaty with Britain as an accommodation desirable by the United States, and not disadvantageous to France.

It is not easy to express the chagrin felt by the American Government on learning that, in this treaty, the United States were supposed to have "knowingly and evidently sacrificed their connexions with this republic, and the most essential and least contested prerogatives of neutrality." With the firmness of conscious integrity, the United States aver, that they have never knowingly sacrificed or impaired their connexions with this republic, nor the prerogatives of neutrality, but that they have, according to their best judgment, invariably sought to preserve both.

The undersigned will endeavor faithfully to state the impressions of the Government they represent on this interesting subject. The objections made to this treaty by your predecessor in office, in his note to Mr. Monroe, dated 19th of Ventose, 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible (9th March, 1796) are:

1st. That the United States, besides having departed from the principles established by the armed neutrality, have given to England, to the detriment of their first allies, the most striking mark of an unbounded condescension, by abandoning the limits given to contraband by the law of nations, by their treaties with all other nations, and even by those of England with the greater part of the maritime powers.

2d. That they have consented to extend the denomination of contraband even to provisions. Instead of pointing out particularly, as all treaties do, the cases of the effective blockade of a place, as alone forming an exception to the freedom of this article, they have tacitly acknowledged the pretensions raised by England, to create blockades in the colonies, and even in France, by the force of a bare proclamation.

Mr. Adet, in his letter to Mr. Pickering, dated 25th Brumaire, 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible, (15th November, 1796,) has repeated the same objections, and has been pleased also to superadd some observations relative to the formation of such a treaty generally, and the circumstances attending its negotiation, in terms not to have been expected by the first, and almost only voluntary friend of the republic.

These having been the only specific objections officially made to the treaty with Britain, by the Government of France, either in Paris or in Philadelphia, are necessarily supposed to be the only objections which have occurred.

They have often been discussed on the part of the United States, but that discussion will be renewed, because, although the undersigned may be unable to suggest any argument not heretofore urged, they cannot resist the hope that an attentive reconsideration of those arguments may give them a success which has not yet attended them.

The first objection may be supposed to consist of two parts. 1st. The abandonment of the principle, that neutral bottoms make neutral goods; an objection rather insinuated than expressed; and 2dly, the addition to the catalogue of contraband.

1st. On the first part of the objection, it is observable, that the statements of the late minister of exterior relations, and of Mr. Adet, seem to admit, but certainly do not controvert the position, that previous to the formation of the armed neutrality, a belligerent power could rightfully take out of the bottoms of a neutral the goods of its enemy. This position is believed to be uncontrovertible; some of the arguments in support of it have been already detailed, and it is deemed unnecessary to repeat or to add to them. To this principle of the armed neutrality, with a departure from which the United States seem to be impliedly charged, the note of M. de la Croix does not assign any obligation whatever; nor does he appear to consider it as having been engrafted by that confederation on the law of nations. On this point Mr. Adet has not been more explicit. He seems to have been content with vague insinuations, and not to have been willing to commit himself by a direct averment, that in consequence of the armed neutrality the law of nations on this subject is changed. The undersigned are unwilling to combat at length a proposition not positively advanced, which they deem so clearly indefensible, and will therefore refer to the brief observation already made respecting it.

It may not, however, be improper here to notice, that in February, 1778, when the treaty between France and the United States was entered into, the armed neutrality had not been formed; of consequence, the state of things on which that treaty operated, was regulated by the law of nations, as it clearly existed previous to the formation of the armed neutrality. It is supposed to be admitted, that, according to that state of things, neutral bottoms could afford no protection to the goods of an enemy. The stipulation then of the article of that treaty was understood, at the time, by the contracting parties, to form an exception to a general rule, which would retain its obligations in all cases where it was not changed. If, then, the contracting parties had designed to impose on each other the necessity of extending this exception to other nations, so as to convert it into a general rule, they would have expressed this intention in their contract: not having expressed it, they must be considered as intending that this exception should form a rule as between themselves, while the general rule should govern as with other nations who had not consented to change it.

It is also worthy of observation, that when this treaty was made, the United States were at war, and France at peace with Britain. In this state of things, which might have continued, had not war been declared, or hostilities commenced by England, the bottoms of France would have protected, from American cruisers, English property, while they would not have protected from British cruisers American property. This was the necessary result of that state of things under which the treaty was formed: America had consented to it; and neither could or would have complained.

It is also to be noticed, that before the negotiation with England had commenced, the Government of the United States had openly avowed that opinion on this subject, which its best judgment dictated. This opinion, perfectly unconnected with that negotiation, was known by all to form and regulate the basis of its conduct. The letters from Mr. Jefferson, already quoted, had stated to the world the perject conviction of the United States, that, by the law of nations, a belligerent power, not restrained by particular treaty, might rightfully take out of the bottoms of a neutral the goods of its enemy; as well as their determination, that they could not, and ought not to oppose the exercise of this right. The right having been clearly and unavoidably admitted, and the determination to acquiesce under its exercise having been avowed openly, Mr. Jay could only solicit its surrender. Had no treaty been formed, or had that treaty omitted to mention the principle, the right would still have existed, would still have been acknowledged, and would still have been exercised. The treaty does not, in fact or in impression, cede a new privilege; it regulates the exercise of one before existing, and before acknowledged to exist. The harsh means of exercising this right, which are given by the law of nations, are modified and softened by the treaty, and this is the only effect which the article on this subject has produced; it was the only motive, and it was a sufficient motive for introducing it.

The second branch of this objection seems more to be relied on, and comes forward in a more decisive shape; it is, that the United States have abandoned the limit given to contraband by the law of nations, by their treaties with all other nations, and even by those of England with a greater part of the maritime powers.

The limits of contraband is supposed to have been extended, by inserting in the catalogue, naval stores, and timber for ship building.

To estimate rightly a charge so warmly made, it becomes indispensable to ascertain whether these articles are, independent of treaty, by the law of nations contraband of war: on this simple point seems to rest the verity of the accusation.

It is regretted that those, who have averred the negative, have not been pleased to furnish authorities in support of the opinion they advanced. Such authorities would have been considered with candor, and any conviction they might have produced would have been freely acknowledged. But no such authorities are furnished, and it is believed that none exist.

America, solicitous to confine as much as possible, by common consent, the list of contraband, but determined, however she might oppose its enlargement, not to attempt its diminution by force, was under the necessity of examining the subject, and of ascertaining the line of partition between the rights of neutrals and of belligerent powers.

As guides in such a search she could only take the most approved writers on the law of nations. These are believed to class timber for ship building, and naval stores for the equipment of vessels, among articles admitted to be contraband of war. [Vattel, b. 3. c. 7. sect. 112.] defines contraband goods to be "commodities particularly used in war: such are arms, military and *naval stores, timber, horses, and even provisions in certain junctures, where there are hopes of reducing the enemy by famine." The treaty between France and Denmark, concluded in 1742, places tar, rosin, sails, hemp, cordage, masts, and timber for ship building, on the catalogue of contraband: and Valin, in his Commentary on the Marine Ordinances of France, [vol. 2. page 264,] says that "of right these articles are now contraband, and have been so from the commencement of the present century." In conformity with these opinions has been that of America: and if the law of nations was understood by the most approved jurists, she has not erred.

But the modern public law of nations, and modern treaties, are said to have established a different rule. If the modern public law of nations has changed the principle, such change is yet unknown to the United States. It is much to be wished that more full and satisfactory information had been given in support of an opinion, a difference on which is alleged to have produced consequences so extremely calamitous.

It is not averred that the armed neutrality has constituted this modern public law. It is supposed that this cannot be averred, because France will never admit the right of a confederacy, whatever may be its power, to impose the law on those who are not parties to it. It is supposed, also, that this cannot be averred for another reason. The members of the armed neutrality had not themselves agreed upon the articles which should be deemed contraband. Russia, the Power originating that celebrated, though short lived compact, published in 1780 the principles on which she would maintain the commerce of her subjects: one of these was, that the articles of contraband should be regulated by the 10th and 11th articles of her treaty of commerce with Great Britain.

* For ship building.

Afterwards, Denmark entered into a convention with Russia for maintaining generally the principles agreed upon; but on the subject of contraband, in particular, Denmark adopted as the rule, by which to be governed, her treaty of commerce with Great Britain, concluded the 10th of July, 1670, in the third article of which, contraband goods are described to be "any provisions of war, as soldiers, arms, machines, cannon, ships, or other things of necessary use in war." But by a convention concluded at London, on the 4th of July, 1780, between Great Britain and Denmark, to explain the treaty of commerce of 1670, between the two Powers, "Timber, for ship building, tar, rosin, copper in sheets, sails, hemp, and cordage, and generally whatever serves directly for the equipment of a vessel, unwrought iron and fir planks excepted," are declared to be contraband.

Denmark having, in her convention with Russia, adopted her treaty with England, made in 1670, as declaratory of those articles which she would consider as contraband, and having, by her explanatory agreement with England, substituted a particular enumeration of articles, for a general description of them, not as an amendment, but as an explanation of the treaty of 1670, has taken a different rule, in the very compact referred to as establishing a modern public law of nations, from that taken by Russia. The rule of Denmark classes among contraband precisely the same articles which are enumerated as such in the treaty between the United States and Britain, and which are only found in that enumeration, because it is believed that the law of nations has unquestionably so placed them. Sweden and Holland, too, in acceding to the armed neutrality, adopt their own treaties as the rule by which they will respectively be guided. There was then, even among the parties to this agreement no fixed law of contraband. Had the potentates of Europe designed to establish permanently and generally the principles of the armed neutrality, the war which originated that convention would not have terminated without some general agreement concerning it: the efforts of Sweden to obtain a Congress for examining and terminating the different concerns both of the Powers at war and of the neutral States, could not have proved entirely abortive.

No argument then can be drawn from the armed neutrality in support of the position, that the modern public law of nations, relating to contraband, has been abandoned by the United States. No modern public law having been formed, the rule remains unchanged; and, at the present moment, as well as when the treaty with France was formed, is believed to ordain as contraband the articles enumerated as such in the treaty with Britain.

But it is alleged that, in this treaty, the United States have abandoned the limits given to contraband by their treaties with all other nations, and even by those of England with a greater part of the maritime Powers.

It is true that the United States, desirous of liberating commerce, have invariably seized every opportunity which presented itself to diminish or remove the shackles imposed on that of neutrals. In pursuance of this policy they have on no occasion hesitated to reduce the list of contraband, as between themselves and any nation consenting to such reduction. Their pre-existing treaties have been with nations as willing as themselves to change the old rule; and consequently, a stipulation to that effect being desired by both parties, has been made without difficulty. Each contracting party is deemed to have an equivalent for the cession made, in the similar cession it receives from the party with whom it contracts. Neither requires of the other, as an additional consideration, that it shall propagate by the sword the principles which form the basis of their private agreements, and force unwilling nations to adopt them; nor that it should decline to regulate by treaty its interests with any other nation which should refuse to accede to them; as little could either suppose that its particular contract contained any thing obligatory on others, or was capable of enlarging or diminishing their rights. The treaties of the United States then with other nations can only establish the limits of contraband, as between the contracting parties, and must leave that subject, with nations not parties to the contract, to the law which would have governed had such particular stipulations never been made. According to the existing state of things when the negotiations between the United States and Great Britain were opened, naval stores and timber for ship-building were, as between America and Britain, contraband of war; they would have retained this character had the treaty never been made; they would have retained it had the treaty contained no provision on the subject. The United States were truly desirous of excluding them from the list, but Britain was unwilling to do so. Had the United States possessed the means of coercion, their established policy, founded on the basis of justice, and their own peculiar situation, forbid a resort to these means for any other purpose than the defence of their own rights, or a compliance with their own engagements. It was not a case in which force would have been deemed justifiable; and the object, being unattainable by mutual consent, was unavoidably relinquished for the moment. Yet it was proper to enumerate the articles which were before contraband, and which continued to be so, because that enumeration notified to the merchants of the United States the hazard which their commodities would encounter on the seas; and because, also, it prevents those vexatious altercations, which might otherwise have been produced by the efforts of one party to swell, and of the other to reduce the list.

If, on the refusal of Britain to substitute any other rule concerning contraband, in the place of that established by the law of nations, France finds herself in a situation to be injured by an observance of her engagements with the United States, it is not the treaty with Britain, but that with France which has produced this situation. This was foreseen when that treaty was entered into, and did not prevent it. The stipulation concerning contraband was formed when France was at peace, and America at war; although that state of things did not long continue, yet its continuance was by no means deemed impossible. Notwithstanding this, the Government of the United States has manifested a willingness to change this stipulation, as well as that which respects enemies' property in neutral bottoms, so soon as France complained of them: of this the letter from Mr. Randolph to Mr. Adet, already quoted, affords conclusive testimony.

It appears then on examining this objection to the treaty between the United States and Britain, that it has not added to the catalogue of contraband a single article; that it has ceded no privilege; has granted no right; and that it has not changed, in the most minute circumstance, the pre-existing situation of the United States in relation either to France or to Great Britain. Notwithstanding those truths, the Government of the United States has hastened to assure its former friend that, if the stipulations between them be found oppressive in practice, it is ready to offer up those stipulations a willing sacrifice at the shrine of friendship.

In vain will you search in this procedure for "a known and evident sacrifice on the part of the United States, of their connexions with this republic, and of the most essential and least contested prerogatives of neutrality." In vain will you search for evidence of their "having given to England, to the detriment of their first allies, the most striking mark of an unbounded condescension; by abandoning the limits given to contraband by the law of nations; by their treaties with all other nations; and even by those of England with the greater part of the maritime Powers."

The United States feel these reproaches, as conscious innocence feels the imputation of guilt.

2dly. It is also alleged that "the United States have consented to extend the denomination of contraband even to provisions. Instead of pointing out particularly, as all treaties do, the cases of the effective blockade of a place, as alone forming an exception to the freedom of this article, they have tacitly acknowledged the pretensions raised by England to create blockades, in our colonies, and even in France, by the force of a bare proclamation."

The objections to this article shall be considered according to its letter, and according to its operation.

The objectionable words are: "and, whereas, the difficulty of agreeing on the precise cases in which alone provisions and other articles, not generally contraband, may be regarded as such, renders it expedient to provide against the inconveniences and misunderstandings which might thence arise: It is further agreed, that whenever any such articles so becoming contraband, according to the existing laws of nations, shall, for that reason, be seized, the same shall not be confiscated; but the owners thereof shall be speedily and completely indemnified; and the captors, or, in their default, the Government, under whose authority they act, shall pay, to the masters or owners of such vessels, the full value of all such articles, with a reasonable mercantile profit thereon, together with the freight, and also the demurrage incident to such detention."

The admissions contained in this clause, are—

1st. That provisions are not generally contraband; and 2dly. that they are sometimes contraband.

An effort was made to establish the precise cases in which alone they should be subject to seizure; but America would only consent to consider them as contraband in the case of an effective blockade, siege, or investment of a place; while, on the part of England, this strict interpretation of the rule was not admitted: but it was contended that provisions became contraband, when there were reasonable hopes of reducing the enemy by famine. In this opposition of sentiment, to what have the United States consented? "To extend the denomination of contraband even to provisions?" "To acknowledge tacitly the pretensions raised by England to create brockades in your colonies, and even in France, by the force of a bare proclamation?" "To secure to the English alone the carriage of meals?" "In a word, to have commerce only with England?" Reconsider the words themselves, and it will require no comment to prove how inapplicable to them are these assertions. The clause complained of, having stated the admission and the difficulty already mentioned, proceeds to say: "It is further agreed that whenever any such articles, so becoming contraband, according to the laws of nations, shall for that reason be seized, the same shall not be confiscated, but the owners thereof shall be speedily and completely indemnified."

It is too clear to admit of contestation, that this clause does not declare provisions to be contraband, or admit of their seizure in any other case than where, "according to the existing law of nations, they should become contraband:" in such case the right to seize them is not given by this article, but it is admitted by France and by all the world to exist, independent of treaty. In such case they would have been seized had this stipulation never been entered into; and would have been confiscated also. The only alteration, which is by the letter of the clause produced in the law of nations, is to exempt from confiscation goods which under that law would have been subject to it.

But it has been suspected to have an object and an operation in practice different from its letter. It has been suspected to cover a design to admit substantially certain principles, with respect to blockades, which, in theory, are denied.

Incapable of duplicity, America, with the pride of conscious integrity, repels this insinuation, and courts an investigation of the facts on which it is founded:

The Government of the United States, and that of Britain, having construed the law of nations differently, in this respect, each would have acted upon its own opinion of that law: the privateers of England would have seized as contraband any goods deemed such in their courts of admiralty; and the Government of the United States would have reclaimed such goods, and would have supported the demand in such a manner as its own judgment dictated. This procedure is not changed. The right to make such reclamation has not been relinquished, nor has the legality of the seizure, in any other case than that of an attempt to enter a place actually invested, been in any degree admitted.

It is true, that the British Government renewed the order concerning provisions about the time of the ratification of this treaty: but it is not less true, that the Government of the United States manifested a firm resolution to submit to no such construction, and remonstrated so seriously against it as to produce a revocation of the order. Nor is this all: claims for provisions seized in cases of a mere proclamation-blockade have been actually made, and have been actually decided in favor of the claimants. The British Government has acquiesced under such decisions by paying the sums awarded. These sums were not limited to a reasonable profit on the price of the commodity seized, but were regulated by its price at the port of destination, and consequently the actual as well as avowed principle of such decisions was, that the goods seized had not become contraband "according to the existing law of nations."

The intention of the Government then, and the practice under the article, are in direct opposition to these injurious suspicions, the indulgence of which has produced such pernicous effects. It is even believed that the decision on this subject will be one step towards the establishment of that principle for which America has never ceased to contend. It is also believed, and has ever been believed, that the article objected to would have a necessary tendency to increase, and did, in fact, increase the quantity of provisions imported from America into France and her colonies. The American commerce, being entirely in the hands of individuals, is consequently conducted by them according to their own views of particular advantage: they will unquestionably endeavor to supply the highest market, unless restrained from doing so by other considerations which render it unadvisable to attempt such a supply. In their calculations, the risk of reaching the market is too important an item to be passed over or forgotten. Every diminution of this risk adds to the number of those who will attempt the supply: and consequently a knowledge that the voyage, should it even fail by the seizure of the vessel, would yet be profitable, must increase the number of those who would make it.

It is plain, then, that this article admits the seizure of provisions in no situation where they were not before seizable; and encourages their transportation to France, and her colonies, by diminishing the risk of such transportation.

It is also complained of, that this treaty has not, "as all treaties do, pointed out particularly the cases of the effective blockade of a place," as alone forming an exception to the freedom of provisions.

Articles in a treaty can only be inserted by consent. The United States, therefore, can never be responsible for not having inserted an article to which the other contracting party would not assent. They may refuse to make any change in the existing state of things, prejudicial to themselves or to other Powers; and they have refused to make any such change. But it is not in their power to insert, as by common consent, an article, though merely declaratory of a principle which they considered as certainly existing, and which they mean to support, if such common consent be unattainable. All that can be done, in such case, is to leave the principle unimpaired, reserving entirely the right to assert it. This has been done; the principle was left unimpaired, and has been since successfully asserted.

The United States are at all times truly solicitous to diminish as much as possible the list of contraband. It is their interest, in common with all other nations whose policy is peace, to enlarge, so far as they can be enlarged, the rights of neutrals. This interest is a sure guaranty for their using those means which they think calculated to effect the object, and which a just regard to their situation will permit. But they must be allowed to pursue the object, in such a manner as may comport with that situation. While they surrender no actual right, in preserving which there is a common interest; while they violate no pre-existing engagement (and these they have not surrendered or violated) they must judge exclusively for themselves how far they will or ought to go in their efforts to acquire new rights, or establish new principles. When they surrender this privilege, they cease to be independent, and they will no longer deserve to be free. They will have surrendered into other hands the most sacred of deposites—the right of self-government; and instead of the approbation, they will merit the contempt of the world.

Those parts of the treaty between the United States and Britain, which have been selected by France as injurious to her, have now been examined. The undersigned are too well convinced that they in no degree justify the enmity they are alleged to have produced, not to rely on a candid reconsideration of them as a sure mean of removing the impressions they are supposed to have made.

Before this subject is entirely closed, one other objection will be noticed. The very formation of a commercial treaty with England seems to be reprobated as furnishing just cause of offence to France; and Mr. Adet has permitted himself to say: "It was a little matter only to allow the English to avail themselves of the advantages of our treaty: it was necessary to assure these to them by the aid of a contract, which might serve at once as a reply to the claims of France, and as peremptory motives for refusals; the true cause of which it was requisite incessantly to disguise to her under specious pretexts. Such was the object of Mr. Jay's mission to London; such was the object of a negotiation enveloped from its origin in the shadow of mystery, and covered with the veil of dissimulation."

Passing over this extraordinary language, the undersigned, being only desirous of producing accommodation by the exhibition of truth, will consider the opinion which is obliquely hinted, and the fact which is directly averred.

The practice of forming commercial treaties is so universal among other nations, having any commercial intercourse with each other, that it seems unnecessary to discuss their utility. The right to form these treaties has been so universally asserted and admitted, that it seems to be the inseparable attribute of sovereignty, to be questioned only by those who question the right of a nation to govern itself, and to be ceded only by those who are prepared to cede their independence.

But the prosperity of the United States is, in a peculiar degree, promoted by external commerce. A people almost exclusively agricultural have not within themselves a market for the surplus produce of their labor, or a sufficient number and variety of articles of exchange to supply the wants of the cultivator: they cannot have an internal, which will compensate for the loss of an external commerce: they must search abroad for manufactures, and for many other articles which contribute to the comfort and convenience of life, and they must search abroad also for a market for that large portion of the productions of their soil which cannot be consumed at home. The policy of a nation thus circumstanced must ever be to encourage external commerce, and to open to itself every possible market for the disposition of its superfluities, and the supply of its wants. The commercial and manufacturing character and capacities of England must turn into that channel a considerable portion of the commerce of any nation under the circumstances of the United States. It is a market too important and too valuable to be voluntarily closed; in consequence, a considerable portion of their commerce has taken that direction, and a continual solicitude has been manifested to regulate and secure it by contract. To abolish this commerce, or to refuse to give it permanence and security by fair and equal stipulations, would be a sacrifice which no nation ought to require, and which no nation ought to make. In forming her treaty of amity and commerce with the United States, France claimed no such prerogative. That treaty declares the intention of the parties to be, "to fix in an equitable and permanent manner the rules which ought to be followed relative to the correspondence and commerce, which the two parties desire to establish between their respective countries, States, and subjects;" and that "they have judged that the said end could not be better obtained than by taking for the basis of their agreement the most perfect equality and reciprocity; and by carefully avoiding all those burthensome preferences, which are usually sources of debate, embarrassment and discontent; by leaving also each party at liberty to make respecting commerce and navigation, those interior regulations which it shall find most convenient to itself; and by founding the advantages of commerce solely upon reciprocal utility, and the just rules of free intercourse; reserving withal to each party the liberty of admitting at its pleasure other nations to a participation of the same advantages." The treaty itself contains no stipulation in any degree contradictory to these declarations of the preamble, or which could suggest a suspicion that under those declarations we concealed a wish to abridge the sovereignty of the United States with respect to treaties, or to control their interests in regard to commerce. In forming a commercial treaty with Britain, therefore, in which no peculiar privilege is granted, the Government of the United States believed itself to be transacting a business exclusively its own, which could give umbrage to none, and which no other nation on earth would consider itself as having a right to interfere in. There existed consequently no motive for concealing from or declaring to France, or any other Power, that the negotiations of Mr. Jay might or might not terminate in a commercial treaty. The declaration therefore was not made; nor is it usual for nations about to enter into negotiations, to proclaim to others the various objects to which those negotiations may possibly be directed. Such is not, nor has it ever been the practice of France. To suppose a necessity or a duty on the part of one Government thus to proclaim all its views, or to consult another with respect to its arrangements of its own affairs, is to imply a dependence, to which no Government ought willingly to submit. So far as the interests of France might be involved in the negotiation, the instruction given to the negotiator were promptly communicated. The minister of this republic was informed officially that Mr. Jay was instructed not to weaken the engagements of the United States to France. Further information was neither to have been required or expected, indeed, that which was given furnished reason to suppose that one of the objects of the negotiation with Great Britain was a commercial treaty. Why, then, such unnecessary and unmerited sarcasms against a cautious and unoffending ally? Those objects which she pursued were such as an independent nation might legitimately pursue, and such as America never had dissembled, and never deemed it necessary to dissemble her wish to obtain. Why should an effort be made to impress France with an opinion, that Mr. Jay was not authorized to negotiate a commercial treaty with Britain, when the fixed opinion of America had ever been, that France could not be and ought not to be dissatisfied with the formation of such a treaty? Why should the minister of France have been informed officially, that Mr. Jay was especially instructed not to weaken the engagements of the United States to France, if it was intended to convince that minister, that his powers did not extend to subjects in any degree connected with those engagements? To what purpose should the Government of the United States have practised a deception deemed by itself totally unnecessary, and which its utmost efforts could not long continue? It requires an equal degree of folly and vice to practise an useless fraud which must inevitably and immediately be detected, and the detection of which must expose its authors to general infamy, as well as to the enmity of those on whom the fraud had been practised. These considerations ought to have produced some hesitation concerning the fact. The testimony in support of it ought to have been very positive and very unexceptionable before it received implicit faith. It should have been very clear that there was no mistake, no misunderstanding concerning the information communicated, before the charge was made in such terms as the minister of France has been pleased to employ: but the testimony is believed to be satisfactory, that the Government of the United States has not endeavoured to impress on France any opinion on this subject, which the fact of the case did not warrant. The declaration of Mr. Randolph, made July 8th, 1795, is full on this point. It is in these words: "I never could with truth have informed the French minister, that the mission, as set forth in the President's message to the Senate, contemplated only an adjustment of our complaints; if by this phrase it be intended to exclude commercial arrangements. I could have no reason for saying so, since the French republic could have had nothing to do with our commercial arrangements, if they did not derogate from her rights: it could have answered no purpose when so short a time would develop the contrary—I never did inform the French minister as is above stated.

"The only official conversation, which I recollect with Mr. Fauchet upon this subject, was when I communicated to him, with the President's permission, that Mr. Jay was instructed not to weaken our engagements to France: neither then nor at any other time in official, or unofficial conversation, did I ever say to him that nothing of a commercial nature was contemplated, or that nothing but the controversies under the old treaty and the spoliations were contemplated.

"Mr. Fauchet sometime ago said to me, that he understood from what I said, that Mr. Jay was not authorized to treat of commercial matters. I told him that he misunderstood me, no letter has ever passed upon this subject."

If, then, Mr. Randolph did give Mr. Fauchet the information contended for, it is plain that hen ever was authorized to do so; but the considerations already detailed render it infinitely more probable that Mr. Fauchet has misunderstood Mr. Randolph, than that Mr. Randolph has misinformed Mr. Fauchet.

The undersigned have taken, they trust, a correct view of the leading and influential measures adopted by the Government of the United States: they have endeavored to state with plainness and with candor the motives which have occasioned the adoption of those measures, and the operation they are believed to have. They have shown, that if America is to be reproached with partialities, irreconcileable with her neutral situation, it is not by France that those reproaches ought to be made. They have been induced to take this review by a hope, which they cannot relinquish without regret, that it may contribute to efface impressions which misrepresentation may have made, and to take from the intentions and conduct of the government they represent, that false coloring which unfriendly pencils have so profusely bestowed upon them. They are anxious still to cherish the hope, that by exposing frankly and sincerely the sentiments which have hitherto guided their nation, they may restore dispositions on the part of France, compatible with the continuance of those sentiments.

Complaints have been made that in the application in particular cases of those general principles, which the neutral station of the United States rendered indispensable, inconveniences and vexations which were unavoidable have been sometimes sustained. These complaints have been separately and fully discussed.

The undersigned persuade themselves that the explanations which have been given respecting them, if not entirely satisfactory, have yet been such as to prove the good faith and upright intentions which have never ceased to direct the conduct of the United States.

If, notwithstanding this good faith and the purity of these intentions, the difficulty of their situation has in any case produced even an involuntary departure from those principles by which they professed to be guided, they are ready to consider that case, and to repair any fault which may inadvertently have been committed. With these dispositions on their part, with this consciousness of having never ceased to merit the friendship and esteem of the French nation, with a conviction that a temperate and thorough view of the past cannot fail to remove prejudices not warranted by facts, the United States have relied confidently on the justice of France for a discontinuance and reparation of those serious and heavy injuries, which have been accumulated on them.

Desirous of establishing, not the dependence of a weak on a powerful nation, but that real and cordial friendship, the willing and spontaneous offering of generous minds, which can only be lasting when evidenced to be mutual, and can only be preserved when bottomed on reciprocal justice, the undersigned will now represent with candor and frankness the well founded complaints with which they are charged.

These complaints consist:—

Of claims uncontroverted by the Government of France, but which remain unsatisfied, and

Of claims founded on captures and confiscations, the illegality of which has not yet been admitted.

In the first class of cases are arranged—

1stly, Those whose property has been seized under the decree of the National Convention of the 9th May, 1793.

2dly, Those who are entitled to compensation in consequence of the long detention of their vessels at Bordeaux in the years of 1793 and 1794.

3dly, The holders of bills and other evidences of debts due drawn by the colonial administrations in the West Indies.

4thly, Those whose cargoes have been appropriated to public use without receiving therefor adequate payment; and 5thly, Those who have supplied the Government under contract with its agents, which have not yet been complied with on the part of France.

These well founded claims of American citizens, thus originating in voluntary and important supplies, in the forcible seizure of valuable property, accompanied with promises of payment, and in injurious detentions, constitute a mass of debt which the justice and good faith of the French government cannot refuse to provide for, and which is too considerable to be unnoticed by that of the United States. The undersigned are instructed to solicit your attention to this subject, and they would persuade themselves that they do not solicit in vain. So many circumstances concur to give force to the application, that they leave it to your Government, in the confidence that no additional representations can be necessary.

They pass to complaints still more important for their amount, more interesting in their nature, and more serious in their consequences.

On the 14th Messidor, 4th year of the French republic, one and indivisible, (July 2d, 1796,) the Executive Directory decreed, "That all neutral or allied powers shall without delay be notified that the flag of the French republic will treat neutral vessels, either as to confiscation, as to searches or capture, in the same manner as they shall suffer the English to treat them." This decree, in any point of view in which it can be considered, could not fail to excite in the United States the most serious attention. It dispenses at once, as they conceive, with the most solemn obligations which compact can create, and consequently asserts a right on the part of France to recede at her discretion from any stipulations she may have entered into. It has been demonstrated that Governments may by contract change, as between themselves, the rules established by the law of nations, and that such contract becomes completely obligatory on the parties, though it can in no manner affect the rights of others; yet by this decree, allies with whom such stipulations exist, are to be treated without regard to such stipulations, in the same manner as they are treated by others, who are bound by a different rule. This as it respects the United States is the more unfriendly, because a readiness has been manifested on their part so to modify by consent their treaty with France, as to reinstate the rules established by the law of nations.

The general terms too, in which this decree is conceived, threatened but too certainly the mischiefs it has generated, and the abuses which have been practised under it. Neutrals are to be treated as they shall permit the English to treat them. No rule extracted from the practice of England is laid down, which might govern the cruisers of France, or instruct the vessels of neutrals. No principles are stated, manifesting the opinion entertained of the treatment received from England, which might enable a neutral to controvert that opinion, and to show that the English were not permitted to treat its flag as was supposed by the Government of France. To judge from the decree itself, from any information given concerning it, or from the practice under it, those who were to be benefited by its abuse were to decide in what manner it should be executed; and the cruiser who should fall in with a valuable vessel had only to consult his own rapacity, in order to determine whether an English privateer, meeting a vessel, under similar circumstances, would capture and bring her into port. Multiplied excesses, and accumulated vexations could not but have been apprehended from such a decree, and the fact has realized every fear that was entertained concerning it. It has been construed even in Europe to authorize the capture and condemnation of American vessels, for the single circumstance of their being destined for a British port. At no period of the war has Britain undertaken to exercise such a power. At no period of the war has she asserted such a right. It is a power which prostrates every principle of national sovereignty, and to which no nation can submit without relinquishing at the same time its best interests and sacrificing its dearests rights. This power has been exercised by France on the rich and unprotected commerce of an ally, on the presumption that that ally was sustaining the same injuries from Britain, at a time when it is believed that the depredations of that nation had ceased, and the principle of compensating for them had been recognized.

In the West Indies similar depredations have been experienced. On the 1st of August, 1796, the special agents of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands, decreed, that all vessels loaded with contraband, should be seized and confiscated for the benefit of the captors.

On the 7th Frimaire, 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible, (27th November, 1796) the commission, delegated by the French republic to the Leeward Islands, resolved, that the captains of French national vessels and privateers are authorized to stop and bring into the ports of the colony, American vessels bound to English ports, or coming from the said ports.

On the 19th Pluviose, 5th year of the French republic, one and indivisible, (February 1st, 1797) Victor Hugues and Lebas, the special agents of the Executive Directory to the Windward Islands, passed a decree, subjecting to capture and confiscation neutral vessels destined for the Windward and Leeward Islands of America, delivered up to the English, and occupied and defended by the emigrants. These ports are said to be, Martinico, St. Lucie, Tobago, Demarara, Berbice, Essequibo, Port-au-Prince, St. Mark's, L'Archaye, and Jeremie. The decree also subjects to capture all vessels which have cleared out for the West Indies generally.

The undersigned will not detain you, citizen minister, for the purpose of proving how directly and openly these decrees violate both the law of nations and the treaty between France and the United States.

They have been executed on the officers and crews of the captured vessels, in a manner by no means calculated to mitigate their rigor.

The decree of the 14th of Messidor was soon followed by another which has spared but little of the American commerce, except what has fortunately escaped the pursuit of the cruisers of France. On the 12th Ventose, 5th year, (2d March, 1797) the Executive Directory, considering the treaty of amity, commerce and navigation, concluded at London, the 19th of November, 1794, between the said United States and England, as containing concessions of privileges to Britain which, under the treaty of February, 1778, might be enjoyed by this republic also, proceeds to modify the treaty between France and the United States, by declaring enemies' goods, in American bottoms, liable to capture and confiscation; by enlarging the list of contraband, and by subjecting to punishment, as a pirate, any American citizen holding a commission given by the enemies of France, as well as every seaman of that nation, making a part of the crew of the enemies' ships. The decree next proceeds to exact from Americans, papers which had been made necessary to establish the neutrality of foreign vessels, generally, by the ordinance of the 26th of July, 1778, but which had never been considered as applying to the United States, which required papers their vessels could not be supposed to possess, and which the treaty between the two nations was supposed to have rendered unnecessary.

The basis taken by the Executive Directory, on which to rest their modification of the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, is, that by the treaty of the 19th of November, 1794, particular favors in respect of commerce and navigation have been granted to England.

It has been demonstrated, that no particular favors, in respect of commerce or navigation, have been granted to England. That treaty has been shown only to recognize, regulate, and moderate the exercise of rights before possessed, and before openly acknowledged to be possessed—rights which France and America had reciprocally ceded to each other, without requiring, as a condition of the cession, that either should compel England to form a similar stipulation.

But to admit for a moment that the treaty with England might be considered as stipulating favors not before possessed, yet the American Government did not so understand that treaty, and had manifested a disposition to modify, by common consent, its relations with this republic, in such manner as to reinstate a rule, which has been voluntarily changed. It cannot but be sincerely regretted, because it seemed to indicate an unfriendly temper, that France has deemed it more eligible to establish by force, in opposition to her treaty, a principle which she deemed convenient, than to fix that principle on the fair basis of mutual and amicable agreement.

But the clause, under which these modifications are justified, is in these words: "The Most Christian King and the United States engage mutually, not to grant any particular favor to other nations, in respect of commerce and navigation, which shall not immediately become common to the other party, who shall enjoy the same favor freely, if the concession was freely made, or on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional." If these stipulations unequivocally amounted to the grant of favors, still the grant is not gratuitous. The concessions on the part of the United States are made on condition of similar concessions on the part of Britain. If, therefore, France chooses to consider them as modifications of the treaty of 1778, she can only do it by granting the reciprocal condition: on this supposition, she has either of the rules at her election, but she cannot vary from the first without a compact on her part to grant the reciprocal stipulation. Such a compact is in the nature of a national treaty.

But the rules laid down in the decree of the 12th Ventose, 5th year (March 2, 1797) as founded on the 17th, 18th, and 21st articles of the treaty of the 19th November, 1794, are materially variant from those articles. To demonstrate this, it is only necessary to contrast the rules of the decree with the articles of the treaty on which those rules are said to be founded.

Articles of the treaty of the 19th of November, 1794, as quoted by the Directory.

ART. XVII. It is agreed, that in all cases where vessels shall be captured or detained on just suspicion of having on board enemies' property, or of carrying to the enemy any of the articles which are contraband of war, the said vessels shall be brought to the nearest or most convenient port, and if any property of an enemy should be found on board such vessel, that part only which belongs to the enemy shall be made prize, and the vessel shall be at liberty to proceed with the remainder without any impediment. And it is agreed, that all proper measures shall be taken to prevent delay in deciding the cases of ships or cargoes so brought for adjudication; and in the payment or recovery of any indemnification adjudged or agreed to be paid to the owners or masters of such ships.

Rules established by the arrêt of the Directory.

RULE I. According to the seventeenth article of the treaty of London, of the nineteenth of November, 1794, all merchandise of the enemy, or merchandise not sufficiently proved to be neutral, laden under the American flag, shall be confiscated, but the vessel on board of which it shall be found, shall be released and restored to the owner. It is enjoined on the commissaries of the Executive Directory, to accelerate, by all the means in their power, the decision of contests which shall arise either on the validity of the prize-cargo, or on the freight and demurrage.

According to the article, when on just suspicion of having on board enemy's property, or of carrying to the enemy contraband of war, a vessel shall be brought into port, that part only which belongs to the enemy shall be made prize, according to the article, then the fact whether the property does or does not belong to an enemy, is to be fairly tried. The party who would establish the fact, must prove it. The captor must show the justice of the suspicion on which the capture or detention was founded. The burthen of the proof rests on him. If in truth and in fact, the property does not belong to an enemy, or is not proved to belong to an enemy, it must be discharged. But the rule pursues a different course. The rule declares, that merchandise of the enemy, or not sufficiently proved to be neutral, ladened under the American flag, shall be confiscated. The burthen of the proof is shifted from the captor to the captured. The question to be tried is not solely whether the merchandise be in fact the property of an enemy, but also whether it be sufficiently proved to be neutral. The sufficiency of this proof is to be ascertained, not by general and satisfactory testimony, not by the great principles of truth, and the common understanding of mankind, but by the exhibition of certain papers demandable at the will of one of the parties, and not in the possession of the other. This may be a regulation which France chooses to establish; but certainly it is a regulation essentially variant from the article it professes to resemble.

ART. XVIII. In order to regulate what is in future to be esteemed contraband of war, it is agreed that under the said denomination shall be comprised all arms and implements serving for the purposes of war, by land or by sea—as cannon, muskets, mortars, petards, bombs, grenades, carcasses, saucisses, carriages for cannon, musket rests, bandoliers, gunpowder, match, saltpetre, ball, pikes, swords, headpieces, cuirasses, halberds, lances, javelins, horse furniture, holsters, belts, and generally all other implements of war; as also timber for ship-building, tar, or rosin, copper in sheets, sails, hemp and cordage, and generally whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels, unwrought iron, and fir plank only excepted.

RULE II. According to the 18th article of the treaty of London, of the 19th of November, 1794, to the articles declared contraband by the 24th article of the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, are added the following articles:

Timber for ship-building, pitch, tar, and rosin, copper in sheets, sails, hemp, and cordage, and every thing which serves directly or indirectly for the armament and equipment of vessels, unwrought iron and fir planks excepted. These several articles shall be confiscated whenever they shall be destined or attempted to be carried to the enemy.

The immense number of articles which may serve indirectly for the armament and equipment of vessels are made contraband by the rule of the Directory, though they are not so by the article it professes to cite.

ART. XXI. It is likewise agreed that the subjects and citizens of the two nations shall not do any acts of hostility or violence against each other, nor accept commissions or instructions so to act from any foreign Prince or State enemies to the party; nor shall the enemies of one of the parties be permitted to invite or endeavor to enlist in their military service any of the subjects or citizens of the other party; and the laws against all such offences and aggressions shall be punctually executed. And if any subject or citizen of the said parties, respectively, shall accept any foreign commission, or letters of marque, for arming any vessel to act as a privateer against the other party, it is hereby declared to be lawful for the said party to treat and punish the said subject or citizen having such commission, or letters of marque, as a pirate.

RULE III. According to the 21st article of the treaty of London, of the 19th of November, 1794, every individual known to be an American, who shall hold a commission given by the enemies of France, as well as every seaman of that nation, making a part of the crew of enemies' ships, shall, by that act, be declared a pirate, and treated as such, without being allowed, in any case, to allege that he was forced to do it by violence, menaces, or otherwise.

The Government of the United States has never formed a treaty comprehending an article in any degree similar to this rule. It has never assented to such stipulations as they relate to its own citizens, or required them as they relate to those of other Powers. The difference between the article and the rule requires no comment. Nor will the rule be commented on. The undersigned will only observe that the article is by no means uncommon, but is to be found in most treaties of amity and commerce. The 21st article of the treaty with France; the 19th of the treaty with the United Provinces; the 23d of the treaty with Sweden; and the 20th article of the treaty with Prussia, contain similar stipulations. It is not easily to conceive a reason why it should not also be inserted in a treaty with England, or why its insertion should give offence to France.

But the fourth rule of the decree is, in its operation, the most extensive and the most seriously destructive. That rule declares that, "conformably to the law of the 14th of February, 1793, the regulations of the 21st of October, 1744, and of the 26th of July, 1778, concerning the manner of proving the property of neutral ships and merchandise, shall be executed according to their form and tenor.

"Every American ship shall, therefore, be a good prize which shall not have on board a list of the crew in proper form, such as is prescribed by the model annexed to the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, the observance of which is required by the 25th and 27th articles of the same treaty."

This rule requires that American ships and merchandise, in order to prove the property to be American, shall exhibit certain papers, and especially a rôle d'équipage, which are required of neutrals generally by the particular marine ordinances of France, recited in the decree of the Directory. But France and America have entered into a solemn treaty, one object of which was to secure the vesels of either party, which might be at peace, from the cruisers of the other which might be engaged in war. To effect this object, the contracting parties have not referred each other to the particular statutes or ordinances of either Government, but have enumerated the papers which should be deemed sufficient. They have done more. They have prescribed the very form of the passport which should establish the neutrality of the vessel, and prevent her being diverted from her course. The 25th and 27th articles of the treaty between the two nations, which are quoted by the Directory, and are considered by the undersigned as conclusive on this subject, are in these words—

ART. XXV. "To the end that all manner of dissensions and quarrels may be avoided and prevented on the one side and on the other, it is agreed that, in case either of the parties hereto should be engaged in war, the ships and vessels belonging to the subjects or people of the other ally must be furnished with sea-letters or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk, of the ship, as also the name and place of habitation of the master or commander of the said ship, that it may appear thereby that the said ship really and truly belongs to the subjects of one of the parties, which passports shall be made out and granted according to the form annexed to this treaty; and they shall likewise be recalled every year, that is if the ship happens to return home in the space of a year. It is likewise agreed that such ships, being laden, are to be provided not only with passports, as above mentioned, but also with certificates containing the several particulars of the cargo, the place whence the ship sailed, and whither she is bound, that so it may be known whether any forbidden or contraband goods be on board the same; which certificates shall be made out by the officers of the place, whence the ship set sail, in the accustomed form; and if any one shall think it fit or advisable to express, in the said certificates, the person to whom the goods on board belong, he may freely do so."

ART. XXVII. "If the ships of the said subjects, people, or inhabitants, of either of the parties, shall be met with, either sailing along the coasts, or on the high seas, by any ship of war of the other, or by any privateers, the said ships of war or privateers, for the avoiding of any disorder, shall remain out of cannon shot, and may send their boats aboard the merchant ship, which they shall so meet with, and may enter her to the number of two or three men only, to whom the master or commander of such ship or vessel shall exhibit his passport, concerning the property of the ship, made out according to the form inserted in this present treaty; and the ship, when she shall have showed such passport, shall be free and at liberty to pursue her voyage, so as it shall not be lawful to molest or search her in any manner, or to give her chase, or force her to quit her intended course."

It will be admitted that the two nations possess the power of agreeing that any paper in any form shall be the sole document, demandable by either from the other, to prove the property of a vessel and cargo. It will also be admitted that an agreement so made becomes the law of the parties, which must retain its obligation.

Examine then the words of the compact, and determine by fair construction what will satisfy them.

The 25th article states substantially the contents of a paper, which is termed a sea-letter or passport, and which "it is agreed that in case either of the parties should be engaged in war, the ships and vessels belonging to the subjects or people of the other ally must be furnished with." To what purpose are they to be furnished with this sea-letter or passport? The article answers, "To the end that all manner of dissension and quarrels may be avoided and prevented on one side and the other; "That it may appear thereby that the ship really and truly belongs to the subjects of one of the parties."

But how will the passport "prevent and avoid all manner of dissensions and quarrels on one side or the other," if ordinances, both prior and subsequent to the treaty, are to be understood as controlling it, and as requiring other papers not contemplated in the public agreement of the two nations? How is it to appear from the passport, "that the ship really and truly belongs to the subjects of one of the parties," if it is denied that the passport is evidence of that fact, and contended that other papers, not alluded to in the treaty, shall be adduced to prove it?

But the 27th article is still more explicit. It declares that when a merchant ship of one of the parties shall be visited by the ships of war or privateers of the other, "the commander of such ship or vessel shall exhibit his passport, concerning the property of the ship, made out according to the form inserted in the present treaty, and the ship, when she shall have showed such passport, shall be free and at liberty to pursue her voyage, so as it shall not be lawful to molest or search her in any manner, or to give her chase, or force her to quit her intended course." What is it that shall prove the property of the vessel? The treaty answers, the passport. But the decree of the Directory requires in addition certain other papers, perfectly distinct from the passport. The treaty declares that "the ship, when she shall have showed" (not the rôle d'équipage, or any other paper, required by the particular ordinances of either nation, but) "such passports, shall be free and at liberty to pursue her voyage, so as it shall not be lawful to molest or search her in any manner, or to give her chase, or force her to quit her intended course." Yet the vessels of America, after exhibiting "such passport," are not "free and at liberty to pursue their voyage;" they are "molested;" they are "chased;" they are "forced to quit their intended course;" they are captured and confiscated as hostile property.

It is alleged that the form of the passport, which is annexed to the treaty, manifests that certain acts were to be performed by the person to whom the passport is delivered, and that such person ought to prove the performance of those acts.

But the treaty, far from requiring such proof, absolutely dispenses with it. The treaty declares that the passport shall itself evidence the property of the vessel, and secure it from molestation of any sort. By consent of the parties then, the passport is evidence of all that either party can require from the other. Neither the right to give such consent, nor the obligation of a compact formed upon it, can, as is conceived, ever be denied, nor can the form of the passport, whatever it may be, change the compact.

But let the words of the model be examined. They are: "A tous ceux qui ces présentes verront: soit notoire que faculté et permission a été accordée à ——— maitre ou commandant du navire appellé ——— de la ville de ——— de la capacité de ——— tonneaux ou environ, se trouvant présentement dans le port de ——— qu'après que son navire a été visité, et avant son depart il prêtera serment entre les mains des officiers de la marine, que le dit navire appartient à un ou plusieurs sujets de ——— dont l'acte sera mis à la fin des présentes; de même qu'il gardera les ordonnances et réglemens maritimes, et remettra une liste signée et confirmée par témoins, contenant les noms et surnoms, les lieux de naissance, et la demeure des personnes composant l'équipage de son navire, et de tous ceux qui embarqueront, lesquels il ne recevra pas à bord sans connoissance et permission des officiers de marine; et dans chaque port ou hâvre, il montrera la présente permission aux officiers et juges de marine."

It is material to observe that the model requires the oath concerning the property of the vessel to be annexed to the passport, but does not require any other certificate, or the annexation of any paper whatever. Why this difference? It is a solemn proof of that for which the article stipulates, and therefore the model expresses that the evidence of this fact shall be annexed, but it does not require the production of the evidence of any other fact.

It seems, then, to be demonstrated that the sea-letter or passport, a model of which is annexed to the treaty, is, by solemn agreement, to be received by each party as conclusive testimony, that the vessel producing such passport is the property of a citizen of the other, and is consequently to continue her voyage without molestation or hindrance.

But let it be supposed that the treaty on this subject was less conclusive, and that its stipulations had been ambiguously expressed; yet it is certain that it has been uniformly understood by both parties, as the undersigned have expounded it, and that neither France nor the United States, previous to the decree complained of, considered the vessels of either nation, producing the passport agreed on, as liable to capture for want of a rôle d'équipage.

For more than four years after her treaty with the United States France was engaged in a war with Britain, and in the course of that time it was never suggested that a rôle d'équipage was necessary for the protection of an American vessel. It does not weaken the argument that the United States were also parties to the war. The principle assumed is that, without the production of the papers required by the decree, the vessel does not appear to be, and cannot be considered as, American property. If this principle be correct, it would not cease to apply, because the United States were engaged in the war. Was America even engaged in the war on the part of France, a British vessel carrying American colors would not be secured by the flag she bore. It would be necessary to prove by her papers, or other admissible testimony, that the vessel was American property. If this fact cannot appear without a rôle d'équipage while the United States are at peace, neither could it appear without the same evidence if the United States were parties to the war.

About four years of the present war had also elapsed before this construction of the treaty, at the same time so wonderful and so ruinous, had disclosed itself. In the course of that time the ports of France were filled with the vessels of the United States. Very many of them sailed under contracts made for the Government itself by its minister in Philadelphia. No one of them possessed a rôle d'équipage; no one of them was considered on that account as being liable to condemnation. Indeed, in some instances, vessels have been captured and discharged although this paper was not among those belonging to the ship.

Such a long course of practice appears to have evidenced, unequivocally, the sense of France on this subject.

It is too apparent to be questioned for a moment, that, on the part of the United States, no suspicion had ever been entertained that such a paper could have been required. A rôle d'équipage could have been obtained with as much facility as that passport for which the treaty stipulates. Could it have been imagined that American vessels incurred the possible hazard of being retarded only one day in a voyage for want of such paper, it would, in every instance, have been supplied. No vessel would have sailed without it.

Your own mind, citizen minister, will suggest to you, with irresistible force, the extreme hardship of thus putting a new construction on a long existing contract, or of giving a new and unexpected extension to ancient municipal regulations, and of condemning thereby vessels taken on the high seas for want of a paper not known to be required, when they sailed out of port. If a rôle d'équipage was really considered by France as necessary evidence of any fact, the establishment of which was deemed essential, common usage, and those plain principles of justice which all nations should respect, indispensably require that the regulations should first be made known to a neutral and friendly nation by other means than by the capture and confiscation of its property. If this measure had been announced to the Government of the United States before it had been put in practice, and American vessels had sailed without a rôle d'équipage, they would have taken upon themselves the hazard of such a procedure. But in a moment when the ocean is covered with peaceful merchantmen, pursuing a just and lawful commerce, to bring into sudden operation a measure which had never before been applied to them, which had for so many years slept unheard of, and, by the force of this regulation, to confiscate unguarded property which had been trusted to the seas, under the faith of solemn and existing treaties, and without a conjecture that this, more than any other formula, would have been required, is to impose on unoffending individuals a ruin from which no wise precautions, no human foresight, could possibly have protected them.

On this subject, then, the undersigned appeal with confidence to the justice and equity of the French Government.

But could it be conceded for a moment that the Executive Directory might rightfully modify the treaty of France with the United States by that of the United States with Britain, and might rightfully require a rôle d'équipage in order to establish the neutrality of a vessel, for want of which the vessel might be confiscated, yet, the cargo being proved to be neutral, ought to be safe.

According to the law of nations the goods of an enemy found on board the ship of a friend are liable to capture, and the goods of a friend found on board the ship of an enemy are safe. The United States and France have consented to change this rule as between themselves. They have agreed that the goods of an enemy found on board the vessels of either party shall be safe, and that the goods of either found on board the vessel of an enemy shall be liable to capture. The one part of this rule is in consequence of and dependent on the other. The one part cannot on any principle of justice be abandoned while the other is maintained.

In their treaty with England the United States retain unchanged the principle of the law of nations. If France modifies her treaty in this respect by that of England, she ought to take the principle entire. If, in conformity to the treaty between the United States and England, France claims the right of taking enemy's property found on board an American ship, then, in conformity with that treaty, also, France ought to spare American property found on board an enemy's ship. If, therefore, this extraordinary position could be maintained, that an American ship without a rôle d'équipage becomes the ship of an enemy, still the cargo, being proved to be the property of a friend, ought, on the principle of modifying the treaty between the two nations with that of England, to have been restored to the owners.

The result of these regulations has been the most extensive and universal devastation of the American commerce. Not only vessels bound to and from the enemies of France, but vessels bound to and from her allies, and to and from her own ports, have been seized and confiscated.

The inevitable consequence has been, that direct commerce between the two nations is almost annihilated, and that the property of American citizens has been taken to a much larger amount than would have been possible in a state of actual war.

Yet the Government of the United States wishing, if it be possible, to avoid even defensive measures, has sought assiduously and unremittingly, though hitherto without success, for such peaceful and amicable explanations as might do away existing animosities, and restore between the two republics that harmony which it so truly desires.

America has accustomed herself to perceive in France only the ally and the friend. Consulting the feelings of her own bosom, she has believed that between republics an elevated and refined friendship could exist, and that free nations were capable of maintaining for each other a real and permanent affection. If this pleasing theory, erected with so much care, and viewed with so much delight, has been impaired by experience, yet the hope continues to be cherished that this circumstance does not necessarily involve the opposite extreme. It is believed that there exists no sufficient cause for solid and permanent enmity between France and the United States, but that, on the contrary, the interests of both would be promoted by that friendly intercourse which a reciprocal observance of the great and immutable principles of justice would certainly establish and can alone preserve. Under this impression America resists the opinion that the present state of things has grown out of a digested system to which France designs to adhere. She wishes, and she endeavors to persuade herself, that temporary causes, which too often produce effects a sound and just policy must reprobate, connected with a misconstruction of the conduct of her Government, as well as of the motives on which it has acted, may have occasioned those very serious aggressions of which she complains. She recedes, therefore, even under the pressure of these aggressions, slowly and with difficulty from the attachments she has formed. So intertwined with every ligament of her heart have been the cords of affection which bound her to France, that only repeated and continued acts of hostility can tear them asunder.

The Government of the United States, therefore, still searches the means of terminating peacefully, and in a manner which ought to be mutually satisfactory, the calamities of the moment, and of averting the still greater calamities which may be reserved for the future. Not even the discouraging and unusual events which had preceded the present effort to negotiate, could deter that Government from repeating its endeavors for the preservation of amity and peace. Three citizens of the United States have been deputed as envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French republic. Their instructions authorize and direct them to review the existing treaties between the two nations, and to remove, by all proper means, the inequalities which have grown out of the stipulations of those treaties, in consequence of the refusal of England to adopt the principles they contain. They are also directed to give fair and complete explanations of the conduct of the Government they represent; to state fully and truly the heavy injuries which their fellow-citizens have sustained; and to ask from the equity of a great and magnanimous republic that compensation for those injuries which, we flatter ourselves, their justice will not refuse, and their liberal policy will not hesitate to give.

Bringing with them the temper of their Government and country, searching only for the means of effecting the objects of their mission, they have permitted no personal considerations to influence their conduct, but have waited, under circumstances beyond measure embarrassing and unpleasant, with that respect which the American Government has so uniformly paid to that of France, for permission to lay before you, citizen minister, these important communications with which they have been charged.

Perceiving no probability of being allowed to enter, in the usual forms, on those discussions which might tend to restore harmony between the two republics, they have deemed it most advisable, even under the circumstances of informality which attend the measure, to address to your Government, through you, this candid review of the conduct, and this true representation of the sentiments and wishes, of the Government of the United States. They pray that it may be received in the temper with which it is written, and considered as an additional effort, growing out of a disposition common to the Government and people of America, to cultivate and restore, if it be possible, harmony between the two republics. If, citizen minister, there remains a hope that these desirable objects can be effected by any means which the United States have authorized, the undersigned will still solicit, and will still respectfully attend the development of those means.

If, on the contrary, no such hope remains, they have only to pray that their return to their own country may be facilitated; and they will leave France with the most deep-felt regret that neither the real and sincere friendship, which the Government of the United States has so uniformly and unequivocally displayed for this great republic, nor its continued efforts to demonstrate the purity of its conduct and intentions, can protect its citizens, or preserve them from the calamities which they have sought, by a just and upright conduct, to avert.

The undersigned pray you, citizen minister, to accept the assurances of their perfect respect and consideration.

Law relative to vessels laden with English merchandise, of the 29*th Nivose,* 6*th year,* (18*th Jan.* 1796.)

The council of ancients, adopting the reasons for the declaration of urgency, which precedes the resolution hereinafter contained, approves the act of urgency.

Here follows the tenor of the declaration of urgency, and of the resolution of the 22d Nivose, (11th January, 1798.)

The council of five hundred, after having heard the report of a special committee upon the message of the Executive Directory, of the 15th Nivose, (4th January) relative to English merchandise;

Considering that the interest of the republic demands the most prompt measures against all vessels which may be loaded therewith;

Declares that there is urgency.

The council, after having declared the urgency, resolves as follows:

ART. I. The character of vessels, relative to their quality of neuter or enemy, shall be determined by their cargo; in consequence, every vessel found at sea, loaded in whole or in part with merchandise the production of England or of her possessions, shall be declared good prize, whoever the owner of these goods or merchandise may be.

ART. II. Every foreign vessel which, in the course of her voyage, shall have entered into an English port, shall not be admitted into a port of the French republic, except in case of necessity; in which case she shall be bound to depart from the said port as soon as the causes of her entry shall have ceased.

ART. III. The present resolution shall be printed.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, MAY 29, 1798.

UNITED STATES, May 29th, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

An article explanatory of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, has been signed by the plenipotentiaries of the two Powers, which I now submit to the Senate for their consideration.

JOHN ADAMS.

EXPLANATORY ARTICLE.

Whereas, by the twenty-eighth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, signed at London on the 19th November, 1794, it was agreed, that the contracting parties would, from time to time, readily treat of and concerning such further articles as might be proposed, that they would sincerely endeavor so to form such articles as that they might conduce to mutual convenience, and tend to promote mutual satisfaction and friendship, and that such articles, after having been duly ratified, should be added to, and make a part of that treaty: and whereas difficulties have arisen with respect to the execution of so much of the fifth article of the said treaty as requires that the commissioners appointed under the same should, in their description, particularize the latitude and longitude of the source of the river which may be found to be the one truly intended in the treaty of peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, under the name of the River St. Croix, by reason whereof it is expedient that the said commissioners should be released from the obligation of conforming to the provisions of the said article in this respect, the undersigned being respectively named by His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, their plenipotentiaries, for the purpose of treating of, and concluding such articles as may be proper to be added to the said treaty, in conformity to the above mentioned stipulation, and having communicated to each other their respective full powers, have agreed and concluded, and do hereby declare, in the name of His Britannic Majesty, and of the United States of America, that the commissioners appointed under the fifth article of the said treaty shall not be obliged to particularize, in their description, the latitude and longitude of the source of the river which may be found to be the one truly intended in the aforesaid treaty of peace, under the name of the River St. Croix, but they shall be at liberty to describe the said river in such other manner as they may judge expedient, which description shall be considered as a complete execution of the duty required of the said commissioners, in this respect, by the article aforesaid. And, to the end that no uncertainty may hereafter exist on this subject, it is further agreed that, as soon as may be after the decision of the said commissioners, measures shall be concerted between the Government of the United States, and His Britannic Majesty's Governors or Lieutenant Governors in America, in order to erect and keep in repair, a suitable monument, at the place ascertained and described to be the source of the said River St. Croix, which measures shall, immediately thereupon, and as often afterwards as may be requisite, be duly executed on both sides, with punctuality and good faith.

This explanatory article, when the same shall have been ratified by His Majesty, and by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of their Senate, and the respective ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be added to, and make a part of, the treaty of amity, commerce and navigation, between His Majesty and the United States, signed at London on the 19th day of November, 1794, and shall be permanently binding upon His Majesty and the United States.

In witness whereof, we the said undersigned plenipotentiaries of His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America have signed this present article, and have caused to be affixed thereto the seal of our arms. Done at London this fifteenth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight.

*Mr. Pickering to Mr. King.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 2d, 1798.

SIR:

The commissioners for ascertaining the St. Croix boundary, under the fifth article of our commercial treaty with Great Britain, met a second time, in August last, at Boston, when the surveys of the two rivers in question not being completed, they again adjourned, to meet at Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, in June next.

Before this adjournment, they recommended an application, by the agents, to the respective Governments, to obtain an alteration in the fifth article to exempt them from the necessity of ascertaining the longitude and latitude of the source of the river which they shall find to be the St. Croix, intended in the treaty of peace. The application from James Sullivan, Esq. the agent of the United States, is in the following words:

"By the recommendation of the commissioners, the agents apply to their respective governments to procure, in the course of the ensuing winter, an additional article to the treaty of amity, commerce, &c. providing that the commissioners shall not be obliged to ascertain the longitude and latitude of the source of the river which may be found to be the one truly intended in the treaty of peace, under the name of the St. Croix, but that they may describe the local situation of that source, and designate it in some other way and manner, as shall appear to them most expedient."

His remarks, and the observations of the commissioners on this subject, you will find in the enclosed copy of his letters of the 20th August last. Mr. Webber and Mr. Wright, therein mentioned to have been appointed "to ascertain the latitude and longitude of the mouths of the rivers claimed by the respective Governments," have accomplished that service, as Mr. Sullivan advised me on the sixth of last month.

On consideration of the proposition of the commissioners, the President has concluded to authorize you to negotiate the additional article suggested, and your powers, for that purpose, are herewith transmitted. It will be desirable to have it done immediately, and ratified by His Britannic Majesty, that, on its arrival here, it may be laid before the Senate during the present session, and receive its final sanction from the President.

This adoption of the ideas of the commissioners is, for the greater caution to prevent, hereafter, the possibility of a doubt of the validity of the "declaration" of the commissioners, if they should omit to ascertain the latitude and longitude of the source of the St. Croix, by astronomical observations; for the fifth article does not explicitly require this mode of proceeding. The words are these: "The said commissioners shall, by a declaration under their hands and seals, decide what river is the River St. Croix, intended by the treaty. The said declaration shall contain a description of the said river, and shall particularize the latitude and longitude of its mouth and its source." Now, as the latitude and longitude of the mouth of the St. Croix will be fixed by astronomical observations, and as the course of it, thence to its source, will be ascertained by actual survey, the position of that source, as to its latitude and longitude, would seem to be ascertained with adequate precision, and rendered capable of being particularized by the commissioners. If, besides, they give, agreeably to the article, "a description of the river" to its source, this source can, at any future time, be certainly found, as the point from which the line of boundary is to be drawn, "due north to the Highlands," according to the treaty of peace: and this would accomplish the object of the treaty. Nevertheless, if the British Government deem the proposed additional article to be necessary or expedient, (and it may be so to remove all scruples from the minds of the commissioners) you will negotiate the same accordingly.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Extract of a letter from Mr. King to the Secretary of State.

FEBRUARY 7, 1798.

"Concerning the St. Croix boundary, I send you copies of the papers that have passed between Lord Grenville and me. His lordship is in the country, and I shall not again hear from him before the sailing of the packet."

Mr. King to Lord Grenville.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, February 2, 1798.

MY LORD:

I have the honor to send enclosed to your lordship a copy of my full powers on the part of the United States to agree to, and conclude, an additional article to our treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, which shall leave the commissioners acting under the fifth article thereof, at liberty to ascertain and describe the true river St. Croix, without particularizing the latitude and longitude of the source of that river. I also take the liberty of sending enclosed a copy of a letter written by order of the commissioners to Colonel Pickering upon this subject.

It is desirable, if an additional article shall be concluded, that it should be done in season to be laid before the Senate of the United States in their present session. I shall be ready to confer with your Lordship upon this subject at any time that you will have the goodness to name.

With perfect consideration and respect, I have the honor to be,

My lord, your lordship's obedient and very humble servant,

RUFUS KING.

Right Hon. Lord GRENVILLE, &c.

Mr. Grenville to Mr. King.

DOWNING STREET, February 5, 1798.

SIR:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2d instant, on the subject of the article which the commissioners of the two countries, appointed under the fifth article of the late treaty, have recommended to be added to that treaty. His Majesty's ministers having already received a communication to the same effect through Lieutenant Governor Carleton, I had been honored with the King's commands for writing to His Majesty's minister in the United States on the subject; and I have the honor to enclose you a copy of the despatch which I wrote to him on the 9th of last month.

It seems to me that, both for the reason there stated of the greater facility of local information to be procured in America, and also in order to avoid the embarrassment which might result from any difference of detail in the agreement which might be concluded on this subject, here and in America, if the negotiation were to be carried on at the same time in both countries, it will be better to wait for the answer from Mr. Liston before we proceed to any conclusion. But if you see any reason for wishing a different course to be pursued, I shall very willingly accede to it, and in that case should request to know your ideas on the particulars mentioned in my despatch to that gentleman, the copy of which is herewith enclosed.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

GRENVILLE.

RUFUS KING, Esq. &c.

Lord Grenville to Mr. Liston.

DOWNING STREET, January 9th, 1798.

SIR:

I send you enclosed copies of a despatch to the Duke of Portland from Lieutenant Governor Carleton, and of two letters from Mr. Chipman therein referred to.

With regard to the article which the last mentioned gentleman and the agent of the United States recommend to be added to the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, as explanatory of the fifth article, it does not appear advisable to conclude it exactly on the principles which the agents have suggested.

Those gentlemen, and the commissioners themselves, do not seem to have fully adverted to the extreme importance of ascertaining, with the utmost accuracy, the precise point which is to be called the source of that river, which shall be determined to be the river St. Croix intended by the treaty of peace; with a view to obviate the difficulties and disputes which might hereafter arise from the common case of many forks and branches, nearly of equal magnitude, which are usually found near the source or head of considerable rivers: and this is more particularly deserving attention, because, by the second article of the treaty of 1783, the northeastern boundary of the United States is described as commencing from the northwestern angle of Nova Scotia, viz. that "angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the source of St. Croix river to the Highlands," &c. Any doubt, or uncertainty, as to the precise spot of that particular spring or river-head, which is to be considered as the real source of the river, would affect this important boundary not less essentially than the eastern one, which alone appears to have been the contemplation of the agents, at the period of their making the recommendation in question.

Those gentlemen, and the commissioners, being on the spot, are unquestionably best able to decide on the degree of accuracy which it is practicable to attain, in a matter of this nature; but its great importance cannot be too strongly stated. The difficulties alleged by them, as to the ascertainment of the latitude and longitude of the source by astronomical observation, are of considerable weight, particularly as any inaccuracy in the astronomical observations (such as are, perhaps, to be expected when made in a country so difficult of access, and where there are no ascertained points to refer to) would create, instead of removing, uncertainty and disputes.

It seems, therefore, right that the commissioners should be released from the obligation imposed upon them by the terms of the fifth article of the treaty, if the possibility of future doubt and dispute can be as effectually guarded against by any other mode of proceeding as by that which is prescribed in the article.

The course of proceeding which appears the least liable to objection, and the most conformable to the spirit of the treaty, would be that the latitude of the mouth of the rivers, which form the subject of the present controversy, should be ascertained with the utmost practicable accuracy, and by actual observation; that the surveys of the rivers should be prosecuted, by the persons employed in them, until they shall have ascertained the respective sources of the various springs and small branches in which the principal branch of each river terminates; and that these surveys shall be laid down on maps to be delivered to the commissioners; that the map of the river determined to be the real St. Croix should be annexed to the declaration of the commissioners, and that such declaration shall specify the longitude and latitude of the mouth, and shall describe which of the spring-heads, marked on the map, is to be considered as the source of the true river St. Croix, and that such declaration shall be considered as conclusive, and shall release the commissioners from the necessity of particularizing the longitude and latitude of the source of the river. In order, however, to avoid any dispute hereafter, the two Governments should further agree to proceed, without delay, to erect, at their joint expense, and at the place designated as the source of the true river St. Croix, a durable monument; (which, from the facility of finding the rough materials for such a building in those regions, it is presumed could be easily executed) and, in order to prevent its being defaced or destroyed, proper surveyors should be appointed, by the two Governments, to visit it, together, once in the course of every three years, and should direct the necessary repairs to be made at the joint expense of the two Governments.

It is His Majesty's pleasure, that you should submit these suggestions to the American ministers, and to Lieutenant Governor Carleton, (to whom a copy of this despatch will be forwarded by the first opportunity) and if no objections to them are offered, you will consider yourself authorized to conclude, in virtue of your general full powers, an additional article on these principles, which shall embrace the two objects of exonerating the commissioners from the necessity of a strict compliance with the letter of the article, and of providing a permanent and definite boundary between his Majesty's possessions and those of the United States. The mode of expressing this article, and the regulation of any details not inconsistent with the general objects herein before stated to you, are left to yourself, and to the American ministers; but it will certainly be desirable that nothing shall finally be concluded until after you shall have consulted Lieutenant Governor Carleton, and the commissioners and agents appointed under the fifth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation; who, being most conversant with the subject, are the best qualified to point out the most certain modes of precluding any further ambiguity.

I am, &c.

GRENVILLE.

ROBERT LISTON, Esq.

Mr. King to Lord Grenville.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, February 5, 1798.

MY LORD:

I have had the honor to receive your lordship's letter of this date, concerning the St. Croix boundary; and, for the reasons that have occurred to your lordship, it also appears to me that it would be more advantageous that the additional article should be formed and concluded in America than here. The only motive of any importance in favor of the negotiation of the article here is the saving of time.

By the enclosed copy of a letter that I have received from Colonel Pickering* your lordship will observe that the latitude and longitude of the mouths of the two rivers have already been ascertained, and there is reason to expect that the surveys will also be completed before the meeting of the commissioners in June, when they might be able to finish their business if they shall have been freed from the necessity of ascertaining, experimentally, the latitude and longitude of the source of the true St. Croix.

If the article, for this purpose, is concluded and ratified here, and sent to Philadelphia, it may be ratified and exchanged there before June; the other course will require more time, and will not, I apprehend, allow the commissioners to finish the business at their next meeting.

With perfect consideration, I have the honor to be, your lordship's obedient and very humble servant,

RUFUS KING.

Rt. Hon. LORD GRENVILLE.

Mr. King to Mr. Pickering.

LONDON, March 15, 1798.

DEAR SIR:

As the wind is unfavorable for the sailing of the American ships from Spithead, I take the chance of overtaking them, by sending under cover to our consular agent at Portsmouth this letter, with the original explanatory article that I have concluded with Lord Grenville. We executed four copies; two of them with their original ratifications will be sent by Lord Grenville to Mr. Liston, with an instruction to exchange them with you, when the President shall have ratified the same on our part. I will send you a copy of Lord Grenville's powers by the next opportunity, there not being time to copy them in season for this.

With perfect respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your obedient and faithful servant,

RUFUS KING.

SECRETARY OF STATE, &c.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 142. [2d SESSION.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JUNE 5, 1798.

UNITED STATES, June 5th, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate and
Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I now transmit to both Houses the communications from our envoys at Paris, received since the last, which have been presented by me to Congress.

JOHN ADAMS.

* See page 183.

DEAR SIR:

Agreeably to what we represented to you in our No. 6, we prepared a letter to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, on the subject of the late law, authorizing the capture of neutral vessels, on board of which any productions of Great Britain or its possessions should be laden, showing how incompatible such law was with the rights of neutral nations and the treaty between France and America, its direct tendency to destroy the remaining commerce of our country, and the particular hardships to which it would subject the agricultural as well as commercial interests of our countrymen, from the peculiar situation of the United States. We added, that, under existing circumstances, we could no longer resist the conviction that the demands of France rendered it entirely impracticable to effect the objects of our mission; and that, not being permanent ministers, but envoys extraordinary, with full power for particular purposes, we deemed it improper to remain longer in France, after the impossibility of effecting those purposes had been demonstrated. Before, however, we took this measure, and explicitly demanded our passports, we deemed it expedient to desire Major Rutledge to call on Mr. Talleyrand, on the 19th ultimo, to know if he had any communication to make to us in consequence of our letter dated the 17th, and delivered the 31st of January. To this Mr. Talleyrand replied that he had no answer to make, as the Directory had not taken any order on the subject, and when they did, he would inform us of it. Still being anxious to hear explicitly from Mr. Talleyrand himself, before we sent our final letter, whether there were no means within our powers of accommodating our differences with France on just and reasonable grounds, we wrote to him on the 27th of February, soliciting a personal interview on the subject of our mission: he appointed the 2d of March following. You will find in the exhibit A, herewith enclosed, what passed on that occasion. On the 4th instant, we requested another interview. We have detailed, in the latter part of the same exhibit, for your information, the substance of that conversation. From these accounts, you may observe that the views of France, with regard to us, are not essentially changed since our communications with its unofficial agents in October last.

We have the honor to be, with the greatest respect, your most obedient humble servants,

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY,
J. MARSHALL,
E. GERRY.

Col. PICKERING, Secretary of the United States.

MARCH 2.

At three o'clock we waited on Mr. Talleyrand, and were almost immediately introduced to him. General Pinckney commenced the conversation, by saying that our Government and ourselves were extremely anxious to remove the subsisting difference between the two republics; that we had received many propositions through Mr. Y. to which we had found it impracticable to accede; and that we had now waited on him for the purpose of inquiring whether other means might not be devised which would effect so desirable an object. The minister replied, that, without doubt, the Directory wished very sincerely, on our arrival, to see a solid friendship established between France and the United States, and had manifested this disposition by the readiness with which orders for our passports were given; that the Directory had been extremely wounded by the last speech of General Washington, made to Congress when about to quit the office of President of the United States, and by the first and last speech of Mr. Adams; that explanations of these speeches were expected and required of us. General Pinckney expressed his surprise that the speech of General Washington was complained of, and said this was a new complaint. Mr. Talleyrand merely observed that the Directory was wounded at it, and proceeded. He said that the original favorable disposition of the Directory had been a good deal altered by the coldness and distance which we had observed; that, instead of seeing him often, and endeavoring to remove the obstacles to a mutual approach, we had not once waited on him. General Pinckney observed that, when we delivered him our letters of credence, he informed us that the Directory, in a few days, would decide concerning us; and that when the decision was made he would communicate it to us; that this had, for some time, suspended any procedure on our part. He answered that this related only to our public character, and not to private visits. General Pinckney said that, on an application made by his secretary for a passport for an American under his care, he was told that he must apply to the office of police, for that America had no minister in France since the recall of Mr. Monroe. The minister said that was very true, and then proceeded to say that the Directory felt itself wounded by the different speeches of Mr. Washington and Mr. Adams, which he had stated, and would require some proof, on the part of the United States, of a friendly disposition, previous to a treaty with us. He then said that we ought to search for and propose some means which might furnish this proof; that if we were disposed to furnish it there could be no difficulty in finding it; and he alluded very intelligibly to a loan. He said he had had several conferences with Mr. Gerry on this subject, who had always answered that we had no power. Mr. Gerry said that he had stated other objections; that he had particularly urged that it would involve us in a war with Great Britain. He made no reply: and General Pinckney observed that a loan had repeatedly been suggested to us, but that we had uniformly answered that it exceeded our powers. Mr. Talleyrand replied that persons at such a distance as we were from our Government, and possessed as we were of the public confidence, must often use their discretion, and exceed their powers for the public good; that there was a material difference between acting when instructions were silent, and doing what was particularly forbidden; that if, indeed, a loan was positively forbidden, we might consider ourselves as incapable of making one: but if, as he supposed was the case, (he looked the question) our instructions were only silent, that it must be referred to us to act in a case not provided for, according to the best of our judgment for the public good; that, in almost all the treaties made during the Revolution, the negotiators had exceeded their powers, although the Government appointing them was at no considerable distance. He particularized the treaty with Prussia and several others. General Pinckney told him that our powers did not extend to a loan, and perhaps might forbid it. The minister still urged the difference between an express prohibition and mere silence. He then proceeded to state that the principal objection on the part of our Government to a loan must be, that it would draw us out of the neutral situation in which we wished to continue; that there were various means of evading this: first, the secrecy of France, which might be relied on; and secondly, means of disguising the loan might be devised, which would effectually prevent its being considered as an aid during the present war; that if we were truly and sincerely desirous of effecting the thing, we should experience no difficulty in finding the means. He again stated a proposition of this sort, on our part, as being absolutely necessary to prove that the Government was not about entering into a treaty with persons of a temper hostile to it. Mr. Gerry not well hearing Mr. Talleyrand, who spoke low, asked him to explain himself with respect to the proposition which he had alluded to, supposing it to be a new one: and he answered that one of them was secrecy; but that there were, besides, various ways which might easily be suggested to cover the loan, as an immediate one, by limiting the time of advancing it to distant instalments. Mr. Gerry observed that Dutrimond had suggested that a loan was proposed to be made, payable after the war, and in supplies to St. Domingo. Mr. Talleyrand signified that that might be one of the means used, and said that, if we were only sincere in our wish, it would be easy to bring about the end. General Marshall told Mr. Talleyrand that if the ministers of the United States had manifested any unwillingness to take all proper measures to reconcile the two republics, or any indifference on the subject, they had very badly represented the feelings and wishes of their Government; that the Government of the United States was most sincerely desirous of preserving the friendship of France, and had, in his opinion, unequivocally manifested that desire, by having deputed us under the extraordinary circumstances attending our mission, and by having so long patiently borne the immense loss of property which had been sustained; that we had endeavored, according to the best of our judgment, to represent truly this disposition of our Government: but that we understood that France would consider nothing as an evidence of friendship but an act which would transcend and violate our powers, and at the same time operate the most serious injury to our country; that neutrality, in the present war, was of the last importance to the United States, and they had resolved faithfully to maintain it; that they had committed no act voluntarily which was a breach of it, and could do nothing in secret, which, if known, would justly arrange them among the belligerent Powers; that, in the present state of things, if America was actually leagued with France in the war, she would only be required to furnish money; that we had neither ships of war nor men to be employed in it, and could, consequently, as a belligerent Power, only be asked for money; that, therefore, to furnish money was, in fact, to make war, which we could by no means consent to do, and which would absolutely transcend our powers, being an act altogether without the view and contemplation of our Government when our mission was decided on; that, with respect to supplies to St. Domingo, no doubt could be entertained that our merchants would furnish them very abundantly, if France would permit the commerce; and a loan, really payable after the close of the war, might then be negotiated. Mr. Talleyrand again marked the distinction between silence of instructions and an express prohibition, and again insisted on the necessity of our proving, by some means which we must offer, our friendship for the republic. He said he must exact from us, on the part of his Government, some proposition of this sort; that, to prove our friendship, there must be some immediate aid, or something which might avail them; that the principles of reciprocity would require it. General Pinckney and General Marshall understood him, by this expression, to allude to the loan formerly made by France to the United States. Mr. Gerry, at the time, thought he alluded to the treaty to be made, and said all treaties should be founded in reciprocity, and then asked him whether a loan was the ultimatum of this Government. Mr. Talleyrand did not give a direct answer to the question: he said, as he was understood, that the Government insisted on some act which would demonstrate our friendly disposition towards, and our good wishes for, the republic; this once done, he said the adjustment of complaints would be easy: that would be matter of inquiry; and if France had done us wrong, it would be repaired: but that if this was refused, it would increase the distance and coldness between the two republics. The conversation continued in this style until four o'clock, when we took our leave, and agreed to meet in the evening.

In the course of it, and in reply to some observations of Mr. Talleyrand respecting the proofs of friendship required by France, General Pinckney observed that our being here was a mark of the friendly disposition of our Government, and that while we were here, the Government had passed a decree for seizing neutral vessels having on board any article coming out of England; which, in its operation, would subject to capture all our property on the ocean. Mr. Talleyrand replied that this was not particular to us, but was common to all the neutral Powers. At another time, in answer to his demand of some mark of our friendship, General Marshall observed that we considered the mutual interests of the two nations as requiring peace and friendship, and we relied on finding sufficient motives in the interest of France to preserve that friendship, without forcing us to an act which transcended our powers, and would be so injurious to our country. As we were taking our leave, Mr. Talleyrand again noticed our not visiting him, and said that he conceived our not having had an audience from the Directory ought not to have prevented it. General Marshall told him that our seeing the Directory or not, was an object of no sort of concern to us; that we were perfectly indifferent with regard to it; but that we conceived that until our public character was in some degree recognized, and we were treated as the ministers and representatives of our Government, we could not take upon ourselves to act as ministers, because, by doing so, we might subject ourselves to some injurious circumstance to which we could not submit. He said that was very true, but that we might see him as private individuals, and discuss the objects of difference between us.

We requested of Mr. Talleyrand another interview, at such hour as might be convenient to him, on the 6th instant. He answered that he would receive us at half past eleven: at which hour we attended him.

Immediately after our arrival at his office we were introduced to the minister, and General Pinckney stated that we had considered, with the most serious attention, the conversation we had had the honor of holding with him a few days past; that the propositions he had suggested appeared to us to be substantially the same with those which had been made by Mr. X. by Mr. Y. and also to Mr. Gerry, with an intention that they should be communicated to his colleagues; that we considered it as a proposition that the United States should furnish aid to France, to be used during the present war; that, though it was unusual to disclose instructions, yet we would declare to him that, in addition to its being a measure amounting to a declaration of war against Great Britain, we were expressly forbidden by our instructions to take such a step.

The minister said, in the tone of a question, he supposed our instructions were to do nothing which would amount to a departure from our neutrality.

General Pinckney said that we were so instructed, and that they were still more particular. Mr. Talleyrand then proceeded to argue that it would be no departure from neutrality to stipulate a loan payable after the war, and spoke of it clearly as admitting of application to immediate use. He said a good deal of the secrecy with which the transaction might be clothed, and observed, further, that a loan payable after the war would be a proof of our faithful observance of the duties of neutrality, since it would be considered as proving that we had rejected propositions for an immediate loan. General Marshall replied, that we thought differently; that, in our opinion, any act on the part of the American Government, on which one of the belligerent Powers could raise money for immediate use, would be furnishing aid to that Power, and would be taking part in the war. It would be, in fact, to take the only part which, in the existing state of things, America could take. This was our deliberate opinion; and, in addition to it, we considered our instructions as conclusive on this point.

He observed that we had claims on the French Government for property taken from American citizens. Some of those claims were probably just. He asked, if they were acknowledged by France, whether we could not give a credit as for the payment: say for two years? We answered that we could. He then insisted that it was precisely the same thing; that by such an act we should consent to leave in the hands of France funds to which our citizens were entitled, and which might be used in the prosecution of the war. General Pinckney said there was a difference between the cases; that such prizes were now actually in the power of the French, without our consent; we could not prevent it or get them out; but the granting or not granting a loan was in our own power. He repeated his observation, and General Marshall said that the property for which money was due to American citizens from the French Government, was taken into the possession of that Government without any co-operation on the part of the United States. No act of any sort was performed by our Government which, in any degree, contributed to place those funds in the hands of France, nor was there any consent towards it; but in the case proposed, the act would be the act of the Government; the Government would itself place funds in the hands of France, and thereby furnish means which might be employed in the prosecution of the war. This was the distinction between the cases, and, in a question of neutrality, it appeared to us to be all important. The minister then proceeded to state the case of our assuming the debt of our citizens, and of paying the money in that manner; but General Pinckney and Mr. Gerry told him we were positively forbidden to assume the debt to our own citizens, even if we were to pay the money directly to them. He seemed surprised at this. General Pinckney observed that, contrary to usage, we had deemed it proper, in the existing state of things, to state candidly our powers to him, that he might know certainly that we could not secretly, or under any disguise whatever, make a loan which might be used during the war. Mr. Talleyrand said he must resume his position that there was a difference, which he must insist upon, between a loan payable immediately and a loan payable in future; and he still insisted there was no difference between a loan payable in future and a credit for the money which might be due to our citizens. Mr. Gerry observed that his colleagues had justly stated the distinction between the debt which will be due to the citizens of the United States from France, in case of her recognising the claims which we shall make in their behalf, and a debt which might arise from a loan by the Government of the United States to that of France during the war. The one is the result of an arrest of their property without their consent; the other would be a voluntary act of the Government of the United States, and a breach of their neutrality. There is an additional objection to the latter; if the United States should make such a loan, it would give too much reason to suppose that their Government had consented, in a collusive manner, to the capture of the vessels of their citizens, and had thus been furnishing France with supplies to carry on the war. Our instructions are express not to stipulate for any aids to France, either directly or indirectly, during the war. With respect to a secret stipulation, a loan cannot be made without an act of the Legislature; but if the Executive were adequate to it, we have had an instance of an injunction of secrecy on members of the Senate, on an important subject, which one of the members thought himself warranted in publishing in the newspapers, and of frequent instances of secrets which have otherwise escaped; secrecy, in this instance, might therefore be considered, if the measure was in itself admissible, as being impracticable. General Marshall observed that we had considered the subject with great solicitude, and were decidedly of opinion that we could not, under any form, make a loan which could be used during the war; that we could not tell what our Government would do if on the spot, but were perfectly clear that, without additional orders, we could not do what France requested. Mr. Gerry observed that the Government and nation of the United States, as well as ourselves, were earnestly solicitous to restore friendship between the two republics; that, as General Marshall had stated, we could not say what our Government would do if on the spot; but if this proposition met the wishes of the Government of France, General Marshall and himself had agreed immediately to embark for the United States, and lay before our Government the existing state of things here, as it respected our nation, to enable them to determine whether any, and what, other measures on their part were necessary. M. Talleyrand made no observation on this proposition, but inquired whether we expected soon to receive orders. Mr. Gerry mentioned an answer he had received to a letter sent by him in November; and General Marshall stated that our first despatches were sent on board two vessels at Amsterdam, on the 28th of November, from which Mr. Talleyrand could form as just an idea as we could, when an answer might be expected; but he did not think it probable one would arrive before a month to come. General Marshall told him we knew that our Government had not received our despatches on the 8th of January, and we could not tell when they might be received. He asked whether our intelligence came through England? General Marshall answered that it did not; and General Pinckney said that American papers as late as the 8th of January mentioned the fact.

There was some conversation about the time when these instructions might be expected, and General Marshall suggested a doubt whether our Government might give any instructions. He asked, with some surprise, whether we had not written for instructions? and we answered that we had not; and Mr. Gerry said that we had stated facts to our Government, and conceived that nothing more was necessary. General Pinckney observed that the Government, knowing the facts, would do what was proper, and that our applying or not applying for instructions would not alter their conduct. Mr. Talleyrand then inquired whether we had not sent any one to the United States. General Pinckney said no; and Mr. Gerry added that, soon after our arrival we had made propositions to send one of our number, which were not accepted. And General Marshall further added, that those who had communicated with us had told us we should be ordered out of France immediately; and we had supposed that we should be ordered out before our letters could reach the Government. Mr. Gerry then observed that the Government of France must judge for itself; but that it appeared to him that a treaty on liberal principles, such as those on which the treaty of commerce between the two nations was first established, would be infinitely more advantageous to France than the trifling advantages she could derive from a loan. Such a treaty would produce a friendship and attachment on the part of the United States to France, which would be solid and permanent, and produce benefits far superior to those of a loan, if we had powers to make it. To this observation Mr. Talleyrand made no reply. We parted without any sentiment delivered by the minister on the subject of our going home to consult our Government.

As we were taking our leave of Mr. Talleyrand, we told him that two of us would return immediately, to receive the instructions of our Government, if that would be agreeable to the Directory; if it was not, we would wait some time, in the expectation of receiving instructions.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 143. [2d SESSION.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JUNE 18, 1798.

UNITED STATES, June 18, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate
and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I now transmit to Congress the despatch, No. 8, from our envoys extraordinary to the French republic, which was received at the Secretary of State's office on Thursday, the 14th day of this month.

JOHN ADAMS.

No. 8.

PARIS, April 3, 1798.

DEAR SIR:

We herewith transmit you a copy of the letter written to us by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, dated the 28th Ventose, (18th March) and purporting to be an answer to our memorial of the 17th of January.

We also send you in this enclosure a copy of our reply, which has been presented this morning. As soon as we certainly know what steps the French Government mean to pursue in consequence of this reply, you shall be informed of them. We remain, &c.

CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY.
J. MARSHALL,
E. GERRY.

Colonel PICKERING, Secretary of the United States.

The Minister of Foreign Relations of the French republic to Messrs. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, J. Marshall, and E. Gerry.

The undersigned, Minister of Foreign Relations of the French republic, has laid before the Executive Directory the memorial which the commissioners and envoys extraordinary of the United States of America have transmitted to him, under the date of 28th Nivose last, (17th January, 1798) and it is in execution of the intentions of the Directory, which desires to convince the United States of the true dispositions which animate it with respect to them, that the undersigned communicates to the commissioners and envoys extraordinary the following observations:

The first thing which must excite attention, in the memorial of the commissioners and envoys extraordinary, is the method which they have thought proper to pursue in the exposition, and in the discussion of the points which are in dispute between the two States. The Executive Directory, animated with dispositions the most conciliatory, and penetrated with the interests which should draw the two nations together, as well as eager to concur in the well known wish of the two people to maintain a perfect intimacy, had reason to expect that the envoys would have brought, in the name of their Government, dispositions entirely similar, and a temper previously prepared by the same views and the same desires. What must be, after this, the surprise of the Executive Directory, when the undersigned rendered it an account of a memorial in which the Commissioners and Envoys Extraordinary, reversing the known order of facts, have aimed to pass over, as it were in silence, the just motives of complaint of the French Government, and to disguise the true cause of the misunderstanding which is prolonged between the two republics! So that it would appear, from that exposition, as partial as unfaithful, that the French republic has no real grievance to substantiate, no legitimate reparation to demand, whilst the United States should alone have a right to complain—should alone be entitled to claim satisfaction.

The designs which have induced a preference of this course to every other have not escaped the Executive Directory; and it is as well from a just sentiment of the dignity of the republic, whose interests are confided to it, as to provide eventually against the views which may be contemplated by such conduct, that it has charged the undersigned to dispel these empty appearances, which indeed cannot exist when facts shall be re-established, and the true intentions of the Directory shall be solemnly made to appear, in opposition to those which can be attributed to it only gratuitously, and by taking advantage of its silence.

An incontestable truth, and one which has been entirely passed over in the memorial of the commissioners and envoys extraordinary, is, that the priority of grievances and complaints belonged to the French republic; that these complaints and these grievances were as real as numerous, long before the United States had the least grounded claim to make, and, consequently, before all the facts, on which the envoys rest with so many details, had existed.

Another truth, not less incontestable, is, that all the grievances which the commissioners and envoys extraordinary exhibit, with the exceptions which the undersigned was ready to discuss, are a necessary consequence of the measures which the prior conduct of the United States had justified on the part of the French republic, and which its treaties with the said United States authorized in certain cases, which it depended upon the General Government of the Union to create or not to create.

It would be foreign to the purpose to enter into an enumeration of the complaints which the French Government had room to make against the Federal Government, since the commencement of the war, excited against the French republic by a power jealous of its prosperity and its regeneration. These details are contained in the numerous official communications, made at Philadelphia by the ministers of the republic, and have been recapitulated by the predecessor of the undersigned in a note addressed, under the date of 19th Ventose, in the 4th year, (9th March, 1796) to the minister plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, and very particularly detailed in the official note of citizen Adet, dated at Philadelphia, on the 25th Brumaire, in the 5th year, (15th November, 1796.) Complaint was made in the above note of the inexecution of the treaties concluded in 1778, in the only clauses in which France had stipulated some advantages, in return for the efforts which she engaged to make for the common benefit, and against the insults offered to the dignity of the French republic.

In fact, from the commencement of the war the American tribunals have claimed the right to take cognizance of the validity of prizes, carried into the ports of the United States by French cruisers. It has resulted from this pretension, contrary to the letter of the treaty of commerce of 1778, that the property of citizens of the republic has been unjustly detained, and that French cruising has been totally discouraged in the American seas, against an enemy who revived the most barbarous laws of that mode of warfare, to destroy and insult the American commerce, even under the eyes of the Federal Government.

That Government did not confine itself to favor the enemies of the French republic in a point so essential, a point on which, in truth, some abuses might arise, but which the French Government manifested itself disposed to prevent; it even went so far as to permit enemy's vessels, contrary to the literal meaning of the above treaty, to put into the ports of the United States, after having captured the property or ships belonging to French citizens. Soon afterwards a national corvette, at anchor in the port of Philadelphia,* was seized by order of the Government, and this arrest was afterwards extended even to her commander. The American tribunals, in like manner, arrested the person of the ex-Governor of Guadaloupe, for acts of his administration; and it was necessary that the Executive Directory should threaten to make reprisals, to put this affair in the course prescribed by the law of nations.

During the whole space of time which has been just reviewed, the French Government made fruitless efforts to induce the Government of the United States to procure, for the agents of the republic, the legal means of carrying into effect the clauses of the consular convention of 1788, which granted to our navigation and commerce privileges, whose principle was consecrated by the treaties of 1778; and nothing could ever be obtained, in this respect, but fruitless references to the tribunals. In general, all matters which, with intentions sincerely conciliatory, should have been terminated by means of negotiation, were habitually referred to the judicial authorities; and these, whether they were or were not subject to a secret influence, in the end either deprived the republic of rights founded upon treaties, or modified their exercise as suited the system of the Government.

Such was the true state of things in the month of August, 1795, the period when the ratification of the treaty of amity, navigation, and commerce, signed at London in the month of November preceding, between the United States and Great Britain, filled the measure of the grievances of the republic.

What had been, until then, the conduct of the French Government towards the United States? The undersigned, in order to contrast it with that of the said States, will content himself with recalling facts, which cannot, however, have been forgotten.

Occupied with the most pressing cares in Europe, the republic did not direct her attention to the United States; but, in order constantly to give them new proofs of the most sincere friendship and interest, and she left it to her agents, amicably to discuss with the Federal Government the controversies which have just been sketched, and which, had they been handled on both sides in the true spirit of conciliation, could not have altered their good understanding to the present degree. The republic was hardly constituted, when a minister was sent to Philadelphia, whose first act was to declare to the United States that they would not be pressed to execute the defensive causes of the treaty of alliance, although the circumstances, in the least equivocal manner, exhibited the casus fœderis. Far from appreciating this conduct, the American Government received it as the acknowledgment of a right; and it is in this spirit, also, that the commissioners and envoys extraordinary have met this question in the beginning of their memorial. The minister of the republic at Philadelphia, having given uneasiness to the American Government, was readily recalled, even with circumstances of extreme rigor. His successor carried to the United States every desirable reparation, as well as declarations the most friendly and sincere.

Nothing equals the spirit of conciliation, or rather of condescension, in which his instructions were drawn, relatively to all the points which caused any uneasiness in the Federal Government. The citizen Adet again enforced, in the name of the National Convention, those expressions of good will; and that assembly itself received, with the effusion of an unbounded confidence and security, the new minister, whom the President of the United States sent to it, with the apparent intention of sincerely corresponding with the dispositions which the republic had not ceased to profess.

What might appear incredible is, that the republic, and her alliance, were sacrificed at the moment when she thus redoubled her regards for her ally; and that the corresponding demonstrations of the Federal Government had no other object but to keep her, as well as her Government, in a false security. And yet it is now known that, at this very period, Mr. Jay, who had been sent to London solely, as it was then said, to negotiate arrangements relative to the depredations committed upon the American commerce by the cruisers of Great Britain, signed a treaty of amity, navigation, and commerce, the negotiating and signing of which had been kept a profound secret at Paris and at Philadelphia. This treaty was avowed to our minister plenipotentiary only at the last extremity; and it was communicated to him only for form's sake, and after it had received the ratification of the Senate. When the agents of the republic complained of this mysterious conduct, they were answered by an appeal to the independence of the United States, solemnly sanctioned in the treaties of 1778—a strange manner of contesting a grievance, the reality of which was demonstrated by the dissimulation to which recourse was had—an insidious subterfuge, which substitutes for the true point of the question a general principle, which the republic cannot be supposed to dispute, and which destroys, by the aid of a sophism, that intimate confidence which ought to exist between two allies, and which, above all, ought to exist between the French republic and the United States.

If it be difficult to find in this conduct what ought to be expected from a friend, what must be thought of the treaty itself, and of its provisions? This treaty is now known to all Europe: and the small majority by which it passed the two Houses, as well as the multitude of imposing wishes which were expressed by the nation against such an act, bear honorable testimony in favor of the opinion which the French Government has adopted concerning it. The undersigned will not repeat, with respect to this treaty, what his predecessor has said of it in his note of the 19th Ventose, before cited, and in that of the 19th Messidor following, nor what the minister plenipotentiary of the republic at Philadelphia has set forth, at great length, in his official note of the 25th Brumaire. He will content himself with observing, summarily, that, in this treaty, every thing having been calculated to turn the neutrality of the United States to the disadvantage of the French republic, and to the advantage of England; that the Federal Government having in this act made to Great Britain concessions, the most unheard of; the most incompatible with the interests of the United States; the most derogatory to the alliance which subsisted between the said States and the French republic; the latter was perfectly free, in order to avoid the inconveniences of the treaty of London, to avail itself of the preservative means with which the law of nature, the law of nations, and prior treaties, furnished it.

Such are the reasons which have produced the decrees of the Directory, of which the United States complain, as well as the conduct of its agents to the West Indies. All these measures are founded on the 2d article of the treaty of 1778, which requires that, in matters of navigation and commerce, France should always be, with respect to the United States, on the footing of the most favored nation. The Executive Directory cannot be arraigned, if, from the execution of this eventual clause, some inconveniences have resulted to the American flag. As to the abuses which may have sprung from that principle, the undersigned again repeats that he was ready to discuss them in the most friendly manner.

From this faithful exposition of facts, which have progressively led to the present misunderstanding between the two States, it results, as the undersigned has said in the beginning of this answer, that the priority of grievances belongs to the French republic; and that such of its measures as may have occasioned the complaints of the United States, are, with some exceptions, the natural consequence of a state of things, which it depended upon them to create or not create.

If the undersigned should terminate the exposition of the grievances of the republic with the treaty of London, he would imperfectly fulfil his task; it is his duty to carry his views further. From the moment that the treaty in question was put into execution, the Government of the United States seemed to think itself freed from the necessity of keeping any measures with the republic: notwithstanding the reiterated assurance which had been given to its ministers, that the treaty would in no respect change the pre-existing state of neutrality of the United States, notice was given in the course of the year 1796 to the French cruisers, that they could no longer, as had been until then practised, be permitted to sell their prizes in the ports of the United States. This decision was rendered by the Federal court of justice, and founded upon the treaty between the United States and Great Britain.

The newspapers, known to be under the indirect control of the cabinet, have since the treaty redoubled the invectives and calumnies against the republic and against her principles, her magistrates, and her envoys. Pamphlets, openly paid for by the minister of Great Britain, have re-produced, in every form, those insults and calumnies, without a state of things so scandalous having ever attracted the attention of the Government, which might have repressed it. On the contrary, the Government itself was intent upon encouraging this scandal in its public acts. The Executive Directory has seen itself denounced in a speech delivered by the President in the course of the month of May last (O. S.) as endeavoring to propagate anarchy and division within the United States. The new allies which the republic has acquired, and who are the same that contributed to the independence of the Americans, have been equally insulted in the official correspondences which have been made public, or in the newspapers. In fine, one cannot help discovering, in the tone of the speech and of the publications which have been just pointed out, a latent enmity which only waits an opportunity to break out.

Facts being thus established, it is disagreeable to be obliged to think that the instructions, under which the commissioners have acted, have not been drawn up with the sincere intention of obtaining pacific results; because, far from proceeding in their memorial upon some avowed principles and acknowledged facts, they have inverted and confounded both, so as to be enabled to impute to the republic all the misfortunes of a rupture, which they seem willing to produce by such a course of proceeding. It is evident that the desire plainly declared of supporting, at hazard, the treaty of London, which is the principal grievance of the republic of adhering to the spirit in which this treaty was formed and executed, and of not granting to the republic any of the means of reparation which she has proposed through the medium of the undersigned, have dictated those instructions. It is equally evident that no hesitation is made in sacrificing to these strange sentiments those which the treaties of 1778, and the recollection of the circumstances in the midst of which they were concluded, ought to inspire.

The remote consequences of such conduct have not escaped the attention of the Directory. It is desired, while nothing is omitted to prolong the misunderstanding, and even to augment it, to throw upon the republic all the odium, in the view of America and of Europe. It is sought to justify, by delusive appearances, the prejudices with which the name of the republic is surrounded at pleasure, and the system of exasperation and alienation which is pursued in relation to it, with the most strange obstinacy. It is finally wished to seize the first favorable occasion to consummate an intimate union with a Power, towards which a devotion and partiality is professed, which has long been the principle of the conduct of the Federal Government.

The intentions which the undersigned here attributes to the Government of the United States are so little disguised, that nothing seems to have been neglected at Philadelphia to manifest them to every eye. It is, probably, with this view, that it was thought proper to send to the French republic persons whose opinions and connexions are too well known to hope from them dispositions sincerely conciliatory. It is painful for the undersigned to be obliged to make a contrast between this conduct and that which was pursued towards the cabinet of St. James's, under similar circumstances. An eagerness was then felt to send to London ministers well known for sentiments corresponding with the object of their mission. The republic, it seems, might have expected a like deference; and if the same propriety has not been observed with respect to it, it is exceedingly probable that it is to be attributed to the views above alluded to by the undersigned.

It is impossible to foresee whither such dispositions may lead. The undersigned does not hesitate to believe, that the American nation, like the French nation, sees this state of things with regret, and does not consider its consequences without sorrow. He apprehends that the American people will not commit a mistake concerning the prejudices with which it has been desired to inspire them against an allied people, nor concerning the engagements which it seems to be wished to make them contract to the detriment of an alliance, which so powerfully contributed to place them in the rank of nations, and to support them in it; and that they will see in these new combinations the only dangers their prosperity and importance can incur.

Penetrated with the justice of these reflections and their consequences, the Executive Directory has authorized the undersigned to express himself with all the frankness which becomes the French nation. It is indispensable that, in the NAME of the Directory, he should dissipate those illusions with which for five years the complaints of the ministers of the republic have been incessantly surrounded at Philadelphia, in order to weaken, calumniate, or distort them. It was essential, in fine, that, by exhibiting their sentiments in an unequivocal manner, he should clear up all the doubts, and all the false interpretations, of which they might be the object.

It is, therefore, only in order to smooth the way of discussions, that the undersigned has entered into the preceding explanations. It is with the same view that he declares to the commissioners and envoys extraordinary that, notwithstanding the kind of prejudice which has been entertained with respect to them, the Executive Directory is disposed to treat with that one of the three, whose opinions, presumed to be more impartial, promise, in the course of the explanations, more of that reciprocal confidence which is indispensable.

The undersigned flatters himself that this overture will not meet, on the part of the commissioners and envoys extraordinary, with any serious difficulty. It is still more natural to hope it, because, by the tenor of their powers, the said commissioners and envoys extraordinary are authorized to negotiate jointly or separately; so that nothing but the desire of preventing any accommodation could produce any objection against this measure; which, moreover, is only pointed out to the commissioners themselves, in order that nothing may here bear an unfavorable appearance, and which evidently has no other object than to assure to the negotiation an happy issue, by avoiding, at the outset, every thing which may on either side awaken, in the course of this negotiation, sentiments calculated to endanger it.

The undersigned hopes that the commissioners and envoys extraordinary will soon enable him to inform the Executive Directory of their determination. Whatever this determination may be, the undersigned flatters himself that the explanations into which he has entered, will have placed the subjects in dispute in their true light, and may eventually serve to dissipate, in the eyes of all impartial men, the unfavorable impression which it might be endeavored to fix upon the intentions of the French republic and its Government. He concludes by renewing to the commissioners and envoys extraordinary the assurance of his consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

PARIS, 28*th Ventose*, 6*th year*, (18*th March*, 1798.)

The Ministers Plenipotentiary and Envoys Extraordinary from the United States of America to the French republic to the Minister of Exterior Relations.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

Your letter of the 28th Ventose, (18th March) in answer to a memorial of the undersigned, dated 17th January, was received the day after its date, and has been considered with the most respectful attention.

In that memorial, the undersigned, without furnishing cause for reproach, might have limited themselves to a statement of the numerous and well founded complaints of the nation they represent. They have been induced to extend their observations to other subjects, by that sincere desire to re-establish harmony and mutual confidence between the two republics which the Government of the United States has never ceased to feel and to express. Supposing that those misrepresentations, to which human actions and human sentiments must ever continue to be exposed, might have impressed on the mind of the French Government, occupied with the great and interesting events of Europe, the unfounded suspicion of partiality, on the part of America, for the enemies of France, the undersigned cherished the hope, that a complete review of the conduct of their Government, accompanied with a candid and thorough investigation of the real principles on which that conduct was founded, by removing prejudices, might restore sentiments which the United States have ever sought, and still seek to preserve.

In taking this review, it was obvious that a minute discussion of every particular fact, might incumber the examination with details which previous explanations had rendered unnecessary, and therefore it was confined to those leading measures of which the particular cases were the necessary result. The undersigned, however, declared, and they still declare, that if the Government of the United States has given just cause of complaint to that of France, in any case, they are ready to consider, and to compensate the injury. That negotiation, the opening of which, they have for nearly six months unremittingly solicited and patiently attended, would, if entered upon, demonstrate the sincerity of this declaration.

Still animated by the same spirit which has dictated all their efforts to approach this republic, still searching to remove unfavorable impressions, by a candid display of truths, and a frank manifestation of the principles which have really governed the United States, and still endeavoring thereby to facilitate the restoration of harmony between two nations, which ought to be the friends of each other, the undersigned will lay before you the result of their reflections on your letter of the 28th Ventose.

Whatever force you may please to allow to their observations, the relative situation of the two republics, it is hoped, will not fail to convince you that they proceed from the most perfect conviction of their justice. You contend, citizen minister, that the priority of complaint is on the side of France, and that those measures, which have so injured and oppressed the people of the United States, have been produced by the previous conduct of their Government.

To this the undersigned will now only observe, that if France can justly complain of any act of the Government of the United States, whether that act be prior or subsequent to the wrongs received by that Government, a disposition and a wish to do in the case what justice and friendship may require, is openly avowed, and will continue to be manifested.

Your complaints against the United States may be classed under three heads.

1st, The inexecution of their treaties with France.
2dly, The treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, formed with Great Britain.
3dly, The conduct of their Government since that treaty.

If the undersigned shall be disappointed in their hope to convince you that on no one of these points can their Government be justly inculpated, yet they persuade themselves that the demonstration of the good faith and upright intention, with which it has ever acted, will be complete and satisfactory. This being proved, and a tender of compensation for any unintentional wrong being made, a base for accommodation is offered, which they must yet hope will be acceptable to France.

1st, The inexecution of the treaties between the United States and France. Under this head, you complain, first, that, from the commencement of the war, the American tribunals have, in effect, pretended to the right of taking cognizance of the validity of prizes brought into the ports of the United States.

2dly, That, against the textual sense of the treaty, the Government has permitted the ships of the enemy to come into their ports, after having captured property or vessels belonging to French citizens.

3dly, That it has ordered the arrest of a national corvette, anchored in the port of Philadelphia, and that the arrestation has extended to the captain commandant.

4thly, The refusal to provide the means to execute the consular convention.

These complaints shall be considered in the order in which they are made.

1st. From the commencement of the war, the American tribunals have, in effect, pretended to the right of taking cognizance of the validity of prizes brought into the ports of the United States by French cruisers.

You have not been pleased to state a case in which this right has been asserted, and the undersigned are persuaded that no such case exists.

Far from asserting it, the Government of America has expressly disclaimed it. Mr. Jefferson, the then Secretary of State, in his letter to Mr. Morris of the 16th of August, 1793, which letter was laid before the French Government, declares "that the United States do not pretend any right to try the validity of captures made on the high seas by France, or any other nation, on its enemies.

"These questions belong, of common usage, to the sovereign of the captor, and, whenever it is necessary to determine them, resort must be had to his courts. This is the case provided for in the 17th article of the treaty, which says, that such prizes shall not be arrested, nor cognizance taken of the validity thereof; a stipulation much insisted on by Mr. Genet and the consuls, and which we never thought of infringing or questioning."

Mr. Randolph, the successor of Mr. Jefferson, in his letter to Mr. Fauchet of the 29th of May, 1795, says, "As to prizes made by legal cruisers on the high seas, it never was the intention of the President to interpose, he having abstained (as the 17th article of our treaty of commerce imports) from examining into their lawfulness."

Mr. Monroe, in his letter to your predecessor, of the 15th of March, 1796, says, "You will observe I admit the principle, if a prize was taken upon the high seas, and by a privateer fitted out within the republic or its dominions, that, in such case our courts have no right to take cognizance of its validity. But is any case of this kind alleged? I presume none is or can be shown."

But the United States have deemed it an indispensable duty to prevent, so far as they could prevent, the practice of hostility against nations with whom they were at peace, within their own limits, or by privateers fitted out in their own ports.

For the reasoning of their Government in support of this decision, the undersigned will again refer to the letter of Mr. Jefferson already quoted.

"Another doctrine advanced by Mr. Genet is, that our courts can take no cognizance of questions, whether vessels held by them as prizes are lawful prizes or not; that this jurisdiction belongs exclusively to their consulates here, which have been lately erected by the National Assembly into complete courts of admiralty.

"Let us consider first what is the extent of the jurisdiction which the consulates of France may rightfully exercise here. Every nation has, of natural right, entirely and exclusively all the jurisdiction which may be rightfully exercised in the territory it occupies. If it cedes any portion of that jurisdiction to judges appointed by another nation, the limits of their power must depend upon the instrument of cession. The United States and France have, by their consular convention, given mutually to their consuls jurisdiction in certain cases especially enumerated. But that convention gives to neither the power of establishing complete courts of admiralty within the territory of the other, nor even of deciding the particular question of prize or not prize. The consulates of France, then, cannot take judicial cognizance of those questions here.

"Of this opinion Mr. Genet was when he wrote his letter of May 27th, wherein he promises to correct the error of the consul at Charleston, of whom, in my letter of the 15th, I had complained as arrogating to himself that jurisdiction; though, in his subsequent letters, he has thought proper to embark in the errors of his consuls.

"The real question is, whether the United States have not a right to protect vessels within their waters, and on their coasts. The Grange was taken within the Delaware, between the shores of the Jerseys and of the Delaware State, and several miles above its mouth. The seizing of her was a flagrant violation of the jurisdiction of the United States. Mr. Genet, however, instead of apologizing, takes great merit, in his letters, for giving her up.

The William is said to have been taken within two miles of the shores of the United States. When the admiralty declined cognizance of the case, she was delivered to the French consul, according to my letter of June 25th, to be kept until the Executive of the United States should examine into the case, and Mr. Genet was desired, by my letter of June 29th, to have them furnished with the evidence, on behalf of the captors, as to the place of capture; yet, to this day, it has never been done. The brig Fanny was alleged to be taken within five miles from our shore; the Catherine within two miles and an half. It is an essential attribute of the jurisdiction of every country to preserve peace and punish acts in breach of it, and to restore property taken by force within its limits. Were the armed vessel of any nation to cut away any one of our own from the wharves of Philadelphia, and to choose to call it a prize: would this exclude us from the right of redressing the wrong? Were it the vessel of another nation, are we not equally bound to protect it while within our limits? Were it seized in any other waters, or on the shores of the United States, the right of redressing it is still the same: and humbled, indeed, would be our condition, were we obliged to depend for that on the will of a foreign consul, or on any negotiation with diplomatic agents. Accordingly, this right of protection within its waters, and to a reasonable distance on its coasts, has been acknowledged by every nation, and denied to none; and, if the property seized be yet within their power, it is their right and duty to redress the wrong themselves.

"France herself has asserted the right in herself, and recognized it in us, in the 6th article of our treaty, where we mutually stipulate that we will, by all the means in our power, (not by negotiation) protect and defend each other's vessels and effects in our ports or roads, or on the seas near our countries, and recover and restore the same to the right owners. The United Netherlands, Prussia, and Sweden, have recognised it also in treaties with us; and indeed it is a standing formule inserted in almost all the treaties of all nations, and proving the principle to be acknowledged by all nations."

In the letter of Mr. Randolph to Mr. Fauchet, already cited, that gentleman resumes this subject, and Mr. Fauchet, in answer, says, "The admiralty courts have always ceded to the entreaties of our enemies for their intervention in prize causes; in truth, frequently and almost constantly, by using the double plea of which you spoke to me, that is to say, by arguing either of seizure within the jurisdictional line of the United States, or of armament or augmentation of armament of the capturing vessels in their ports. On this subject, sir, you request me to specify a circumstance where a prize was arrested which did not come under that denomination, and you take the trouble to establish that they have a right to intervene in every case that can be brought under those heads. In the first place, sir, I never have, at least to my recollection, contested the right of your courts, or of the Government, to interfere in matters of the nature of those you mention."

It would seem to be incontestable, that the principle asserted by the United States, which indeed is an unquestionable principle, has been admitted in its utmost latitude by France. It is believed that in the execution of this principle, the Government and tribunals have only been guided by a sense of duty and the obligations of justice. If in any case that can be selected, wrong has unintentionally been committed, that wrong has grown inevitably out of the situation of the United States, and of the conduct of persons they have been unable to control, and will with readiness be corrected.

2dly. That, against the textual sense of the treaty, the Government has permitted the ships of the enemy to come into their ports, after having captured property or vessels belonging to French citizens.

It is to be regretted, that you have not been pleased to state some particular case, if the case be founded on a fact, which has manifested this permission: or if it be founded in principle, the precise difference between the construction given by the President of the United States to the article of the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, relative to this subject, and that for which you may contend. For the want of such a guide, the undersigned may discuss unnecessary points, without giving you complete satisfaction on that which in your mind may constitute the real difficulty.

The 17th article is in these words: "It shall be lawful for the ships of war of either party and privateers freely to carry whithersoever they please the ships and goods taken from their enemies, without being obliged to pay any duty to the officers of the Admiralty or other judges; nor shall such prizes be arrested or seized when they come to or enter the ports of either party; nor shall the searchers, or other officers of those places, search the same, or make examination concerning the lawfulness of such prizes; but they may hoist sail at any time and depart, and carry their prizes to the places expressed in their commissions, which the commanders of such ships of war shall be obliged to show: on the contrary, no shelter or refuge shall be given in their ports to such as shall have made prize of the subjects, people, or property of either of the parties; but if such shall come in, being forced by stress of weather or the dangers of the sea, all proper means shall be vigorously used that they go out and retire from thence as soon as possible." Do you contend, citizen minister, that this article ought to be rigidly construed according to its letter? If you do, it becomes necessary to ascertain what are the disabilities to which its letter really subjects the vessels belonging to the enemies of France. They are, 1st. That no shelter or refuge shall be given in the ports of the United States to the ships of war or privateers belonging to the enemy, which shall have made prize of the subjects, people or property of France. 2dly. That if such ships of war or privateers shall come in, being forced by stress of weather or the danger of the seas, all proper means shall be vigorously used that they go out and retire from thence as soon as possible.

The letter of the article does not exclude generally the ships of war, belonging to the enemy, but those only which have made prize of the subjects, people or property of France. That the vessel shall have made a prize is a part and an essential part of the description. Whether the vessel be or be not within this description is a fact, the ascertainment of which must precede the measures to be taken in consequence of that fact. When the fact shall have been ascertained, the letter of the article denies refuge or shelter to the ship of war or privateer, but not to the prize which may have been made. You well know, citizen minister, that if the letter of the article is to be set up against its spirit, when the former is most favorable to the views of France, the letter must still be adhered to, though it should counteract those views. The situation of the United States bound them to observe, between the belligerent powers, an exact neutrality, in all cases where their previous treaties had not stipulated advantages or imposed disabilities.

They could not refuse to one belligerent power those rights of ordinary hospitality which were enjoyed by others, which the common usages of nations permit, and which were forbidden by no particular treaty. Such refusal would have been manifestly partial, and a plain departure from that neutral position in which the United States found themselves, and which good faith, integrity, and their best interests impelled them religiously to maintain. Thus circumstanced it was the duty of the Government to give its true construction to a treaty granting advantages to one of the belligerent powers, and imposing disabilities on another. In searching for this true construction, its best judgment ought to be exercised, and the dictates of that judgment ought to be obeyed. The United States have done so. They have refused shelter in their ports to the prizes made on the French republic, or to the ships of war belonging to the enemy and accompanying such prizes.

They have permitted ships of war, not bringing prizes with them, to remain in their ports, without instituting tribunals to inquire whether such ships have at any time captured French citizens or French property. The reasoning on which this decision was founded, and which appears to the undersigned to have been conclusive, will not now be repeated. It has been detailed in several letters from the Secretary of State of the United States to the minister of France in Philadelphia. The undersigned will only observe, that the construction supposed to be just, and for that reason actually put upon the article, is believed to be more favorable than the literal construction to the interests of France.

Ships of war which have made prizes on this republic, if they enter the ports of the United States without such prizes, ought indeed, under the letter of the article, to be ordered to depart as soon as the fact can have been ascertained; but the prizes themselves are permitted to remain in safety. By the actual construction, a ship of war entering without a prize, is permitted to remain, but all shelter is refused to a ship of war which is accompanied by a prize, and also to the prize itself. It would seldom happen that a ship of war not driven in by stress of weather, or the danger of the seas, would wish to continue in port longer than the time which would unavoidably be consumed in ascertaining the fact of her having made a prize, but it must often happen that a prize now excluded from the ports of the United States, would find shelter in them if the literal construction of the treaty should be adopted.

This exposition given by the United States to this article was made known in 1793—France has never signified a wish that the literal construction throughout should be pursued. This strengthens the opinion entertained by the undersigned, that the rule on this subject, so early established by the American Government, is considered by the republic as more favorable to its interests, than a rule conforming entirely to the letter of the article.

3dly. "The Government of the United States has ordered the arrest of a national corvette* anchored in the port of Philadelphia, and the arrestation has been extended to the captain commandant."

The undersigned beg leave to state the case which is the foundation of this complaint. In the statement itself they trust will be found a complete justification of the conduct of the United States.

The Cassius, under the name of "Les Jumeaux," was fitted and armed for a vessel of war in the port of Philadelphia, in violation of a law of the United States. In December, 1794, having escaped from the port to descend the river, orders were given to the militia of the State of Delaware to intercept her. The attempt was made and failed. The crew of Les Jumeaux, which was unexpectedly found to be very numerous, resisted the officers who went on board, manned their cannon and brought them to bear on the cutter in which the militia, about forty in number, were embarked. Their force being inadequate to the enterprise, they retired with an intention to return the next day with a reinforcement. They did so, but Les Jumeaux had sailed and gone to sea. The agent, Mr. Guenet, by whom Les Jumeaux had been fitted out, was tried at the circuit court in Philadelphia, convicted of the offence, and received sentence of fine and imprisonment.

Les Jumeaux proceeded to St. Domingo; Samuel B. Davis, a citizen of the United States, there took the command of her, with a commission from the French Government. Davis probably sailed from Philadelphia in les Jumeaux, for the purpose of finally taking the command of her. Her name was now changed to "Le Cassius," and on a cruise she took a schooner called the William Lindsay, belonging to Messrs. Yard and Ketland, of Philadelphia, Mr. Ketland having purchased an interest in her after her sailing. The schooner and her cargo were condemned as prize at St. Domingo. In August, 1795, Captain Davis, commanding the Cassius, came with her to Philadelphia; she was immediately known. Mr. Yard, with a view of obtaining an indemnification for the loss of the schooner and her cargo, libelled the Cassius in the district court, and caused the captain to be arrested. Soon after, the supreme court being in session, Captain Davis's counsel applied for and obtained a prohibition to the district court to stop its proceedings, by which the suits, both against him and Le Cassius, were defeated. The prohibition was granted on this principle, that the trial of prizes, taken without the jurisdiction of the United States, and carried to places within the jurisdiction of France for adjudication, by French vessels, and all questions incidental to it, belong exclusively to the French tribunals; and, consequently, that its vessels of war and their officers are not liable to process of our courts, predicated upon such capture and subsequent proceeding within the jurisdiction of the French Government.

Messrs. Yard and Ketland having failed to obtain indemnification in this mode, procured new process, on the information of Mr. Ketland, to be issued from the circuit court, by which Le Cassius was attached as a vessel armed and equipped as a ship of war, in the port of Philadelphia, with intent to cruise and commit hostilities against nations with whom the United States were at peace, in violation of the act of Congress prohibiting such armament. Mr. Adet complained that the process was taken out of the circuit court, because, as he alleged, it had no jurisdiction, and that it would be attended with delay, that court sitting but twice a year; whereas the district court, in which it was said the prosecution, if at all permitted, should have been commenced, was always open. Gentlemen of legal knowledge were consulted on the point of jurisdiction in this case, and they were decided in their opinion, that the circuit court had jurisdiction, and exclusively of the district court. The Government of the United States had no part in originating this prosecution; and the district attorney, in behalf of the United States, took measures, at each term of the circuit court, to prepare the cause for trial, and on a plea calculated to defeat the prosecution. At length, in October term, 1796, the cause was brought to an hearing. In the course of the argument, the question of jurisdiction presented itself. The court adjourned until next day to consider of it: and the following morning dismissed the suit.

The undersigned may be permitted to ask, whether in a change of situation, placing France precisely in the circumstances of the United States, either the corvette or her captain would have escaped.

4thly. The refusal to provide the means to execute the consular convention of the 14th November, 1788.

As you have not selected the particular parts of this convention supposed to remain unexecuted, the undersigned must necessarily consider the more definite charges heretofore made on the same subject as being adopted by you.

Your predecessor in office, in his letter to Mr. Monroe of the 19th Ventose 4th year (9th March, 1796) complains 1st. That the clause granting to French consuls the right of judging exclusively in disputes between Frenchmen, is become illusory for the want of laws giving them the means of having their decisions executed.

2dly. The right of causing mariners who desert to be arrested is rendered ineffectual, because the judges charged by the laws with issuing the mandates of arrest have lately required the presentation of the original roll of the crew, in contempt of the 5th article admitting, in the tribunals of both Powers, copies certified by the consul.

It is then understood to be required,

1st. That the officers of the United States should execute the judgments of the consuls:

2dly. That the judges of the United States should issue mandates of arrest against persons charged with being deserters, without a view of the original roll of the crew.

* Le Cassius.

It is very justly observed by Mr. Jefferson in his letter to Mr. Morris, which has been already cited, that "every nation has, of natural right, entirely and exclusively, all the jurisdiction which may be rightfully exercised in the territory it occupies. If it cedes any portion of that jurisdiction to judges appointed by another nation, the limits of their power must depend upon the instrument of cession." The parties to the convention profess its object to be, "to define and establish in a reciprocal and permanent manner the functions and privileges of consuls and vice consuls."

It is to be expected then, as well as from the intention of the convention establishing the tribunal, as from the nature of the tribunal itself, which is a foreign court, constituted by a foreign authority, governed by foreign laws, and amenable for its conduct to a foreign government, that no power is to be implied, and that it possesses no capacity which is not expressly given to it. To ascertain, then, the precise extent of the stipulation, let the convention itself be considered.

The first point rests exclusively on the 12th article, which is in these words: "All differences and suits between the subjects of His Most Christian Majesty in the United States, or between the citizens of the United States within the dominions of the Most Christian King, and particularly all disputes relative to the wages and terms of engagement of the crews of the respective vessels, and all differences, of whatever nature they may be, which may arise between the privates of the said crews, or between any of them and their captains, or between the captains of different vessels of their nations, shall be determined by the respective consuls and vice consuls, either by a reference to arbitrators, or by a summary judgment, and without costs. No officer of the country, civil or military, shall interfere therein, or take any part whatever in the matter; and the appeals from the said consular sentences shall be carried before the tribunals of France or of the United States to whom it may appertain to take cognizance thereof."

In this article no engagement is made to furnish the means of executing consular judgments. If, therefore, the preceding positions be just, there is an end of the question. But other arguments present themselves in support of the construction contended for by the United States. The consular authority in a foreign country is usually either voluntary or enforced by the laws of the nation to which the consuls belong, and which may bind their own citizens or subjects under penalties to be inflicted on their return, or otherwise. Upon this idea it was sufficient to stipulate a permission of the jurisdiction in exclusion of the courts of the country; on any other idea, it would have been necessary to have stipulated explicitly, and perhaps in detail, the manner in which its sentences should be executed. To accede to the demands of France would be to erect in a foreign country complete courts of justice with effectual process to compel the appearance of parties and witnesses, and to execute their decisions. And as the transactions in commerce could not, in the nature of things, be confined to foreigners alone, the citizens of the country must often be necessary witnesses to those transactions, and of course rendered amenable to this foreign jurisdiction in their own country; whereas the jurisdiction granted by the article is only of French consuls over French citizens in the United States, and reciprocally of American consuls over the citizens of the United States in France. This would be to extend, by implication, the authority of a foreigner over persons not contemplated by the treaty as subject to it. The article declares, too, "that no officer of the country, civil or military, shall interfere therein, or take any part in the matter." But sheriffs, marshals, and their deputies, or any other persons appointed by, and acting under, the laws of the country, are "officers of the country," and consequently cannot aid in the execution of consular decisions, because they are expressly forbidden, "to interfere therein or take any part whatever in the matter."

But was it meant that the laws should give consuls the power to appoint such executive officers of their own nation? Should it be conceded that a person so appointed could not be considered as an officer of that nation by virtue of, and according to, whose laws he held his office, still we find no such thing in the convention. On the contrary in the case of deserters from vessels, mentioned in the 9th article, whom the consuls are authorized to cause to be arrested, they are expressly directed to apply in writing to the "courts, judges, and officers, competent" to make the arrests, meaning the courts, judges, and officers of the country where the consuls reside. In addition to this, if power could be given to consuls to appoint officers to execute their decisions, these officers must, of course, have their fees of compensation to be paid by one or other of the parties. But the article giving the jurisdiction declares that the consular judgments shall be "without costs."

The second complaint is, that the judges of the United States have required the exhibition of the original roll of the crew as the testimony which would authorize the issuing of a mandate, to apprehend a French mariner charged as a deserter. The right to require these mandates is founded entirely on the 9th article of the consular convention.

That declares "that the consuls and vice consuls shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent, and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving by an exhibition of the registers of the vessel, or ship's roll, that those men were part of the said crews; and on this demand so proved (saving, however, where the contrary is proved) the delivery shall not be refused."

It would be an idle waste of time to attempt to prove to you, citizen minister, that the register of the vessel, or ship's roll, is not a copy of that paper, or that a copy does not satisfy a law which peremptorily requires the exhibition of the original. Your predecessor has thought proper to refer to the 5th article of that instrument; but a slight perusal of that article will convince you, citizen minister, that it does not apply to the case. When the judges of the United States determined that the mandate of arrest could not be issued on the exhibition of a "copy of the register of the vessel or ship's roll," they did not so decide for the purpose of giving effect to the system of the Government, but because the treaty was clearly understood by them positively to require the presentation of the original.

The undersigned regret, citizen minister, that your researches concerning the United States have not extended to their courts. You would have perceived and admired their purity. You would have perceived that America may repose herself securely on the integrity of her judges, and your justice would have spared the insinuations concerning them which have closed this part of your letter.

The undersigned will now consider what you have stated with respect to the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, formed with Great Britain.

You complain, citizen minister, in very strong terms, of the deception alleged to have been practised with respect to the objects of Mr. Jay's mission to London, and also of the contents of the treaty which that mission produced. You are pleased to observe that it was then said that Mr. Jay had been sent to London, only to negotiate arrangements relative to the depredations committed on the American commerce by the cruisers of Great Britain.

By whom, citizen minister, was this said? not by the President in his message to the Senate, announcing the nomination of Mr. Jay; nor by the then Secretary of State, in communicating to Mr. Fauchet the subject of that mission. The documents with respect to this assertion have been stated, and have been fully commented on. It has been fully demonstrated that the American Government did not seize this occasion to practise a deception so unnecessary, so foreign to its well known character, and which could produce only mischief to itself. As you have in no degree weakened the testimony which is relied on as disproving this allegation, or produced any sort of evidence in support of it, the undersigned cannot but mingle some degree of surprise with the regrets they feel at seeing it repeated, accompanied with the charge of that "dissumulation," of which all who examine well the conduct of the Government of the United States will so readily pronounce it to be incapable. You also criminate the secrecy which attended this negotiation. To this complaint, when formerly insisted on, it was answered, that so much of it as was material to this republic was immediately communicated to her minister; and that she had no right to inquire further, or to be dissatisfied that other objects were not disclosed; that it is not the practice of France, nor of any other nation, to communicate to others the particular subjects of negotiation which may be contemplated; and that no nation could be independent, which admitted itself to be accountable to another, for the manner in which it might judge proper to regulate its own concerns, on points in which that other was not interested; or which was bound to give previous intimation of every article, which might be inserted in a treaty, formed on the avowed principle of leaving in full force all pre-existing engagements. This reasoning is answered only by terming it a "sophism," "an insidious subterfuge." May not any reasoning, on any subject, be answered in the same manner? But can such an answer impair its force? Without doubt, citizen minister, the Government of the United States, when it informed France that the negotiations of Mr. Jay would not in any respect weaken its engagements to this republic, would have added, that they might eventually extend to a commercial treaty, if it had been supposed that the omission to give such information could really be considered as a breach of legitimate obligation, or as an evidence of diminished friendship. The information was most probably not given because it was unusual, and because it could neither be considered as proper, as necessary, or as material. The undersigned trust that the painful and unavailing discussions on this subject, rendered so unpleasant by the manner in which it has been treated, will never again be renewed.

Passing to the treaty itself, you say that the small majority by which it was sanctioned in the two Houses of Congress, and the number of respectable voices raised against it in the nation, depose honorably in favor of the opinion which the French Government has entertained of it. But you must be sensible, citizen minister, that the criterion, by which you ascertain the merits of the instrument in question, is by no means infallible, nor can it warrant the inference you draw from it. In a republic, like that of the United States, where no individual fears to utter what his judgment or his passions may dictate, where an unrestrained press conveys alike to the public eye the labors of virtue and the efforts of particular interests, no subject which agitates and interests the public mind can unite the public voice, or entirely escape public censure. In pursuit of the same objects a difference of opinion will arise, in the purest minds, from the different manner in which those objects are viewed; and there are situations in which a variety of passions combine to silence the voice of reason, and to betray the soundest judgments. In such situations, if the merit of an instrument is to be decided, not by itself, but by the approbation or disapprobation it may experience, it would surely be a safer rule to take as a guide the decision of a majority, however small that majority may be, than to follow the minority. A treaty too may be opposed as injurious to the United States, though it should not contain a single clause which could prejudice the interests of France. It ought not to be supposed that a treaty would for that reason be offensive to this republic.

Had you been pleased to state any objections to this instrument drawn from the compact itself, the undersigned would have given to those objections the most serious and respectful consideration. But it is supposed that you adopt, without adding to, the complaints made by your predecessor and by Mr. Adet, when you observe that you will not repeat what they have said. These complaints have been amply discussed in the memorial the undersigned had the honor to transmit you, bearing date 17th of January. It is believed to have been demonstrated that the stipulations complained of do not in the most remote degree wound the interests of France, affect the pre-existing engagements of the United States, or change their situation in relation to the belligerent Powers. Such, incontestably was, and is, the opinion of the American Government, and in this opinion only, would the treaty have been agreed to. As no one of the arguments which have at various times been urged on this subject, on the part of the United States, has ever yet been noticed, the undersigned deem unnecessary any attempt to re-urge or to strengthen them. You say that you will content yourself "with observing, summarily, that in this treaty every thing having been provided to turn the neutrality of the United States, to the disadvantage of the French republic, and to the advantage of England; that the Federal Government having, in this act, made to Great Britain concessions the most unheard of, the most incompatible with the interests of the United States, and the most derogatory from the alliance which existed between the said States, and the French republic, the latter was perfectly free to avail itself of the preservatory means with which it was furnished by the laws of nature and of nations, and by its anterior treaty, for the purpose of parrying the inconveniences of the treaty of London. Such are the reasons which have determined the arrets of the Directory of which the United States complain, as well as the conduct of its agents in the Antilles." But you have not shown a single provision, "which turns the neutrality of the United States to the disadvantage of the French republic, and to the advantage of England." You have not shown a single concession "incompatible with the interests of the United States," or "derogatory from their alliance with France."

It is considered as having been demonstrated, that this treaty leaves the neutrality of the United States, with respect both to France and England, precisely in its former situation, and that it contains no concessions which are either unusual, or derogatory from their alliance with this republic. But in forming this judgment the American Government has deceived itself, still it ought to be remembered that it has ever manifested a readiness to place France on the footing of England, with respect to the articles complained of.

You suppose that the second article of the treaty between France and the United States justifies the arrets, of which the latter Power complains: but that article only entitles either of the contracting parties to a participation of any particular favor in respect of commerce or navigation, which might thereafter be granted by the other to other nations, on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional. It has never been pretended to extend to pre-existing rights held and exercised under the law of nations, and barely recognized by any subsequent treaty. If this could be insisted on, still it was shown incontestably by the undersigned, that the arrêt particularly complained of, so far as it professes to found itself on the treaty with England, greatly transcends that treaty, and in its most noxious article, that requiring a rôle d'équipage, has no relation to it. This all essential circumstance you have not been pleased to notice; and it is with infinite regret the undersigned observe that the discussions at which you hint are to be limited to the abuses of the principle established by the arrêt, and not extended to the compatibility of the principle itself, with justice, the laws of nations, or existing treaties.

It is well known that such a discussion, if indeed the undersigned could be permitted to enter upon it, would avail but little, since the vast mass of American property captured by the cruisers, and condemned by the courts of France, has been found in vessels not furnished with a rôle d'équipage.

The undersigned have been minute in their attention to every syllable you have uttered on this interesting subject, because it has been often considered as having given cause of just irritation to France, and they are sincerely desirous of probing to the bottom every subject which may have assumed that complexion. Their wish is unaffected, to give to every complaint its real value, in order thus to prepare the way for accommodation, by the relinquishment of such as are not well founded, and the admission of those which have a real existence.

The third head of your complaints relates to the conduct of the Government of the United States since their treaty with England.

You observe that, as soon as the treaty in question had been put in execution, the Government of the United States seemed to think itself dispensed from the observance of any measures towards this republic, and you adduce in support of this general observation:

1st. The refusal to permit in the ports of the United States the sale of prizes made by French cruisers.

2dly. The invectives and calumnies against the French Government, its principles, and its officers, contained in certain journals and pamphlets published in the United States, &c.

3dly. The speech of the President to Congress in May last.

1st. The Government of the United States does not permit the sale in their ports of prizes made upon England by the cruisers of France.

The fact is admitted. To erect it into an offence, it becomes necessary to prove that this measure violates either the engagements or the neutrality of the United States. Neither is attempted. To show that it violates neither, had this been rendered necessary, would by no means have been deemed an arduous task. It will now only briefly be observed, that the 17th article of the treaty of commerce of the 6th of February, 1778, which alone relates to this subject, so far from stipulating for the sale of prizes in the ports of either nation, limits itself to a declaration, that the captors shall have liberty to bring them into port, free from duties, arrests and searches, and to depart with them to the places expressed in their commissions, thereby evidently contemplating the then existing regulations of this nation. France has manifested her own opinion on this subject, in her treaty with Great Britain of the 26th of September, 1786. The 16th article of that treaty declares, "that it shall not be lawful for foreign cruisers who shall not be the subjects of one or the other crown, and who shall have a commission from any Prince or State, enemies of the one or the other, to arm their vessels in the ports of one or the other of the said two kingdoms, to sell there what they shall have taken, or to change the same in any manner whatever." In a war with England, then, France being neutral, the cruisers of the United States are forbidden to sell their prizes in the ports of this republic. The 17th article of the treaty of February, 1778, being reciprocal, France has pronounced her decision, that it does not give her cruisers a right to sell their prizes in the ports of America. If this right had been given by the treaty of February, 1778, that between the United States and England could not be construed to impair it. Nor is the prohibition a departure from the neutrality of the United States. A nation to violate its neutrality must manifest a partiality for one of the belligerent Powers, must accord favors not stipulated by pre-existing treaties to one, which it refuses to the other. This is not even alleged in the present instance. Far from permitting British cruisers to sell, in the United States, prizes they have made on the French, they are not even allowed to bring them into port. A candid consideration of this subject will prove that the withdrawal of a favor, the grant of which manifested so strongly the attachments of the United States, far from justifying the resentments which have been expressed in consequence of it, can only be attributed to the solicitude of the American Government to render perfectly unexceptionable its observance of that neutrality which it professes to maintain. It has been shown unequivocally to have been the opinion of the contracting parties that the treaty of commerce of the 6th of February, 1778, did not give to either, being at war, a right to sell its prizes in the ports of the other being at peace. It is not pretended that this is one of the rights accruing, without special stipulation, under the laws and usages of nations.

It is not, then, a right at all. If granted, it is a voluntary favor. But a voluntary favor essential in the prosecution of the war, if granted by a neutral to one belligerent Power, and of necessity refused to the other, affords to that other at least a more plausible pretext for complaint than has been given by any other act of the Government of the United States. What, in such a situation, would have been the language of France? Would this republic permit a neutral nation, not bound thereto by any obligation whatever, to allow in its ports, as a voluntary favor, the sale of prizes made on French citizens, while the same favor was of necessity denied to the cruisers of France.

It is believed that such a use of neutrality would not be permitted, and the undersigned felicitate themselves and their country that the Government they represent has never intentionally given to this republic any cause of dissatisfaction, as serious as this would have been. You will not fail to observe, citizen minister, that this heavy accusation, when analyzed, is nothing more than the refusal of a mere favor on the part of the American Government, the grant of which might have been dangerous to itself, might have drawn it from that neutral station which it is its duty to observe, and which favor France had previously, in the most explicit terms, declared its determination not to grant under similar circumstances to the United States.

2dly. Your second allegation is, "that the journals known to be indirectly under the control of the cabinet have redoubled their invectives and calumnies against the republic, its magistrates, and its envoys; and that pamphlets openly paid for by the minister of Great Britain have re-produced, under every form, those insults and calumnies, without having ever drawn the attention of the Government to a state of things so scandalous, and which it might have repressed."

The genius of the constitution, and the opinions of the people of the United States, cannot be overruled by those who administer the Government. Among those principles deemed sacred in America; among those sacred rights considered as forming the bulwark of their liberty, which the Government contemplates with awful reverence, and would approach only with the most cautious circumspection, there is no one of which the importance is more deeply impressed on the public mind than the liberty of the press. That this liberty is often carried to excess, that it has sometimes degenerated into licentiousness, is seen and lamented; but the remedy has not yet been discovered. Perhaps it is an evil inseparable from the good with which it is allied: perhaps it is a shoot which cannot be stripped from the stalk, without wounding vitally the plant from which it is torn. However desirable those measures might be which might correct without enslaving the press, they have never yet been devised in America. No regulations exist which enable the Government to suppress whatever calumnies or invectives any individual may choose to offer to the public eye; or to punish such calumnies and invectives, otherwise than by a legal prosecution in courts which are alike open to all who consider themselves as injured. Without doubt this abuse of a valuable privilege is matter of peculiar regret when it is extended to the Government of a foreign nation. The undersigned are persuaded it never has been so extended with the approbation of the Government of the United States. Discussions respecting the conduct of foreign Powers, especially on points respecting the rights and interests of America, are unavoidably made in a nation where public measures are the results of public opinion; and certainly do not furnish cause of reproach; but it is believed that calumny and invective have never been substituted for the manly reasoning of an enlightened and injured people, without giving pain to those who administer the affairs of the Union. Certainly this offence, if it be deemed by France of sufficient magnitude to be worthy of notice, has not been confined to this republic. It has been still more profusely lavished on its enemies, and has even been bestowed with an unsparing hand on the Federal Government itself. Nothing can be more notorious than the calumnies and invectives with which the wisest measures and the most virtuous characters of the United States have been pursued and traduced. It is a calamity incident to the nature of liberty, and which can produce no serious evil to France. It is a calamity occasioned neither by the direct nor indirect influence of the American Government. In fact that Government is believed to exercise no influence over any press. You must be sensible, citizen minister, with how much truth the same complaint might be urged on the part of the United States. You must know well, what degrading and unworthy calumnies against their Government, its principles, and its officers, have been published to the world by French journalists and in French pamphlets: that Government has even been charged with betraying the best interests of the nation, with having put itself under the guidance of, nay more, with having sold itself to, a foreign court. But these calumnies, atrocious as they are, have never constituted a subject of complaint against France. Had not other causes, infinitely more serious and weighty, interrupted the harmony of the two republics, it would still have remained unimpaired, and the mission of the undersigned would never have been rendered necessary.

3dly. You complain of the speech of the President made to Congress in May last. It denounces, you say, the Executive Directory, as searching to propagate anarchy and division in the United States. The constitution of the United States imposes on the President this important duty: "He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union." It having been deemed proper to recall the minister from the United States to this republic, and to replace him by a citizen, the objects of whose mission, as expressed in his letters of credence, were "to maintain that good understanding, which, from the commencement of the alliance, had subsisted between the two nations; and to efface unfavorable impressions, banish suspicions, and to restore that cordiality which was at once the evidence and pledge of a friendly union." The President of the Directory addressed the recalled minister in the following terms: "In presenting to-day to the Executive Directory your letters of recall, you give to Europe a strange spectacle. France, rich in her liberty, surrounded with the train of her victories, strong in the esteem of her allies, will not abase herself by calculating the consequences of the condescension of the American Government to the suggestions of its ancient tyrants. The French republic hopes, moreover, that the successors of Columbus, Raleigh, and Penn, always proud of their liberty, will never forget that they owe it to France. They will weigh in their wisdom the magnanimous good will of the French people with the crafty caresses of certain perfidious persons, who meditate to bring them back to their ancient slavery. Assure, Mr. minister, the good American people that, like them, we adore liberty; that they will always have our esteem, and that they will find in the French people that republican generosity, which knows as well how to grant peace as to cause its sovereignty to be respected."

The change of a minister is an ordinary act for which no Government is accountable to another, and which has not heretofore been "a strange spectacle" in France, or in any other part of Europe. It appears to be a measure not of itself calculated to draw on the Government making such change the strictures or the resentments of the nation to which the minister is deputed. Such an effect, produced by so inadequate a cause, could not fail to command attention, while it excited surprise.

This official speech, addressed by the Government of France to that of the United States, through its minister, charges that Government with condescensions to the suggestions of its ancient tyrants, speaks of the crafty caresses of certain perfidious persons who meditate to bring back the successors of Columbus, Raleigh, and Penn, to their ancient slavery, and desires the minister to assure, not his Government, but the good people of America, that they will always have the esteem of France, and that they will find in the French people that republican generosity which knows as well how to grant peace as to cause its sovereignty to be respected.

That a minister should carry any assurances from a foreign Government to the people of his nation is as remarkable as the difference between the manner in which his Government and his people are addressed. His Government are charged with condescension to the suggestions of the ancient tyrants of his country, but the people are considered as loving liberty, and they are to be assured of the perpetual esteem of France. This esteem they are to weigh against the crafty caresses of those perfidious persons who meditate to bring them back to their former slavery.

When this speech, thus addressed directly to the Government and people of the United States, in the face of Europe and the world, came to be considered in connexion with other measures; when it came to be considered in connexion with the wide spreading devastation to which their commerce was subjected, with the cruel severities practised on their seamen, with the recall of the minister of France from the United States, and the very extraordinary manner in which that recall was signified by him both to the Government and people, with the refusal even to hear the messenger of peace, deputed from the United States for the sole purpose of conciliation, it could not fail to make on the American mind a deep and serious impression. It was considered as a fact too important to be held from the Congress, by that department of the Government, which is charged with the duties of maintaining its intercourse with foreign nations, and of making communications to the legislature of the Union. The President, therefore, did communicate it in the following words: "With this conduct of the French Government, it will be proper to take into view the public audience given to the late minister of the United States on his taking leave of the Executive Directory. The speech of the President discloses sentiments more alarming than the refusal of a minister, because more dangerous to our independence and union, and at the same time studiously marked with indignities towards the Government of the United States. It evinces a disposition to separate the people of the United States from the Government; to persuade them that they have different affections, principles, and interests from those of their fellow citizens, whom they themselves have chosen to manage their common concerns, and thus to produce divisions fatal to our peace. Such attempts ought to be repelled with a decision which shall convince France and the world, that we are not a degraded people, humiliated under a colonial spirit of fear and sense of inferiority, fitted to be the miserable instruments of foreign influence, and regardless of national honor, character, and interest.

"I should have been happy to have thrown a veil over these transactions, if it had been possible to conceal them; but they have passed on the great theatre of the world, in the face of all Europe and America, and with such circumstances of publicity and solemnity, that they cannot be disguised, and will not soon be forgotten; they have inflicted a wound in the American breast. It is my sincere desire, however, that it may be healed."

It is hoped that this communication will be viewed in its true light; that it will no longer be considered as a denunciation of the Executive Directory, but as the statement of an all-important fact by one department of the American Government to another, the making of which was enjoined by duties of the highest obligation.

The undersigned have now, citizen minister, passed through the complaints you urge against the Government of the United States. They have endeavored to consider those complaints impartially, and to weigh them in the scales of justice and of truth. If any of them be well founded, France herself could not demand more readily than America would make reparation for the injury sustained. The President of the United States has said, "If we have committed errors, and these can be demonstrated, we shall be willing to correct them; if we have done injuries, we shall be willing, on conviction, to redress them." These dispositions on the part of the Government have been felt in all their force by the undersigned, and have constantly regulated their conduct.

The undersigned will not resume, citizen minister, the painful task of re-urging the multiplied injuries which have been accumulated on their country, and which have been in some degree detailed in their memorial of the 17th January last. They cannot, however, decline to remonstrate against a measure which has been announced since that date. The legislative councils of the French republic have decreed that,

1st. The condition of ships, in every thing which concerns their character as neutrals or enemies, shall be determined by their cargo; consequently, every vessel found at sea, laden in whole or in part with merchandise coming out of England, or its possessions, shall be declared good prize, whoever may be the proprietors of such commodities or merchandise.

2dly. No foreign vessel, which in the course of its voyage shall have entered into an English port, shall be admitted into any port of the French republic, but in the case of necessity; in which case, such vessel shall be obliged to depart from such port so soon as the cause of entry shall have ceased.

This decree too deeply affects the interests of the United States to remain unattended to by their ministers. They pray you, therefore, citizen minister, to receive their respectful representations concerning it.

The object of the decree is, to cut off all direct intercourse between neutrals and Great Britain, or its possessions, and to prevent the acquisition, even by circuitous commerce, of those articles which come from England or its dominions.

The right of one nation to exchange with another the surplus produce of its labor, for those articles which may supply its wants or administer to its comfort, is too essential to have been ever classed among those admitted to be in any degree doubtful. It is a right in ceding which a nation would cede the privilege of regulating its own interests, and providing for its own welfare. When any two nations shall choose to make war on each other, they have never been considered, nor can they be considered as thereby authorizing themselves to impair the essential rights of those who may choose to remain at peace. Consequently, these rights, the free exercise of which is essential to its interests and welfare, must be retained by a neutral Power, whatever nations may be involved in a war.

The right of a belligerent to restrain a neutral from assisting his enemy by supplying him with those articles which are defined as contraband, has been universally submitted to; but to cut off all intercourse between neutrals and an enemy; to declare that any single article which may have come from the possessions of an enemy, whoever may be its owner, shall of itself be sufficient to condemn both vessel and cargo, is to exercise a control over the conduct of neutrals, which war can never give, and which is alike incompatible with their dignity and their welfare.

The rights of belligerents are the same. If this might be exercised by one, so might it be exercised by every other. If it might be exercised in the present, so it might be exercised in every future war. This decree is, therefore, on the part of France, the practical assertion of a principle which would destroy all direct or circuitous commerce between belligerent and neutral Powers, which would often interrupt the business of a large portion of the world, and withdraw or change the employment of a very considerable portion of the human race.

This is not all. It is the exercise of a power which war is not admitted to give, and which, therefore, may be assumed in peace as well as war.

It essentially affects the internal economy of nations, and deranges that course of industry which they have a right to pursue, and on which their prosperity depends.

To acquiesce, therefore, in the existing state of things, under a principle so extensive and so pernicious, is to establish a precedent for national degradation which can never cease to apply, and which will authorize any measures which power may be disposed to practise.

France, therefore, will perceive that neutral Governments, whatever may be their disposition towards this republic, are impelled by duties of the highest obligation, to remonstrate against a decree, which at the same time invades their interests and their independence, which takes from them the profits of an honest and lawful industry, as well as the inestimable privilege of conducting their own affairs as their own judgments may direct.

It is hoped that the remonstrances of the United States on this subject will derive additional force from their subsisting engagements with France, and from a situation peculiar to themselves.

The twenty-third article of the treaty of amity and commerce, of the 6th of February, 1778, is in these words: "It shall be lawful for all and singular the subjects of the Most Christian King, and the citizens, people, and inhabitants of the said United States, to sail with their ships, with all manner of liberty and security, no distinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandises laden thereon, from any port to the places of those who now are, or hereafter shall be, at enmity with the Most Christian King or the United States. It shall likewise be lawful for the subjects and inhabitants aforesaid, to sail with the ships and merchandises aforementioned, and to trade with the same liberty and security from the places, ports, and havens, of those who are enemies of both or either party, without any opposition or disturbance whatsoever, not only directly from the places of the enemy beforementioned, to neutral places, but also from one place, belonging to an enemy, to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurisdiction of the same prince, or under several. And it is hereby stipulated, that free ships shall also give a freedom to goods, and that every thing shall be deemed to be free and exempt, which shall be found on board the ships belonging to the subjects of either of the confederates, although the whole lading, or any part thereof, should appertain to the enemies of either—contraband goods being always excepted. It is also agreed, in like manner, that the same liberty be extended to persons who are on board a free ship, with this effect, that, although they be enemies to both or either party, they are not to be taken out of that free ship, unless they are soldiers, and in actual service of the enemy."

The two nations, contemplating and providing for the case when one may be at war, and the other at peace, solemnly stipulate and pledge themselves to each other, that, in such an event, the subjects or citizens of the party at peace may freely trade with the enemy of the other, may freely sail with their ships, in all manner of security, to and from any port or place belonging to such enemy, Not only goods coming from the hostile territory, but the very goods of the enemy himself may be carried with safety in the vessels of either of the contracting parties.

You will perceive, citizen minister, without requiring the undersigned to execute the painful task of drawing the contrast, how openly and entirely the decree of the councils opposes itself to the treaty between France and the United States.

In addition to the hitherto unceded rights of a sovereign and independent sovereign, in addition to the right stipulated by contract, the undersigned will respectfully submit other considerations growing out of the peculiar situation of the United States, manifesting the particular hardships the decree complained of must impose on them.

In possession of a rich, extensive, and unsettled country, the labor of the United States is not yet sufficient for the full cultivation of its soil, and, consequently, but a very small portion of it can have been applied to manufactures. Articles of the first necessity and comfort are imported, in exchange for provisions and for the raw materials which are the growth of the country, and which its inhabitants are accustomed to raise.

It is at any time extremely difficult, nor is it practicable without great loss, to change suddenly the habits of a whole people, and that course of industry in which their population and their real interests have engaged them. An agricultural cannot suddenly, and at will, become a manufacturing people—the United States cannot instantaneously, on the mere passing of a decree, transfer to the manufacturer of articles heretofore imported such a portion of their labor as will, at the same time, furnish a market for the surplus commodities, and a supply for the wants of the cultivator of the soil. It is, therefore, scarcely possible for them to surrender their foreign commerce.

Independent of the right they possess, in common with others, to search for and choose the best markets, it is believed that the supplies they need could with difficulty, in the actual state of the world, be completely furnished, without the aid of England and its possessions. It is not pretended that France manufactures, at present, for foreign consumption, nor do the undersigned suppose that there exists a market where the citizens of the United States can obtain in exchange the articles they need and are accustomed to consume, if those coming out of England and its possessions be entirely excluded. A variety of other considerations, and especially the difficulties individuals must encounter in suddenly breaking old and forming new connexions, in forcing all their commerce into channels not yet well explored, in trading without a sufficient capital to countries where they have no credit, combine to render almost impossible an immediate dissolution of commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain.

If, then, the decree complained of shall be executed on American vessels, it can only increase grievances already but too considerable, and transfer the carriage of English manufactures, for American consumption, from their own to British bottoms, sailing under the protection of a convoy. Instead of wounding England, it will probably aggrandize its marine, by sacrificing the remnant of that of the United States, and by destroying that system of policy by which they have heretofore sought to give their own vessels that portion of their own carrying trade, which would otherwise be enjoyed by British merchants.

You have made some general animadversions on the Government of the United States, which the undersigned feel themselves bound briefly to notice.

You have charged that Government with giving instructions not in the sincere intention of arriving at pacific results, and yet the undersigned have offered to change those clauses in the treaty of 1778 which have become inconvenient to France, and to repair any injuries which may have been committed.

You have charged that Government with omitting nothing to prolong and augment the misunderstanding between the two republics; but does not the fact that the undersigned are now in Paris furnish persuasive evidence to the contrary?

You have charged it with searching to justify, by deceitful appearances, the prejudices with which it surrounds at pleasure the name of the republic, and the system of exasperation and separation pursued in this respect with the strangest obstinacy. But has not this republic, in terms the most cordial, been again and again entreated to enter into a candid investigation of the mutual complaints of the two nations? Have not these entreaties been unnoticed, whilst the ministers deputed to make them have remained unaccredited?

You have charged with wishing to seize the first favorable occasion for consummating an intimate union with a power, towards which a devotion and partiality are professed which have long constituted the principle of the conduct of the Federal Government; but whilst no devotion or partiality has been expressed for any nation except France, have not the United States made, and are they not still making, the most extraordinary efforts to restore the broken relations between the two republics?

In a letter discussing the important interests of two great nations, the undersigned are unwilling to introduce what relates personally to themselves.

This unwished for task has been rendered a duty, by ascribing to them opinions and relations which exist in imagination only, and by adducing those supposed opinions and relations as proofs of an indisposition, on the part of the Government which has deputed them, towards that accommodation which has been sought so unremittingly through all those difficulties and impediments with which the pursuit has been embarrassed.

You are pleased to add, that these intentions are so little disguised "that nothing seems to have been neglected at Philadelphia, to manifest them to every eye. It is probably with this view that it has been judged proper to send to the French republic persons whose opinions and relations are too well known to hope from them dispositions sincerely conciliatory."

The opinions and relations of the undersigned are purely American, unmixed with any particle of foreign tint.

If they possess a quality on which they pride themselves, it is an attachment to the happiness and welfare of their country; if they could at will select the means of manifesting that attachment, it would be by effecting a sincere and real accommodation between France and the United States on principles promoting the interests of both, and consistent with the independence of the latter.

It requires no assurance to convince, that every real American must wish sincerely to extricate his country from the ills it suffers, and from the greater ills with which it is threatened; but all who love liberty must admit that it does not exist in a nation which cannot exercise the right of maintaining its neutrality. If "opinions and relations," such as these, are incompatible with "dispositions sincerely conciliatory," then indeed has the Federal Government chosen unfit instruments for the expression of its pacific disposition.

You contrast the conduct observed by the United States, under analogous circumstances, towards the cabinet of St. James's, with that which is observed towards this republic. You say that, on that occasion, there was a solicitude to send to London ministers well known to possess sentiments conformable to the objects of their mission; that the republic has a right to count upon a similar deference; and that if a like attention has not been observed with respect to it, it is too probable that it must be attributed to the views already indicated.

If, unfortunately, the cases shall exhibit a constrast, it is not to be found in the characters the United States have thought proper to employ, or in the conduct of their Government, otherwise than by the superior attention manifested towards this republic, and never shown to any other nation, in deputing to it, with ample powers, three envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary from the three great divisions of the United States. The ministers sent to the cabinet of St. James's greatly deserved the confidence of their country; but they did not possess sentiments more conformable to the objects of their mission than those deputed to this republic. They did not wish more ardently to effect reconciliation; nor is it believed that any person who could have been deputed to that cabinet would have submitted to greater sacrifices in order to obtain it. Had their application for compensation for past injuries, and security against their future commission, been only met by requisitions, a compliance with which would involve their nation in ills, of which war perhaps might not be the most considerable; had all attempts to remove unfavorable impressions failed, and all offers to make explanations been rejected; can it be believed, that other ministers (the first having been ordered out of the nation) would have waited six months unaccredited, soliciting permission to display the upright principles on which their Government had acted, and the amicable sentiments by which it was animated?

The undersigned are induced, citizen minister, to pray your attention to these plain truths, from a conviction that they manifest unequivocally the friendly temper of the Federal Government, and the extreme reluctance with which the hope of an accommodation with France would be relinquished.

The undersigned observe, with infinite regret, that the disposition manifested to treat with the minister who might be selected by this Government, is not accompanied with any assurances of receding from those demands of money, heretofore made the considerations on which alone the cessation of hostility, on American commerce, could be obtained; to which the undersigned have not the power to accede; with which the United States would find it extremely difficult to comply; and a compliance with which would violate that faith pledged for the observance of neutrality; and would involve them in a disastrous war, with which they have no concern. Nor do you answer to the applications which have been made for compensation to the citizens of the United States, for property which shall be proved to have been taken contrary to the law of nations and existing treaties, otherwise than that you are willing to discuss cases where there has been a departure from certain principles, which principles, in fact, involve almost every case.

You have signified, citizen minister, that the Executive Directory is disposed to treat with one of the envoys, and you hope that this overture will not be attended, on the part of the undersigned, with any serious difficulty. Every proposition of the Executive Directory is considered with the most minute and respectful attention.

The result of a deliberation, on this point, is that no one of the undersigned is authorized to take upon himself a negotiation, evidently intrusted by the tenor of their powers and instructions to the whole: nor are there any two of them who can propose to withdraw themselves from the task committed to them by their Government, while there remains a possibility of performing it.

It is hoped that the prejudices, said to have been conceived against the ministers of the United States, will be dissipated by the truths they have stated.

If in this hope they shall be disappointed, and it should be the will of the Directory to order passports for the whole, or any number of them, you will please to accompany such passports with letters of safe conduct, which will entirely protect, from the cruisers of France, the vessels in which they may respectively sail, and give to their persons, suite, and property, that perfect security to which the laws and usages of nations entitle them.

They pray you, citizen minister, to receive the renewal of their assurances of profound respect and consideration.

JOHN MARSHALL,

HENRY M. RUTLEDGE, Secretary.

5th Congress.] No. 144. [2d Session.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JUNE 21, 1798.

United States, June 21, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

While I congratulate you on the arrival of General Marshall, one of our late envoys extraordinary to the French republic, at a place of safety, where he is justly held in honor, I think it my duty to communicate to you a letter, received by him, from Mr. Gerry, the only one of the three who has not received his congé: this letter, together with another, from the Minister of Foreign Relations to him, of the 3d of April, and his answer of the 4th, will show the situation in which he remains, his intentions, and prospects.

I presume that, before this time, he has received fresh instructions (a copy of which accompanies this message) to consent to no loans; and therefore the negotiation may be considered at an end.

I will never send another minister to France without assurances that he will be received, respected, and honored, as the representative of a great, free, powerful, and independent nation.

JOHN ADAMS.

Paris, April 16, 1798.

My Dear Sir:

This I expect you will receive by my colleague, General Marshall, who carries with him the last letter of M. Talleyrand to the American envoys, and their answer. On the day when we sent the answer, I received a letter from the minister, a copy of which, and my answer, is enclosed. I have not sent these to the Secretary of State, because I have not time to prepare a letter to accompany them. Indeed I expected my passport with my colleagues; but am informed the Directory will not consent to my leaving France: and to bring on an immediate rupture, by adopting this measure, contrary to their wishes, would be in my mind unwarrantable. The object of M. Talleyrand, you will perceive, was to resume our reciprocal communications, and again to discuss the subject of a loan. I thought it best in my answer not merely to object to this, but to every measure that could have a tendency to draw me into a negotiation. I accepted of this mission, my dear sir, to support your administration, and have brought myself into a predicament,* which you must assist me to extricate myself from, by appointing some others to supply the places of myself and colleagues, if a further progress in this business should be found practicable. I have only a moment to add my best respects to your lady, and my assurances of the most sincere and respectful attachment, my dear sir, of yours sincerely,

* I allude to my painful residence here as a political cipher.

E. GERRY.

The PRESIDENT of the United States.

The Minister of Foreign Relations to Mr. Gerry, Envoy Extraordinary of the United States of America to the French republic.

PARIS, the 14 Germinal, (3d April, 1798*)*
6th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

I suppose, sir, that Messrs. Pinckney and Marshall have thought it useful and proper, in consequence of the intimations given in the end of my note of the 28th Ventose last, and the obstacle which their known opinions have interposed to the desired reconciliation, to quit the territory of the republic. On this supposition, I have the honor to point out to you the 5th or the 7th of this decade, to resume our reciprocal communications upon the interests of the French republic and the United States of America.

Receive, I pray you, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Mr. Gerry to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic.

PARIS, April 4, 1798, (Germinal 15, an 6.)

I had the honor, citizen minister, of receiving your letter of the 14th Germinal the 3d instant and Mr. Deutrement, who delivered it, informed me that it was intended to be shown to General Pinckney and General Marshall.

Whilst my colleagues and myself, to whom the Government of the United States have intrusted the affairs of the embassy, had a joint agency therein, I have carefully imparted to them all the propositions which you have requested, and the relative conferences and to yourself our decisions thereon; regretting, at the same time, the unfortunate and embarrassing circumstances which imposed on me this disagreeable task. But as, by the tenor of your letter, it is now expected that they will quit the territory of the French republic, it will be impossible for me to be the medium of, or to take, any measures which will be painful to my colleagues, or not to afford them all the assistance in my power; and it would be moreover inconsistent with the line of conduct which you well know, citizen minister, I have uniformly observed for removing the unfavorable impressions which existed on the part of this Government against them: indeed, in our last letter there is a conditional application for passports, which, as it appears to me. supersedes the necessity of a hint to them on this subject; and General Marshall is waiting impatiently for an answer to that part of it which respects a letter of safe conduct for the vessel, in which he and his suite may take passage for the United States, to determine whether he shall embark from France or Great Britain; but the unfo tunate situation of General Pinckney, with respect to the critical state of his daughter's health, renders it utterly impossible for him to depart under existing circumstances.

You have proposed, citizen minister, the 5th or 7th of this decade for me to resume (reprendre) our reciprocal communications upon the interests of the French republic and of the United States. The reciprocal communications which we have had were such only as I have alluded to in the beginning of this letter, unless your proposition, accompanied with an injunction of secrecy, for me to treat separately, is considered in this light. To resume this subject will be unavailing, because the measure, for the reasons which I then urged, is utterly impracticable. I can only then confer informally and unaccredited on any subject respecting our mission, and communicate to the Government of the United States the result of such conferences, being in my individual capacity unauthorized to give them an official stamp. Nevertheless, every measure in my power, and in conformity with the duty I owe my country, shall be zealously pursued, to restore harmony and a cordial friendship between the two republics. I had the honor of calling on you last evening for the purpose of making this communication verbally, but as you were absent, to prevent misconceptions I have thought it best to reduce it to writing.

Accept, I pray you, citizen minister, assurances of my perfect esteem and respect.

E. GERRY.

To Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall, and Elbridge Gerry, Esquires, Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the French republic.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Philadelphia, March 23, 1798.

GENTLEMEN:

On the 4th instant came to hand your first despatches since you arrived at Paris; these were your numbers 1, 4, and 5; and on the 6th instant, your numbers 2 and 3 were received. On the 5th, your number 5, dated the 8th of January, and a translation of the message of January 4th from the Directory to the council of five hundred, were laid before Congress. In this letter you "repeat, that there exists no hope of your being officially received by that Government, or that the objects of your mission will be in any way accomplished." This opinion is sanctioned by the whole tenor of your communications; and we trust that soon after the date of your number 5, you closed your mission by demanding passports to leave the territories of the French republic.

An official copy of your letters of credence having been delivered to the minister for foreign affairs, and by him laid before the Directory, they were sufficiently informed of the great objects of your mission; and considering that you were an extraordinary delegation from an independent nation, you had a right to expect a prompt and respectful reception. The fair and honorable views of the American Government, which dictated your appointment and your powers, entitled you to expect the early appointment of a commission, by the French Government, with equal powers, to negotiate on all matters in controversy between them. Had the French Government been influenced by similar views, the object, of your mission would long since have been accomplished, to the advantage and peace of both nations. But instead of coming forward on such equal and proper ground, they have treated you, and through you your country, with extreme neglect.

Under these circumstances, the President presumes that you have long since quitted Paris and the French dominions; yet, actuated as you were with an ardent desire to preserve peace, which you knew would be so grateful to your country; and having for this object manifested unexampled patience, and submitted to a series of mortifications; as you also proposed to make one more direct attempt, subsequent to the date of your last letter, to draw the French Government to an open negotiation; there is a bare possibility that this last effort may have succeeded: the President, therefore, thinks it proper to direct—

1. That if you are in treaty, with persons duly authorized by the Directory, on the subjects of your mission, then you are to remain and expedite the completion of the treaty, if it should not have been concluded. Before this letter gets to hand, you will have ascertained whether the negotiation is or is not conducted with candor on the part of the French Government: and if you shall have discovered a clear design to procrastinate, you are to break off the negotiation, demand your passports, and return. For you will consider that suspense is ruinous to the essential interests of your country.

2. That if, on the receipt of this letter, you shall not have been received, or, whether received or not, if you shall not be in treaty with persons duly authorized by the Directory, with full and equal powers, you are to demand your passports and return.

3. In noevent is a treaty to be purchased with money, by loan or otherwise. There can be no safety in a treaty so obtained. A loan to the republic would violate our neutrality: and a douceur to the men now in power might by their successors be urged as a reason for annulling the treaty, or as a precedent for further and repeated demands.

It is proper to apprize you, that a motion has been made in the Senate, and will doubtless be repeated in the House of Representatives, to desire the President to lay before them your communications; and he will probably be under the necessity of doing it: only withholding the two names which you promised should in no event be made public.

I have the honor to be, &c.

EMIGRANTS FROM THE WEST INDIES.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JUNE 27, 1798.

UNITED STATES, June 27, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate and
Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I have received a letter from his excellency Thomas Mifflin, Governor of Pennsylvania, enclosing some documents, which I judge it my duty to lay before Congress without loss of time.

As my opinion coincides entirely with that of his excellency the Governor, I recommend the subject to the consideration of both Houses of Congress, whose authority alone appears to me adequate to the occasion.

JOHN ADAMS.

PHILADELPHIA, June 27, 1798.

SIR:

I think it proper to inform your excellency that, on the evacuation of Port-au-Prince by the British troops, a very great number of French white men and negroes were put on board of transports and sent to America. Some of the vessels, I understand, made an attempt to land their passengers at Charleston; two have arrived at this port, and it is said that the remainder of the fleet may be daily expected in some of our harbors. To prevent, as far as I can, the obvious danger from such an importation at this crisis, I have determined, with the advice of the attorney general, and other State officers, to prohibit the landing of any French negroes, arriving at the port of Philadelphia in vessels under the circumstances which I have stated: but the limited jurisdiction of Pennsylvania, the facility with which our regulations may be evaded, by disembarking the negroes in any adjacent State, and, perhaps, the necessity of extending the prohibition to white men, induce me to submit the subject to your consideration, and to request such a co-operation of the Federal authority as your excellency may deem expedient for the general safety.

I have added to this communication copies of the documents containing the information that I have received.

I have the honor to be, with perfect consideration and respect,
Sir, your excellency's most obedient humble servant,

THO. MIFFLIN.

To his Excellency JOHN ADAMS, Esq.
President of the United States.

HEALTH OFFICE, June 26, 1798.

SIR:

I am directed by the board of managers of the marine and city hospitals of the port and city of Philadelphia to transmit to you, for the information of the Governor, the enclosed resolution of the board, and a copy of the letter therein mentioned.

I am, sir, yours, very respectfully,

WILLIAM JONES, President.

HEALTH OFFICE, June 26, 1798.

At a meeting of the board of managers of the marine and city hospitals of the port and city of Philadelphia, the President read a letter addressed to him, from David Pinkerton, a passenger in the ship Josephus, from Jeremie, now under quarantine, containing important information respecting the great influx of people from the West Indies: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit a copy of said letter to the Secretary of the Commonwealth, for the information of the Governor.

By order of the board of managers.

Attest:

WILLIAM JONES, President.

TIMOTHY PAXON, Clerk.

SHIP JOSEPHUS, FORT MIFFLIN, June 26, 1798.

SIR:

Doctor Hall has this day communicated to us the resolution of the board of health respecting passengers from the West Indies; I think it would be highly proper for the Government, at this critical moment, not even to admit the landing of any French passengers whatever in the United States; there, no doubt, are some men of principle among them, but be assured that the far greatest part of those already arrived are fully ripe for any turn which we take with respect to France. There has a great many gone to the Southern States, and many were preparing to come with the next fleet. I think I should not be far wrong in saying they will exceed four thousand souls; many without any funds, and some with a considerable number of slaves, that have all been trained to arms, and have them with them, and attached to their master's interests: if any measures could be had for sending them away, it would greatly add to the security of our country.

With esteem, I am your obedient servant,

DAVID PINKERTON.

Captain WILLIAM JONES.

I certify that the foregoing are true copies of the originals.

GENERAL WASHINGTON'S ACCEPTANCE AS COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, JULY 18, 1798.

UNITED STATES, July 17, 1798.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Believing that the letter received this morning from General Washington will give high satisfaction to the Senate, I transmit them a copy of it, and congratulate them and the public on this great event—the General's acceptance of his appointment as Lieutenant General and Commander-in-chief of the army.

JOHN ADAMS.

MOUNT VERNON, 13*th July*, 1798.

DEAR SIR:

I had the honor, on the evening of the 11th instant, to receive, from the hands of the Secretary of War, your favor of the 7th, announcing that you had, with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed me "Lieutenant General and Commander-in-chief of all the armies raised or to be raised for the service of the United States."

I cannot express how greatly affected I am at this new proof of public confidence, and the highly flattering manner in which you have been pleased to make the communication; at the same time, I must not conceal from you my earnest wish that the choice had fallen upon a man less declined in years, and better qualified to encounter the usual vicissitudes of war.

You know, sir, what calculation I had made relative to the probable course of events, on my retiring from office, and the determination I had consoled myself with, of closing the remnant of my days in my present peaceful abode; you will, therefore, be at no loss to conceive and appreciate the sensations I must have experienced to bring my mind to any conclusion that would pledge me, at so late a period of life, to leave scenes I sincerely love, to enter upon the boundless field of public action, incessant trouble, and high responsibility.

It was not possible for me to remain ignorant of, or indifferent to, recent transactions. The conduct of the Directory of France towards our country; their insidious hostility to its Government; their various practices to withdraw the affections of the people from it; the evident tendency of their acts, and those of their agents, to countenance and invigorate opposition; their disregard of solemn treaties and the laws of nations; their war upon our defenceless commerce; their treatment of our ministers of peace; and their demands amounting to tribute; could not fail to excite in me corresponding sentiments with those my countrymen have so generally expressed in their affectionate addresses to you. Believe me, sir, no one can more cordially approve of the wise and prudent measures of your administration. They ought to inspire universal confidence, and will, no doubt, combined with the state of things, call from Congress such laws and means as will enable you to meet the full force and extent of the crisis.

Satisfied, therefore, that you have sincerely wished and endeavored to avert war, and exhausted to the last drop the cup of reconciliation, we can, with pure hearts, appeal to Heaven for the justice of our cause, and may confidently trust the final result to that kind Providence who has heretofore, and so often, signally favored the people of these United States.

Thinking in this manner, and feeling how incumbent it is upon every person, of every description, to contribute at all times to his country's welfare, and especially in a moment like the present, when every thing we hold dear and sacred is so seriously threatened, I have finally determined to accept the commission of Commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, with the reserve only, that I shall not be called into the field until the army is in a situation to require my presence, or it becomes indispensable by the urgency of circumstances.

In making this reservation, I beg it to be understood, that I do not mean to withhold any assistance to arrange and organize the army, which you may think I can afford. I take the liberty also to mention, that I must decline having my acceptance considered as drawing after it any immediate charge upon the public, or that I can receive any emoluments annexed to the appointment, before entering into a situation to incur expense.

The Secretary of War being anxious to return to the seat of Government, I have detained him no longer than was necessary to a full communication upon the several points he had in charge.

With very great respect and consideration, I have the honor to be, dear sir, your most obedient humble servant,

G. WASHINGTON.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 147. [2d SESSION.

GREAT BRITAIN.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 8, 1799.

UNITED STATES, January 8, 1799.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In compliance with your desire, expressed in your resolution of the second of this month, I lay before you an extract of a letter from George C. Morton, acting consul of the United States, at the Havanna, dated the 18th of November, 1798, to the Secretary of State, with a copy of a letter from him to L. Trezevant and William Timmons, esquires, with their answer. Although your request extends no further than such information as has been received, yet it may be a satisfaction to you to know, that as soon as this intelligence was communicated to me, circular orders were given by my direction to all the commanders of our vessels of war, a copy of which is also herewith transmitted. I also directed this intelligence and these orders to be communicated to His Britannic Majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States, and to our minister plenipotentiary to the court of Great Britain, with instructions to him to make the proper representation to that Government upon this subject.

It is but justice to say, that this is the first instance of misbehavior of any of the British officers towards our vessels of war, that has come to my knowledge. According to all the representations that I have seen, the flag of the United States, and their officers and men, have been treated by the civil and military authority of the British nation, in Nova Scotia, the West India Islands, and on the ocean, with uniform civility, politeness, and friendship. I have no doubt that this first instance of misconduct will be readily corrected.

JOHN ADAMS.

Extract of a letter from George C. Morton, acting Consul of the United States at the Havanna, dated there the 18th of November, 1798, to the Secretary of State.

"By the delegation of Daniel Hawley, Esq. I am at present acting as consul of the United States in this district, with which he will most probably have acquainted you. It imposes upon me the mortifying task of informing you, sir, of the partial capture of an American fleet, under the convoy of the Baltimore sloop of war, —— Phillips, Esq. commander, by a British squadron, off this harbor, accompanied with circumstances rather grating to the feelings of Americans, and by no means analogous to that good harmony which seems to subsist between the two Governments.

"The answer of Messrs. Trezevant and Timmons to my annexed note of the 17th instant, requesting an exact relation of the occurrence, will, I presume, be deemed as impartial a narration as can be given, of the whole transaction, they having been passengers on board one of the captured vessels, and removed to the Baltimore."

Mr. Morton adds, that Commodore Loring ordered the fifty-five men out of the Baltimore, "on board of his ship, previous to any proposal of exchanging the natives of one nation for those of the other; and retained five of the hands as being British subjects, without giving an equal number of Americans, whom he acknowledged to have on board."

Mr. Morton to L. Trezevant and W. Timmons, Esquires.

HAVANNA, November 17, 1798.

GENTLEMEN:

As acting American consul for this city and district, and of course obliged to forward the most correct statement possible to the Government of the United States, officially, I would beg the favor of you, gentlemen, to furnish me with an exact relation, under your signatures, of the unpleasant occurrence which took place off the Moro Castle on the 16th instant, by which you will much oblige, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

GEO. C. MORTON.

N. B. It would be proper to premise that you were passengers, and your distance from the Moro Castle at the time of capture.

G. C. M.

HAVANNA, November 18, 1798.

SIR:

Agreeably to your request, we now commit to writing the best account we are able to give you, of the conduct of Captain Loring, commodore of the British squadron, which was lately off the Moro, towards the United States ship the Baltimore. We must observe, however, that all we can say of it is from the information of Captain Phillips, as we were not on board of the Baltimore when she was visited by Captain Loring's officers.

In the morning of the 16th instant we discovered this squadron when we were in sight of the Moro, and afterwards found it was composed of Captain Loring's ship the Carnatic of 74 guns; Captain ——'s ship the Thunderer, of the same force; Captain Dobson's ship the Queen, 98 guns; Captain Donolly's frigate the Maidstone, 32 guns, and Captain Hardy's frigate the Greyhound, of the same force. We were passengers in the brig Norfolk, Captain Butler, which, together with the ship Eliza, Captain Baas, and the brig Friendship, Captain Fuller, were cut off from their entrance into port, and were all made prizes within gunshot of the Moro. We obtained leave to go on board the Baltimore with our baggage, and did so. When Captain Phillips discovered that they were English ships, which was before we were taken, he stood towards them, and spoke the commodore. After we got on board the Baltimore, the captain informed us that he had been on board the Carnatic, and the commodore had told him that he should take out of the Baltimore all such men as had not American protections; that he had remonstrated with him against showing such an indignity to our flag; that to do so would leave his ship in a very defenceless state, and would deprive him of nearly all his men, as not even those who were really Americans, or at least very few of them, could show protections, because it was always thought that our flag on board a Government ship was a sufficient protection. All this, however, was urged in vain. Captain Phillips returned to his ship, and the commodore sent an officer on board the Baltimore, who carried away fifty-five of her men to the Carnatic. Captain Phillips remained in expectation that nearly all the rest would be taken from him; but whether the commodore, upon reflection, thought better of it, or whatever else might have been his motive, he sent back fifty, and kept five, among whom was the ship's boatswain.

Captain Loring proposed to give up a number of American seamen, who, he said, were in his fleet, if Captain Phillips would give him English subjects for them. Captain Phillips refused this offer, and the American seamen were not delivered to him. Before any of the men were returned, he sent a message to Captain Phillips to let him know if he, or one of his officers, would go on board of him, and point out who were Americans and who were not, he would return all the Americans; but this was declined also. After we got on board of the Baltimore, he sent a letter to Captain Phillips, which he showed us, in which the commodore "demanded" that he would give up all the British subjects on board the Baltimore. To this Captain Phillips replied, that he could not know any of his men as British subjects, nor could he, as commander of a ship in the service of the United States, voluntarily give up any of his men; but if he thought fit to send an officer on board with orders to take any number of his men, he should not oppose it. In this answer, Captain Phillips mentioned he should lay before the Executive of the United States a full account of the occurrences of the day. Shortly after sending this reply, the squadron set sail and left the Baltimore. Commodore Loring was very polite to us, and was so to Captain Phillips when he went on board; but Captain Phillips complained of indecent behavior from the inferior officers.

LEWIS TREZEVANT,
WM. TIMMONS.

G. C. MORTON, Esq. V. Consul of U. S. at Havanna.

(CIRCULAR.)

To the Commanders of armed vessels in the service of the United States, given at the Navy Department, December 29, 1798.

SIR:

It is the positive command of the President, that on no pretence whatever you permit the public vessel of war under your command to be detained, or searched, nor any of the officers or men belonging to her to be taken from her, by the ships or vessels of any foreign nation, so long as you are in a capacity to repel such outrage on the honor of the American flag. If force should be exerted to compel your submission, you are to resist that force to the utmost of your power, and when overpowered by superior force, you are to strike your flag, and thus yield your vessel as well as your men; but never your men without your vessel.

You will remember, however, that your demeanor be respectful and friendly to the vessels and people of all nations in amity with the United States, and that you avoid as carefully the commission of, as the submission to, insult or injury.

I have the honor to be, &c.

BEN. STODDERT.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 148. [2d SESSION.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 18, 1799.

Gentlemen of the Senate and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

UNITED STATES, January 18, 1799,

The communication relative to our affairs with France, alluded to in my address to both Houses, at the opening of the session, is contained in the sheets which accompany this. A report of the Secretary of State, containing some observations on them, will be sent to Congress on Monday.

JOHN ADAMS.

Letter from the Secretary of State to Mr. Gerry, dated

JUNE 25, 1798.

SIR:

By the instructions dated the 23d of March, which, agreeably to the President's directions, I addressed to Generals Pinckney and Marshall and yourself, and of which six sets were transmitted, one by a despatch boat sent on purpose, and some of which doubtless reached you during the last month, you will have seen that it was expected that all of you would have left France long before those instructions could arrive, and which were transmitted rather from abundant caution than necessity, seeing no probability or hope existed that you would accomplish the object of your mission. The respect due to yourselves and to your country irresistibly required that you should turn your backs to a Government that treated both with contempt—a contempt not diminished, but aggravated, by the flattering but insidious distinction in your favor, in disparagement of men of such respectable talents, untainted honor, and pure patriotism, as Generals Pinckney and Marshall, and in whom their Government and their country reposed entire confidence; and especially when the real object of that distinction was to enable the French Government, trampling on the authority and dignity of our own, to designate an envoy with whom they would condescend to negotiate. It is, therefore, to be regretted that you did not concur with your colleagues in demanding passports to quit the territories of the French republic some time before they left Paris.

General Marshall has arrived, and delivered to the President your letter of April 16th, with its enclosures; all which were on the 21st instant laid before Congress, accompanied by a message, in which the President declares the negotiation at an end, and that "he will never send another minister to France, without assurances that he will be received, respected, and honored as the representative of a great, free, powerful, and independent nation."

It is presumed that you will consider the instructions of the 23d of March before mentioned as an effectual recall; lest, however, by any possibility, those instructions should not have reached you, and you should still be in France, I am directed by the President to transmit to you this letter, and to inform you that you are to consider it as a positive letter of recall.

I am, respectfully, sir, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

MR. GERRY'S COMMUNICATIONS.

NANTASKET ROAD, October 1, 1798.

SIR:

I have the honor to inform you of my arrival here this morning in the brigantine Sophia, Captain Geddes, from Havre, but last from Portsmouth in Great Britain; and to enclose copies of my letters to yourself of the 12th and 13th of May last, Nos. 1 and 2; of the correspondence between Mr. Talleyrand, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, and myself, numbered according to the respective dates, from 3 to 28 inclusively; of an arrêt enclosed in his last letter, No. 29; of my letter to Mr. Hautval, and his answer, Nos. 30 and 31; of my letter to Mr. King, our minister at London, and an extract to Dr. Taswell, the bearer thereof, Nos. 32 and 33; also the substance of a conference with the Dutch minister a day or two before I left Paris, No. 34; and an anonymous publication "on the President's communication" of our despatches, said to have issued from the French office of foreign affairs, No. 35.

When I left the United States in August, 1797, the citizens, in general, appeared to be earnestly desirous of a reconciliation with France, on terms consistent with the honor, interest, and welfare, of the two republics: these, being free from claims and controversies in regard to territory, boundaries, and many matters which embroil States, and from competitions relative to their productions, manufactures, and commerce, had a mutual and manifest interest in the renewal of their commercial and friendly intercourse with each other. Nature seemed to have entitled the United States, in their remote situation, to the peaceable pursuit of their industry, by means whereof, in its various branches, their wealth and power were rapidly increasing; and to an exemption from the conflicts of Europe, which, involving them, would check their population, drain their resources, and ensure their poverty. On a candid investigation, then, of the causes of the unhappy differences between the two Governments, on a disposition to correct errors, to which all Governments are more or less liable, and on their mutual resolution to reciprocate justice, the success of the mission was conceived to depend; and as this temper marked the plan of pacification adopted by the Government of the United States, there was a rational prospect of success.

Soon after our arrival in Paris, the scene was changed, and the hope of a reconciliation being diminished, the necessity of harmony in the United States was proportionably increased, as the only means for preserving their welfare and independence at home, their rights and respectability abroad. In case of a war, there was every reason to believe that they would be able to defend themselves against any nation or coalition that could be formed against them; whilst their citizens should consider the Government, chosen by themselves, as the pole star of their salvation; should rally round its standard, when raised for their defence; should rise superior to foreign intrigues, always expert in fomenting divisions, and often aided by popular elections, legislative debates, and clashing opinions and interests; and should promote unanimity, by toleration amongst themselves. Nevertheless, the critical state of our affairs required that France should not be furnished with pretexts for charging the American Government or ministers with neglect of means for obtaining a reconciliation.

When the Minister of Foreign Affairs, in October last, unauthorized by the Executive Directory, as Mr. Y. had informed the envoys, to have any communications with them, had expressed a desire to see them in their private capacities, I was opposed to a compliance individually, not from considerations of etiquette, which had no weight in my mind, but because it would infer in me a separate agency in matters wherein I was but jointly authorized. To prevent, however, the imputation of a failure of the negotiation, then daily expected, to the United States, I submitted to the measure, was unsuccessful in my attempts to make it general, and was thereby subjected to a series of embarrassments.

The particular attentions of the minister to me, lest they should be invidious, were in every instance but two declined, and in one of these I yielded to importunity: preferences I viewed as a source of division.

The second conference which I held with the minister, being on the 17th of December, and his propositions to the envoys, were published with their despatches. Their answer, which was unanimously in the negative, was delivered by me to his secretary. Mr. Y. had expected it, and expressed a surprise that the secretary had applied for it.

On the 4th of February, the minister, by order of the Executive Directory, proposed that I should treat separately. The circumstances thereof, and of my refusal, are generally detailed in the correspondence enclosed.

The minister afterwards desired me, by his secretary, to communicate to the other envoys his proposition for a loan subsequent to the war, which he soon relinquished. On this subject, our first instructions were silent; the last were explicit, and necessary to determine my judgment.

In consequence of his letter to the envoys, of the 28th Ventose, (18th of March) the minister renewed his proposition for me to treat separately, and again received a negative answer. He then proposed that I should remain at Paris until the sense of the Government could be obtained; declaring, as before, that an immediate rupture would be the consequence of my departure. To have left France, under such circumstances, was a measure which I could not justify. The power of declaring war was not entrusted with the supreme Executive of the United States, much less with a minister; and to have thus provoked it would, in my mind, have been tantamount to a declaration thereof. Indeed, to have plunged the nation into a war suddenly, even if it was inevitable, appeared to me, in other respects, unwarrantable. Congress, who alone had the right to adopt this measure, might, by such a premature step, have been defeated in their previous arrangements, and subjected to other manifest inconveniences; and the Executive might have been placed on ground less advantageous for forming alliances, &c.: whereas, my detention at Paris gained time, if this was requisite, and could not procrastinate a declaration of war, if the United States were prepared for it. Other considerations had their weight. France, at that time, was making very formidable preparations, with a professed design to overthrow the British Government: and such were the exertions and enthusiasm of her citizens, armies, and administration, as to spread a general alarm throughout Great Britain. It was evident, then, to common observation, that, should France succeed, she would acquire, by the powerful navy and resources of Britain, such strength as to be able to give law to Europe, and to regions more remote; and it was rational to suppose that a coalition would be formed of such European Powers as were not in the interest or under the influence of France, to put an end to the war, by offering their mediation, and declaring their intention to oppose the Power which should refuse it: the temporizing negotiations at Rastadt had this aspect. Moreover the internal affairs of France were in an agitated state, and threatened civil commotions. If, then, on the one hand, a new coalition against France, a change in her Government, or even a successful resistance on the part of Great Britain, had happened, a favorable opportunity would have presented itself to the United States for obtaining of her a just and advantageous treaty; and this would have been lost by a previous rupture in consequence of my departure. If, on the other hand, Great Britain, unaided, had fallen, the United States would have been in a much better condition at peace than in war with the most formidable Power the world had exhibited. In such an event, they could have had but small hopes of resisting France; and it might have been deemed madness in them even to have attempted it. For these reasons, I thought it my indispensable duty to remain a short time at Paris.

The tenor of our instructions, the last as well as the first, shows that the Government did not anticipate the proposition for treating separately, and made no provision for such an event. The French minister has uniformly insisted that I had power to treat; because, in the instrument, he saw that the envoys had a separate and joint authority. If the position could be established, it would authorize a foreign Government, at pleasure, to reduce the number of a commission consisting of two or more members, and thus to deprive the constituting Government of the joint abilities of its ministers; or absurdly to insist on a separate negotiation with each minister, and to choose from their several treaties that which should best answer its purpose: besides, in case of the misconduct of ministers, their Government has a right to expect information thereof, and an opportunity of substituting others in their stead; but I trust that the arguments stated in the correspondence enclosed are sufficient to show that the power to treat did not exist; or, if it did, that I was justified, under existing circumstances, in refusing to exercise it.

On the 3d of April, I received the minister's note, No. 3; and, apprehending that he proposed to draw me into a negotiation, notwithstanding my resolution to the contrary, I sent him an answer on the 4th of April, (No. 4) to which he made no reply.

On the 20th of April, considering the unpleasant situation in which I was placed, detached from the other envoys, destitute of power to negotiate, irreconcileable to an application for it, and even to an acceptance of it, if offered, I addressed to the minister the letter No. 5, urged him to come forward with propositions for a reconciliation, and to release me from my confinement.

At our next interview, on the 28th of April, the minister informed me that he could not comply with my proposals; not knowing the views of the United States in regard to a treaty. To remove this obstacle, I gave the information, and in it the fullest extent to the claims of the American citizens against France, but I was silent with respect to the guarantee of the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance, and to what relates to the Barbary Powers; and left it with him, in the first instance, to provide for a liberal commerce to the French colonies in the East and West Indies, and to express the views of France in regard to the proposed treaty. We afterwards conferred on the necessity of sending a French minister to the United States; and he promised to deliver me, within three or four days, the project of a treaty. On the evening of the 12th May, Mr. Humphreys arrived, and delivered me your letter of the 23d March, which, the next morning, was deciphered. Our Government could not then have been apprized of the new state of affairs; but, as it had signified "that suspense was ruinous," I thought myself authorized to give immediate information to the Minister of Foreign Affairs that I should return to America in the Sophia, as soon as she could be fitted for the sea, and that it was necessary to expedite the measures we had contemplated for effecting a treaty. The Executive Directory, as well as the minister, had, it was said, during the three preceding weeks, been indispensably occupied by the new elections; and these being finished, they could now proceed on American affairs: had the latter required more time than I had allotted for them, I was determined to have detained the Sophia a short period, rather than to have defeated the proposed arrangements. This I considered as my duty: for, whilst the Government manifested, in their instructions, a just indignation at the treatment which their envoys had received, it evinced a disposition to peace, and, as far as I could judge, the same temper now existed on the part of France.

On the 24th May, the minister sent the principal secretary of his bureau, to inform me that his Government did not wish to break the British treaty, but expected in the new treaty such provisions as would indemnify France, and put her on a footing with that nation. To this I answered that the information gave me pleasure; that it was impossible for the United States, by violating that treaty, to become perfidious; that the treaty itself was an evidence of their good faith, inasmuch as it contained a provision "that it should not be construed or operate contrary to former and existing public treaties with other sovereigns or States;" that, if in its construction or operation, France had sustained injuries, still she was sure of redress by the provisions thereof, as well as by her own treaty with the United States, and that the latter ensured to her an extension of favors, in regard to commerce and navigation, if any such had been granted to Great Britain.

He said there was a second point, which respected the claims of American citizens on the French republic; that, if the latter should not be able to pay them, when adjusted, and the United States would assume, and pay them, France would reimburse the amount thereof. To this I answered, that the measure was impossible, but, that the claims might be adjusted, funded, and made transferable by France, and be redeemed, pursuant to such stipulations as might be agreed on between the two Governments.

He then stated a third point, which respected the consular convention. I answered, that perhaps it would be best, as its duration would be short, to let it expire. But if the present war should soon terminate, and commerce revive in France, it may be well to revise it, in order to prevent further disputes respecting the evidence for apprehending deserters, the judicial officers for issuing warrants, and the mode of executing consular decisions, stating, at the same time, that foreign tribunals could never be admitted within the jurisdiction of the United States. The secretary reported the conference, and informed me, the next morning, that the minister would send me his answer, in writing, in a few days.

On the 26th May I had a conference with the minister, the substance of which is stated in my letter, No. 24. Having pressed, on this, as well as former occasions, the necessity of sending a minister to the United States, he now readily acceded to it; this would have enabled France to relax from any stipulations which she might have urged there, but which might be found by her minister in the United States, to endanger the treaty.

In this state were affairs on the 27th May, when I was called on by one of the city gazettes, which announced the publication of our despatches, to deny their authenticity. Having reason to suppose that the result of this new embarrassment, if not pacific, would be very violent, I prepared for the event, being obliged to abide the consequences.

On the 30th May, I received from the minister his letter No. 6; and returned, for answer, No. 7. In this I repeated what was published in our despatches, that X and Y had not produced a document of any kind, for authorizing their conference with us. I was not disposed to accuse or exculpate the French Government, or minister: the latter had disavowed the intriguers, as they were styled, and they, in their conferences with us, had declared that they were not authorized by the Government. The matter was, therefore, left with the public, as it had been referred to their tribunal.

On the 1st of June, the minister sent me his letter No. 8, and I desired to know of the bearer why application was again made to me for the names of the intriguers, when they could be otherwise ascertained. He answered, that he believed, by the exertions of the bureau and of the police of the city, the names were discovered, and he mentioned them to me. But, he added, that matters had become very serious; that the Directory expected something from me, in confirmation of this discovery; that this was the use which would be made of my letters; and, that the minister did not wish for any declaration from me, but what should be perfectly consistent with truth. I assured him that no extremity should produce from me any other declaration, and sent the minister my letter, No. 10. In this I guarded against the publication, on my authority, of the names thus communicated, and did justice to certain individuals, who, being suspected, were, nevertheless, innocent.

On the 7th June, the publication, No. 35, appeared in the Redacteur. In this, contrary to assurances received, I was made to act a very conspicuous part, and was attacked under a thin veil of insidious compliments: the cause thereof was the detail, in the despatches, of my particular conferences. The next day I prepared a letter to the minister for detecting the artifices, and correcting the abuses of that curious performance. But having considered that it might open a door to altercation and delay, if not defeat the great object in view, or produce a mere disavowal of the anonymous publication, which, afterwards, was made in No. 21, I suppressed the letter, and, on the 10th June, addressed to him No. 13. In this, availing myself of the pacific declaration contained in the strictures, I urged the expedition of pacific measures, as a requisite to their success.

On the 11th of June I received from the minister No. 14, in which, as he had informed my secretary, he revived the disagreeable subject of the despatches; and he concluded by formally demanding whether I was in a situation to treat. Every circumstance concurred now to prove that the despatches had excited the resentment of the minister against the Government, as well as myself, and had changed his plan in regard to the United States.

On the 13th June I answered that letter, by No. 15; and, on the 20th, received a reply, No. 16. In this, the minister, in lieu of the proposed plan of a treaty, presented a general plan of negotiation, notwithstanding, as he stated it, "my persevering to think my powers were inadequate," and "the most irritating provocations;" by the first "point" of this plan, a door would have been open to endless altercations respecting the supposed abuse of the French Government, by private writings, public acts of the United States, official letters, and the despatches of the envoys: by the second point, the sense of the treaties was to be fixed, and the rights flowing therefrom were to be established; and, by the third point, the damages of deviations from the treaties were to be examined: he then stated that "very general instructions were necessary for the negotiations; and proposed that I should apply for them. Very general indeed must the instructions have been, to have negotiated on such a plan as this: and it was impossible to view it in any other light than that of an evasion of the arrangements proposed. It was easy to have pointed out the misinterpretations and misrepresentations, as well as the impolicy of the plan; but I was under the necessity of avoiding this, or of entering into a formal negotiation. To allure me into it, was, probably, the object of the minister: for soon afterwards he invited me to discuss, in writing, some articles of the second point. In my answer, therefore, of the 22d June, (No. 17) I merely observed that, "if he conceived a reconciliation would be best promoted by his mode only, I sincerely wished it success."

On the 29th June, I received the minister's letter, No. 19; in which, after relaxing from the first point of his general plan, and suggesting that the third would not meet with much difficulty, as soon as the second should be amicably adjusted, he, for the first time, proposed that I should discuss in writing some articles of the treaty comprised under the second point. Nearly three months had then elapsed since I had declared I could only confer with him informally on the objects of the mission; nearly two months since he was informed of the views of the United States in regard to a treaty, and had promised to come forward in a few days with the project thereof; and six weeks since I had apprized him of my intention to embark in the Sophia. As then a compliance with his wishes would have given a sanction, not only to his departure from the plan we had agreed on for forming an arrangement, but also to the measure adopted by his Government, of accrediting, at pleasure, the whole or a part only of a commission; and as I had frequently demanded my passport, by letters, as well as by my secretary, I passed in silence his proposition for discussion, as a measure he well knew was inadmissible, and urged, in my letter of the 1st of July, No. 20, in a more decided tone, the demand for the passport, &c.

On the 5th July, not having received an answer to my last, I called on the minister, to know the cause of his detaining my passport, and to give him an opportunity, before my departure, of removing the obstacles to a plan of pacification. He began by observing that, in a note accompanying his last letter, he had stated two points respecting the consular convention, expecting that I would discuss them, as he had done, but I had not taken any notice of them; that I had said I had no powers. He had powers; and, of consequence, I should not compromit my State, whilst he would compromit his; that I might take the discussion to the United States, and my Government might judge of it; that when my colleagues were here, the Government could not treat with them; that when they were sent off, it was ready to treat with me; that, although I had no powers, I might send for them; or, remaining there, might give my Government an opportunity of sending other ministers, if I did not choose to proceed in the business; that in this there would be no responsibility on my part; that there were but a few points for discussion, which might soon be finished; and that, if a war was the consequence of my leaving the country, it would be chargeable to me. To which I replied, that the last proposition of the Directory for me to treat, was one which I had before rejected; that, in April last, he knew I would only confer on the subjects of the mission, and made no objection to the measure; that, on the 29th June, after my baggage was on board, and I was ready to embark, he first proposed a discussion in writing of the articles of the treaty; that I considered this, however qualified, as a formal mode of negotiation, which I had uniformly declined; that, had he brought forward, as he had proposed, the plan of a treaty, and in it comprised the articles which I had stated, we might have passed on it expeditiously, and might have made it acceptable to both Governments; that the most important parts might have been first considered, and, if not adjusted, might have precluded the necessity of passing on the rest; that, in addition to the objection already stated to his mode, it commenced with the consular convention, which would soon expire; that, should we agree on this, and on the lesser points of the commercial treaty, he may reserve to the last the weighty articles thereof; and, failing in these, we might waste several months by a fruitless negotiation; that, should we unite in all the points which he has suggested, his mode of discussion would require several months; that the loss of time, by these or other means, might compromit the Government of the United States, and myself likewise; that, if a war should be the consequence of his departing from the plan we had agreed on for obtaining a treaty, he would be chargeable as the cause of it. The minister said the mode he had proposed was generally adopted by France. I replied, the other was not unusual, and, in the present case, was preferable, if not indispensable. He observed that the notes which I had lent him, respecting the views of the United States, were informal. I answered it was true, but that I would remove that difficulty. He then proposed the 7th July for another interview; but afterwards put it off till the ninth. On the 6th I reduced the notes to form, for constituting a part of the treaty.

On the 9th of July I called on the minister, and he inquired whether I had received his letter of that morning. I answered in the negative, and desired to know the contents. He replied, a discussion of two other points of the consular convention, on which I want your opinion in writing. I informed him that I had stated the views of the United States without discussion, and expected the same of him on the part of France; that when this was done, I would proceed to a conference on each point, but not to an epistolary discussion; that such a mode would require, of diligent negotiation, three months, and with his official engagements, double that time. He said, no; that it would not require as much time as I had conceived; that there were at most but six other points. On your side, I replied, but many on ours. He answered, "pas d'avantage," none besides. I said that I was glad to hear it; but to such a discussion as he proposed, I should prefer treating effectually. Some of the conversation was repeated which we had on the 7th, and I renewed my demand for the passport. He answered, that my refusal to discuss must first be given in writing, and we parted. This is the substance of the two interviews.

On the same day I received the letter mentioned at the interview, No. 21, dated the 18th Messidor, (6th July) in which, speaking of his general plan in No. 16, he says, "but it is not sufficient to send these propositions to your Government; they are only the basis of discussions, necessary on each question of detail, the solution of which we ought to find;" although in the last mentioned number he had said, in reference to them, "I am persuaded that you will transmit to your Government exact documents: it will be its province to take the best measures for accomplishing a speedy reconciliation." In the letter first mentioned, the minister also observes, "I have apprized you that it would be inconvenient to charge with this discussion a minister plenipotentiary at Philadelphia. Circumstances have rendered this inconvenience more serious, and I do not conceal from you, that I fear new incidents." The fact was, as I ascertained to my satisfaction, that, after the arrival of the despatches and other intelligence from the United States, the Executive Directory apprehended, if a minister was sent there, that he would not be accredited; and that overtures, or any plan unaccompanied by a minister, would meet a similar fate.

On the 10th July, in my letter, No. 22, I refused an epistolary discussion; and demanded a definite answer to my application for a passport and other documents.

On the 15th July I received the minister's letter of the 24th Messidor, (the 12th July) No. 23, in which he appeals to me for the truth of his assertion, "that, if nothing had prevented me from pursuing with him the examination of the grievances which separate the two countries, we should have needed nothing more than their respective ratifications." Before the arrival of the despatches of the envoys, the minister appeared to me sincere and anxious to obtain a reconciliation. He had proposed, by his secretary, an assumption of the debts due to American citizens, which I rejected; but he had made no other proposition of a loan whatever, and never renewed that. Indeed, his views in general, as far as I could then ascertain them, were liberal in regard to a treaty. It is, nevertheless, impossible for me to determine whether we should have united in opinion on every point of dispute between the republics. I had a full expectation that, by the middle of June at farthest, we should have agreed on the plan of a treaty; and that a French minister would have been sent to America for completing it. I was likewise informed of the candidate. But after the arrival of the despatches, although the minister, in the name of the Executive Directory, declared that they persevered in their pacific intentions, he, probably for the reasons stated in explaining, No. 21, abandoned the plan we had at first agreed on, substituted a general plan of negotiation, discussed some articles thereof in writing, and insisted, contrary to stipulations, on my answering him in the same mode. At this period, a reconciliation being quite problematical, one of his objects evidently was to prepare materials for a manifesto, in the event of a war, to show that it was a matter of necessity, and not of choice. He says, "that after the arrival of the Sophia, I was disposed to depart; till that time, he had never conceived that I had a design to embark, before we should have agreed on the definitive articles to be ratified by my Government." Before and after the arrival of the Sophia, I had announced my intention to embark early in June; conceiving that the arrangements might be made by that period. I had no design, however, of departing before they were completed: provided, there should have been no reason to doubt of the minister's disposition, or of the success of our endeavors for obtaining a reconciliation. His general conduct would have been the criterion of the first, and our progress in this business, of the last point; but having abandoned our original plan, he has not given me an opportunity to judge effectually of either.

On the 20th of July, I sent the minister No 24, and received, on the 22d, his reply, No. 25. In this he declines a contest in regard to the facts stated by me in No. 24, which I was ready to support: he complains of my proposition for lopping from any future negotiation every preliminary of a loan, and of explanations upon speeches; and refers to his letter of the 30th of Prairial, No. 16, to prove that this step was unnecessary. But, although the first point of his plan in that letter is silent on these demands, they might, as I conceived, be hereafter revived, and were, for this reason, brought again into view: by these means they were effectually renounced.

The minister having, the day before I left Paris, published his letter, No. 23, rendered necessary the publication of my answer, No. 24, and the note, No. 26, as a preliminary thereto.

On the 8th of August I received at Havre, the minister's letter, No. 27, to which No. 28 is an answer: the former contained the arrêté No. 29; and his desire to send it by the Sophia probably produced the official impediments which, for several days, prevented her sailing. The minister is unwilling to admit that the arrêté was the effect of my representations: I believe there is no doubt of the fact; but it is a matter of little consequence.

Nos. 30 and 31 will show that Mr. Hautval, in his letter to the minister, relative to our first interview, committed some errors, and candidly corrected them.

Nos. 32 and 33 require no explanation.

No. 34 will show the object of the Dutch minister in his conference with me, and requires no comment. I was before informed that this gentleman, if requested, would interpose his good offices, but did not think it proper to make the application.

No. 35 has already been the subject of some general remarks.

To No. 9 a verbal answer was sent by the minister, that the letters and despatches therein mentioned "had never reached the Government."

On the 26th of July, I left Paris; and, from the best information which I could obtain relative to the disposition of the Executive Directory, (for I never had any direct communication with them) they were very desirous of a reconciliation between the republics. Every impediment to my departure had been adopted by the French minister: and he would have prevented it, had he succeeded in his plan of an epistolary discussion. His object was, as I conceived, to gain time for ascertaining whether the United States were then disposed to a treaty; of this he manifested doubts, being persuaded that their resentment was too great to admit of it. He seemed also to apprehend that, in consequence of the incredible exertions of Great Britain, and the unequivocal evidence she had given of her ability to defend herself, they were inclined to avenge their injuries by an alliance with her; and that, should France come forward with overtures, or the plan of a treaty, she would fail therein, and compromit her honor I was, nevertheless, of opinion that, should France be just and liberal in her measures, the Government ofthe United States would still meet her on the ground of accommodation. My judgment was the result of their instructions: for I had never received any other official intelligence since my departure from America; I have, therefore, uniformly inculcated that sentiment.

Having been thus in a situation wherein, amidst a series of events, each has been productive of fresh embarrassments, I have invariably pursued what to me appeared the honor, interest, and welfare, of my country, and been guided by the sense of the Government, as far as I could ascertain it.

If the door is still open to peace, the establishment of it must be a happy event to the United States, as it will exempt them from calamities, which, notwithstanding delusive appearances, will, with short intervals, probably continue, for half a century, to exhaust and depopulate Europe.

But, if the national pulse beats high for war, and the wise and constitutional councils of the United States shall consider it as the only safe and honorable alternative, may that Omnipotent Being, who controls events, protect them; and may they commence the war with ardor, continue it with vigor, and terminate it with glory. That this will be the issue there can be no doubt, whilst the American republic shall choose UNION for her MOTTO; and profiting by the misfortunes of other nations, shall be convinced that discord will ensure dependence, and concord independence in war and peace.

I shall, probably, when at leisure, give you some other details of less consequence, and, in the interim,

Remain, sir, with much esteem and respect, your very humble servant,

E. GERRY.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq. Secretary of State of the United States.

No. 1.

PARIS, May 12, 1798.

SIR:

Being informed that Messrs. Prince and Brownfield, who expected to sail in the same ship with General Marshall, are yet at Bordeaux, I embrace the only favorable opportunity which has occurred, since his departure, to enclose you a copy of a note, which I received from M. Talleyrand, Minister of Foreign Relations, dated the 14th Germinal, (April 3d) of my answer of the 4th of April, and of my letter of the 20th of the same month, being the day after General Pinckney left Paris. I had intended to have sent Dr. Tazewell, who is now in my family as secretary, with my despatches to our Government, that no time might be lost in obtaining from it such arrangements for supplying my place as might have enabled me, immediately on his return, to leave France; but the measure is become unnecessary, by the prospect which I have of being able soon to embark for the United States, with the acquiescence of this Government.

The decision of the Executive Directory with respect to my colleagues, after we had obtained what we had been informed, in our first conference with Mr. Bellamy, was impracticable, a joint interview with the Minister of Foreign Relations, and, after the latter had seemed disposed to suspend matters until we could obtain from our Government an answer to our letters, was not less perplexing than surprising; and their proposition to treat with me separately was inadmissible. It was a proposition to which I had given my negative above a month before, when made to me, under an injunction of secrecy, by the Minister of Foreign Relations. I was then informed that an immediate rupture would be the result of my departure from France; and the same communication being again made, with information that, if I was determined not to negotiate separately, this Government would be satisfied with my residence here, until the Government of the United States could take their measures, I consented to this, from public considerations solely: for every private one was opposed to it. In my embarrassed situation, not losing sight of the great object of our mission, a reconciliation with this powerful republic, I have taken a position, by which I mean to ascertain, if possible, without compromitting the Government of the United States or myself, the ultimate views of France with respect to them. It would have been impossible for me, under existing circumstances, to have consented to a separate negotiation, had the provision been made in our powers and instructions: for two of my colleagues, one from the Southern, and the other from the Middle States, having been sent back, I could have had no prospect of forming a treaty which would have given general satisfaction to my country; and I could never have undertaken any negotiation without that prospect. It is therefore incumbent on me to declare that, should the result of my present endeavors present to our Government more pleasing prospects, it is, nevertheless, my firm determination to proceed no further in this negotiation. The want of time and health preventing further communications at present,

I have the honor to remain, sir, with great esteem and respect, your most obedient, &c.

E. GERRY.

PARIS, May 13, 1798.

DEAR SIR:

I have the honor to inform you that the brigantine Sophia arrived at Havre the 11th instant; and last evening, at the moment of enclosing my despatches to you of yesterday, Mr. Humphreys delivered me your letter of instructions of the 23d of March, which shall be duly observed. The arrival of this vessel is a fortunate circumstance for me, and I shall embark in her for the United States, in lieu of taking my passage, as I had proposed, in one of the American merchantmen, now in the ports of France. The ultimate views of this Government, which their minister has promised in writing in a few days, shall be obtained if possible.

I am, sir, &c.

LIBERTY. EQUALITY.

EXTERIOR RELATION'S OFFICE, PARIS, 14th Germinal, April 3, 1798,
6th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Gerry, Envoy Extraordinary of the United States of America to the French republic.

I suppose, sir, that Messrs. Pinckney and Marshall have thought it useful and proper, in consequence of the intimations which the end of my note of the 28th of last Ventose [18th March, 1798] presents, and the obstacle which their known opinions have induced to the desired reconciliation, to quit the territory of the republic. In this supposition I have the honor to point out to you the fifth or the seventh of this decade, to resume our reciprocal communications upon the interests of the French republic and the United States of America.

Receive, I pray you, &c.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

No. 4.

PARIS, April 4, 1798. (Germinal 15*th, an* 6.)

I had the honor, citizen minister, of receiving your letter of the 14th Germinal, (the 3d instant) and Mr. Deutrement, who delivered it, informed me that it was intended to be shown to General Pinckney and General Marshall.

Whilst my colleagues and myself, to whom the Government of the United States have intrusted the affairs of the embassy, had a joint agency therein, I have carefully imparted to them all the propositions which you have requested, and the relative conferences, and to yourself our decisions thereon; regretting, at the same time, the unfortunate and embarrassing circumstances which imposed on me this disagreeable task. But as, by the tenor of your letter, it is now expected that they will quit the territory of the French republic, it will be impossible for me to be the medium of, or to take, any measures which will be painful to my colleagues, or not to afford them all the assistance in my power; and it would be moreover inconsistent with the line of conduct, which you well know, citizen minister, I have uniformly observed, for removing the unfavorable impressions which existed on the part of this Government against them. Indeed, in our last letter, there is a conditional application for passports, which, as it appears to me, supersedes the necessity of a hint to them on this subject; and General Marshall is waiting impatiently for an answer to that part of it which respects a letter of safe conduct, for the vessel in which he and his suite may take passage for the United States, to determine whether he shall embark from France or from Great Britain; but the unfortunate situation of General Pinckney, with respect to the critical state of his daughter's health, renders it utterly impossible for him to depart under existing circumstances.

You have proposed, citizen minister, the fifth or seventh of this decade for me to resume (reprendre) our reciprocal communications, upon the interests of the French republic and of the United States. The reciprocal communications which we have had were such only as I have alluded to in the beginning of this letter, unless your proposition, accompanied with an injunction of secrecy, for me to treat separately, is considered in that light. To resume this subject will be unavailing, because the measure, for the reasons which I then urged, is utterly impracticable. I can only then confer informally and unaccredited, on any subject respecting our mission, and communicate to the Government of the United States the result of such conferences, being, in my individual capacity, unauthorized to give them an official stamp. Nevertheless, every measure in my power, and in conformity with the duty I owe to my country, shall be zealously pursued to restore harmony and cordial friendship between the two republics. I had the honor of calling on you last evening, for the purpose of making this communication verbally; but, as you were absent, to prevent misconceptions, I have thought it best to reduce it to writing.

Accept, I pray you, citizen minister, the assurances of my perfect esteem and respect.

E. GERRY.

To the MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS of the French republic.

No. 5.

PARIS, April 20, 1798. (1 Floreal, an 6.)

CITIZEN MINISTER:

My colleagues having been under the necessity of departing from Paris, have left me in the most painful situation; as it respects themselves, the Government and nation, which I had the honor with them to represent, and my personal circumstances. The alternatives presented to my choice were the continuance of my residence here, or an immediate rupture on my departure; I have chosen the former, prompted by every consideration of the duty I owed my country.

The object of this Government, in my remaining here, as announced in your official note of the 14th Germinal, (3d April) was "to resume our reciprocal communications on the interests of the French republic and of the United States." My answer informed you that "I could only confer informally and unaccredited, on any subject respecting our mission, and communicate to the Government of the United States the result of such conferences, being, in my individual capacity, unauthorized to give them an official stamp." This, then, I consider as the line of conduct well understood to be observed on my part; and, in the present state of affairs, citizen minister, I flatter myself that propositions for terminating all differences for the restoration of harmony and friendship, and for the re-establishment of commerce between the United States and France will be promptly made on the part of the latter; that they will be such as, corresponding with the justice and magnanimity of this great nation, and with sound policy, will ensure success; that I shall have an opportunity of soon embarking for the United States, and presenting them to my Government for their consideration; and that all further depredations on our commerce, by French cruisers, will, in the interim, be prohibited. If, in forming this arrangement, I can render any services, you may be always sure of my immediate and cheerful co-operation.

Measures like these will at once extinguish those coals of discord which, kindled into a flame, must be destructive of the respective interests of the two republics; will not only restore but increase, if possible, their former confidence, and terminate in a competition for excelling each other in mutual acts of generosity and kindness.

In any event, citizen minister, I flatter myself it will not be thought necessary for me to remain long in France, as the state of my family and affairs requires my immediate return to the United States; and as their consul general will continue his residence here, which, pending negotiation, will answer every political purpose. I pray you, citizen minister, to accept the assurances of my most perfect esteem and regard.

PARIS, 11*th Prairial, 6th year of the republic, one and indivisible,* (May 30, 1798.)

I communicate to you, sir, a London Gazette, of the 26th of last Floreal [May 15, 1798.] You will therein find a very strange publication. I cannot observe without surprise, that intriguers have profited of the insulated condition in which the envoys of the United States have kept themselves, to make proposals and hold conversations, the object of which was evidently to deceive you.

I pray you to make known to me immediately the names denoted by the initials W. X. Y. and Z. and that of the woman who is described as having had conversations with Mr. Pinckney upon the interests of America. If you are averse to sending them to me in writing, be pleased to communicate them confidentially to the bearer.

I must rely upon your eagerness to enable the Government to fathom those practices, of which I felicitate you on not having been the dupe, and which you must wish to see cleared up. Accept the assurance of my perfect consideration.

PARIS, May 31, 1798.

Your letter, citizen minister, of the 11th Prairial, [30th May] and the gazette to which it refers, were delivered to me by Mr. ——; the latter contains the whole of the informal negotiations communicated by the envoys to their Government, and the letter states that certain intriguers have made propositions and held conversations with the envoys, the object of which was evidently to deceive them. You have, therefore, desired me to communicate their names. If any of those persons were unauthorized to act, or, having definite powers, have exceeded them, they certainly have abused this Government and the envoys likewise; but I am incompetent to judge of these points, as they did not produce, to my knowledge, credentials or documents of any kind.

The publications referred to are sufficient to show the delicate situation I am in with respect to the names of the persons, and are marked with such circumstances, as to enable you, I flatter myself, to investigate the subject without insisting on any communications on my part.

To free, however, some innocent persons from suspicions which are said to have embarrassed them, I have no objection to declare that three of the persons were foreigners, and that the fourth acted merely as a messenger and linguist.

You will observe, citizen minister, how extremely averse the envoys were from such an informal mode of proceeding, by their answer of October the 30th, to certain propositions previously made to them; that, on the 1st of November, they agreed to put an end to such an intercourse; and that they carried into effect their resolution, notwithstanding the reiterated attempts afterwards made to defeat it. They conceived it nevertheless to be their duty to make a communication of the whole to their Government.

Accept, citizen minister, the assurances of my perfect esteem.

I have received, sir, your letter of yesterday. You inform me, 1st, that the gazette presented contains all the informal negotiations communicated by the envoys to their Government; 2d, that the persons referred to have not produced, to your knowledge, any authority, any document of any kind whatever, to accredit themselves; 3d, that three of the individuals mentioned (that is to say, in the order in which I have placed them, W. X. Y.) are foreigners, and the fourth (that is to say Z.) acted only as messenger and interpreter.

Although I perceive your repugnance to naming those individuals, I must earnestly request you to yield it to the importance of the object. Be pleased, therefore, 1st, either to give me their names in writing, or communicate them confidentially to the bearer; 2d, to name the woman whom Mr. Pinckney mentions; 3d, to tell me whether any of the citizens attached to my service, and authorized by me to see the envoys, told them a word which had the least relation to the disgusting proposition which was made by X. and Y. to give any sum whatever for corrupt distribution.

Receive, sir, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

With respect to the persons designated by X. Y. Z. I will enclose you their names under my hand and seal, on your assuring me that they shall not be published on my authority, although the measure does not appear to me necessary for their discovery; and Z, as he informs me, has made himself known to you. I cannot give you the name of any lady, for no one has made any political communications to me since my arrival in Paris.

In regard to the citizens attached to your employments, and authorized by you to see the envoys on your official communications, I do not recollect a word from any of them which had the least relation to the proposition made by X. and Y. in their informal negotiations to pay money for corrupt purposes.

PARIS, June 10, 1798.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

Having been informed by my secretary, on the 7th, that you proposed to write to me the beginning of this decade, I have impatiently expected, but have not yet received your communications.

The arrival of the newspapers, containing the despatches of the envoys to the Government of the United States, after embarrassing and detaining me a fortnight, has produced a publication, wherein it is declared that this republic "will never cease to manifest her dispositions to live in peace with America."

If this declaration really is, as it appears to be, official and expressive of the sense of this Government, and is followed by a system of policy superior to unimportant considerations, permanent friendship may be soon established between the two republics.

When it is considered that nine months have elapsed since the arrival in Paris of the ministers who were charged with this important negotiation, and six weeks since the departure of two of them; when this delay, and a series of the most unfortunate events, have inevitably produced alarming apprehensions, on the part of the Government and citizens of the United States, that France is hostile towards them, and waits only for a favorable opportunity to evince it; when France herself, in the publication mentioned, has declared that her enemies flatter themselves with the hope of exciting in the United States a war against her; when in this belief she must be convinced that, in such a critical state of affairs, events are too rapid to admit of delay; when such is the decision and ability of this Government, in some of its most important negotiations, as to require but a few days to complete them; I flatter myself that such an arrangement on the part of this Government will speedily be made, as will manifest its amicable dispositions towards the United States, quiet the apprehensions of their Government, open, on a liberal system, the channels of their commerce with this country, and afford them a well grounded assurance of a speedy and happy issue to their efforts for peace.

The brigantine Sophia, Henry Geddes, master, in which I mean immediately to embark, is national property; but, nevertheless, subject, as is represented, to detention by the embargo at Havre; I must request, therefore, an order for exempting her from this prohibition.

My passport, and the letter of safe conduct for the vessel, are not yet received.

Accept, I pray you, &c.

You could hitherto have remarked, sir, in my letters of the 11th, 13th, and 16th of this month, nothing but my eagerness to fathom the dark intrigue therein referred to, and to discover its ramifications. All further explanation, in this respect, would be beneath the dignity of the French Government.

But I will not preserve the same silence on the intention manifested by the message of the President of the United States to the Legislature, of the 14th Germinal, (April 3d, 1798) by the nature of the documents adduced as pertaining to the basis of a negotiation, by the rapid publicity given to this strange collection, by the concealments made of the official communications. That intention is too well perceived in France and in America to require a development. It is sufficient to repel the rumor so injuriously spread of the hostile dispositions of France: I will, therefore, refer myself to the note I addressed to the envoys on the 20th of last Ventose, (March 18, 1798.) I doubt not that they will have promptly forwarded it to the President of the United States; and I must believe that, as soon as it shall be made public, it will efface from the minds of the American people the ill founded uneasiness which they have been made to entertain. As to the French Government, superior to all the personalities, to all the manœuvres of its enemies, it perseveres in the intention of conciliating with sincerity all the differences which have happened between the two countries. I confirm it to you anew. The French republic desires to be restored to the rights which its treaties with your Government confer upon it, and through those means it desires to assure yours. You claim indemnities; it equally demands them: and this disposition being as sincere on the part of the Government of the United States, as it is on its part, will speedily remove all the difficulties.

It remains for me to ask you, sir, whether you are at length in a situation to proceed towards this important object.

Receive, sir, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

No. 15.

Mr. Gerry to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic.

PARIS, June 13, 1798.

I have received, citizen minister, your letter of the 22d Prairial, (10th June) wherein, after informing me that all further explanation, respecting the dark intrigue in question, will be below the dignity of the French Government, you say that you will not keep the same silence upon the intention manifested in the message of the President of the United States to the Legislature, the 14th Germinal (3d April); in the nature of the pieces produced, as forming part of a negotiation; in the rapid publicity given to this strange collection; and in the concealment of official communications, by which, in the subsequent part of your letter, you allude to your note to the envoys, of the 28th Ventose, (18th March last.)

If the wishes and interests of the two republics call loudly for an accommodation of their differences, (and of this the Government of France, as well as that of the United States, appears to be convinced) is not a restoration of friendship between them one of the most direct means for accomplishing that desirable object? And is it not altogether neglected? The unfounded prejudices against the President of the United States, in regard to his message, will be manifest by comparing it with his official duty, designated by the constitution, and also by referring to the dates of your note and of his message: whereby it will appear that the latter was but sixteen days later than the former, and that it was impossible that the President could have received your note, or concealed it from the public. The Government of the United States, pure in its principles, just in its objects, and wise in its councils, is also superior to all personalities; and I wish these may for ever cease: for sure I am that, from such a source, no good, but infinite injuries, may result to the two republics. You conceive that your note, which was duly transmitted by the envoys to the Government, when published, will efface from the minds of the American people their unfounded inquietude. Of this I can form no judgment; but, before you addressed that note to the envoys, the proposition therein contained had been made to me to treat separately, and I had stated that the measure was in itself impolitic, and, as it respected myself, impossible.

I have, nevertheless, contrary to my wishes and interests, complied with your subsequent proposition for remaining here to prevent a rupture. I have been happy, since, by your repeated assurances that this Government was sincerely disposed to reconcile all differences between the two countries, and probably would soon make an arrangement adequate to the object: indeed I had great reason to hope that I should have been furnished with a copy of it before my leaving Paris, and I earnestly wished it, lest the disappointment which might result from my return to the United States without it, should produce unhappy effects; but the vessel in which I am to embark being ready for sea, waits only for my arrival at Havre, with the requisite documents for the voyage.

The sincerity of the disposition of the Government of the United States to meet this Government on the ground of the existing treaties between the two countries, and to do justice to France, as well as to receive it from her, is too evident to admit, for a moment, of the least doubt; but I again repeat that I have no powers to enter on the negotiation. Nevertheless, the proposed arrangement might be made by this Government, and a minister be sent to America to complete it; as it is of little consequence to either in which nation the negotiation is concluded, but of great importance to both that it should terminate in an immediate accommodation, and in the restoration of their friendship. I presume that in this our wishes are alike sincere and ardent, and that the magnanimous policy of this Government to persevere in the intention to reconcile with sincerity all the differences between the two countries, will have a speedy and happy effect.

Accept, citizen minister, the assurances of my perfect respect.

E. GERRY.

No. 16.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Gerry, Envoy of the United States.

PARIS, 30*th Prairial*, 6*th year*, (June 18*th* 1798.)

I have received, sir, your answer of the 27th of this month, to my letter of the 22d. You take the trouble to observe to me that my note of the 28th Ventose (18th March, 1798) could not have made a part of the documents communicated by the President of the United States on the 14th Germinal (April 3d, 1798.) Do me the justice to believe that I have not committed this mistake.

You persist in thinking that your powers and your instructions do not permit you to proceed to the conciliating of the differences between our two republics. You even announce to me, positively, your departure for the United States in the vessel which your Government has despatched to Havre. I should have presumed that, after having received and transmitted to Philadelphia my note of the 28th Ventose, that one of the envoys, whose impartial dispositions appeared to promise a reconciliation, would wait at Paris for further instructions and powers, if he had need of them. It even appears to me that these documents cannot now be long in reaching you, provided your Government is as averse to a rupture as you assure me. The part you take tends to give room to conjecture that the vessel arrived at Havre has only brought you orders similar to the acts of which I complained on the 22d of this month.

Nevertheless, sir, such is the sincerity of the assurances which I have given you in the name of the Executive Directory, on the 28th Ventose, and which I have since repeated to you, notwithstanding the most irritating provocations, that I do not hesitate to explain myself to you as if you were in a situation to receive my overtures.

All negotiation between France and the United States must essentially rest upon three principal points.

1st. Frank and amicable declarations concerning certain circumstances which malevolence has, and may yet, misrepresent.

It is utterly false, notwithstanding the public and private insinuations which have been made in private writings and in solemn acts, that the French Government has ever sought to detach the people of the United States from the constitution they have given to themselves. It has complained of the American Government, but to the Government itself. Justice demanded that it should render homage to the sympathy of a free people for the cause of liberty, and it did not go farther.

The Secretary of State, Mr. Pickering, has inserted in his public letter to Mr. Pinckney, (of the 16th of January, 1797) assertions against the good faith of France in the negotiations of 1782, which have no other foundations than the interested communications of the English negotiator. It is a long time that this insidious weapon, forged by the enemies of France, has been used in the dark.

It is of importance to the two countries to understand each other equally concerning the true value of several documents published as emanating from the French Government, and of the private acts of certain agents, whom it has disavowed. In effect, it is only by destroying all the germs of distrust that a good understanding can re-appear, and continue hereafter without being obscured.

2d. Fixing the meaning of several articles of the treaties between the two countries, and the absolute enjoyment of the rights which flow from them.

Long before the war, the 9th and 12th articles of the convention of the 14th of November, 1788, the first relative to deserters, and the second relative to the jurisdiction of the consuls, were a continual source of altercations. They have become completely null by interpretations foreign to their manifest intent. It is necessary to perfect them.

By the 6th article of the treaty of alliance, France has renounced the Bermudas, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, Canada; in other words, it has renounced the procuring for itself of one of the ports, which would have been so necessary for it to possess for the protection of its sugar islands. It devoted, in preference, the effort of its arms to the defence of the United States. It was understood that it should find proportionate advantages in their ports. One of these advantages is found implicitly in the 17th article of the treaty of commerce of the same day. The French ships, public and private, may freely enter into the American ports with the prizes which they may take. The ships, public and private, of the enemies of France, who may have taken prizes from it, shall not, on the contrary, have any asylum in those ports. Such is the literal sense, such is the intended sense. Does good faith permit a distinction between the vessels of the enemies of France, who leave their prizes without the port, and those who come in with them? Can it be decided that the latter only should be excluded, without evidently violating the clause of the treaty which is the most important to France? Can it be invalidated by subsequent engagements? Doubtless not.

In virtue of the same 17th article, no authority whatever of the United States is permitted to interfere with the prizes taken by French ships, public and private. The captains are bound only to show their commissions, because it is necessary to be able to distinguish the pirate from authorized vessels. It is also lawful to demand the release of a prize taken within the extent of the jurisdiction, that is to say, within the reach of cannon shot. But what abuse, what vexations, what odious chicanery, have flowed from the deviation from the meaning of the article? The Government of the United States has rejected the precautions suggested to remedy the evil. Experience has shown that without those precautions the article is illusory.

The United States permitted the sale of French prizes until Prairial, 4th year (May or June, 1796.) At this period the supreme court decreed the revocation of this advantage, in virtue of the 24th article of the treaty with Great Britain. The 27th article, nevertheless, adds, that that treaty shall, in no respect, alter those which the United States may have previously contracted. But the liberty enjoyed by the French vessels of war of selling their prizes is derived from the 17th and 22d articles of the treaty of commerce of the 6th February, 1778. The 17th article would be of little value, if it were confined to the right of asylum. The 22d article would be mere surplusage, if it did not declare a right for the French and an interdiction for their enemies. Great Britain obtained a similar right only on condition that it should be without force in all cases wherein France should be interested. When the United States concluded their treaty with Holland, in October 1782, the memory of the treaty of 1778 was not yet weakened, and the exclusive privilege of the 22d article of the latter is formally acknowledged in the 22d article of the former.

The same 22d article of the treaty of 1778 must be appealed to against the refusal given to French vessels of war to make any change of their armament in the United States. If the desire to prevent the disorders of which the American Government complained, induced the committee of public safety, in the beginning of the second year, to cause all original armament in the name of the republic, in the United States, to be stopped, it did not intend that the abandonment of a doubtful pretension should carry with it that of an explicit right.

In the 23d and 24th articles France and the United States have agreed that the neutrality of the flag should determine that of the cargo, and have contracted the too extended catalogue of contraband merchandise. It would have been pleasing to the republic to see in general prevalence, a system conformable with sound justice, and which it flatters itself one day to extend. But how could the obligation remain reciprocal between it and the United States, when there no longer remained a parity of situation.

The English Government has abused the liberality of France to her injury, since the commencement of 1793, and has not even spared American cargoes bound to French ports. Principles, contrary to those which influence the republic, have been consecrated since, in the 17th and 18th articles of the treaty of London. It is doubtless a forced concession on the part of the United States, who, until then, made it their glory, in all their treaties, to aim at the liberty of the seas; but finally, it is a concession made by them in favor of England. France ought to enjoy it, in virtue of the second article of the treaty of Paris: its regrets cannot render it insensible to its rights.

It ought, in virtue of this second article, which renders immediately common to it every favor accorded by the United States to any nation whatever, to claim some other parts of the treaty of London.

3d. The impartial examination of the damages which have resulted from the deviation from the treaties of 1778.

The treaties which bind the two nations have been insensibly rendered insignificant by sophistical interpretations. The clearest clauses have been finally denied. The American Government has never paid regard to the successive complaints of the ministers plenipotentiary of the republic. It has never admitted them to enter into conference on this subject. It has always taken upon itself to decide; although in every reciprocal contract, neither party possesses the exclusive right of interpretation. After having exhausted itself in representations, the French Government was obliged to cause its complaints to be unfolded for the last time, on the 25th Brumaire, 5th year (Nov. 15, 1796.) Stripped of the advantages which the most sacred, the most liberal treaty assured to it, it has been forced, in order to bring the United States back to their obligations to France, to imitate the conduct which England pursued previously to the treaty of London.

That court moderated its measures after its object was accomplished: the present complaints of the United States might have been prevented, if those of the French Government had been attended to. The complaints which the United States now make are, in fine, only the consequence of a state of things which has cost the French republic and its citizens the most considerable damages. The French Government, nevertheless, has not ceased to offer the exact justice which it demands. It has never refused, and never will refuse, to enter into discussion upon every proper subject.

I have given, sir, to these three points a large development. We are very near an agreement, when we really desire it on both sides, and when we candidly admit the state of the question. You see the negotiators require very general instructions, in order to obviate the inconveniences which are prolonged even until now. I believe, to fix the meaning of our treaties, it will be proper to draw up a declaration concerning it, to be hereafter obligatory upon the two parties, and considered as making a part of the original acts; a declaration which, that it may have the force of law, should be established by the ratifications which the constitutional forms respectively require.

The United States are placed in that happy unconnected state, which makes them, doubtless, set a particular value upon the clauses of their treaties, relative to their commerce and navigation. It is the effect of the long neutrality which they have the hope of maintaining. But France, although firmly determined, since it has become a republic, to live in peace with all nations, cannot flatter itself with escaping the scourge which periodically torments Europe; and prudence requires that it preserve the rights which treaties secure to it, in neutral ports, in time of war. With this double view, the American negotiators digested the treaty of commerce of 1778. Although it be reciprocal upon the whole, some provisions are more specially applicable to the fixed position of the United States; and others have allusion only to the eventual position of France. The latter has made great sacrifices for the independence of the former.

France has stipulated few advantages—advantages which do not in any respect injure the United States, and the lawfulness of which no foreign nation can contest. The French republic will never renounce them.

It is now in the power of the United States to realize the dispositions which you manifest in their name. The prudence of your connexions in France has preserved you from the prejudices which it is difficult not to contract, when one is less on his guard against foreign and even domestic intrigues. I persuade myself that you will transmit to your Government only accurate documents. It will belong to it to pursue the best measures to effectuate a prompt reconciliation; and I ardently desirethat they may correspond with the wish of the Executive Directory.

I continue, however, to think that, instead of returning to the United States, it would be preferable that you should ask for the instruments necessary to the negotiation. Nothing could more accelerate the drawing together of those ties, which the French republic and the true Americans have regretted to see relaxed. Your presence at Paris, if the powers, which must be supposed to be on the road, should soon arrive, may momently accomplish the object which we both ambitiously pursue.

Your departure, on the contrary, will give a new activity to the plots laid for precipitating the two countries into measures which are as repugnant to their inclination as to their interests.

The French Government being, besides, penetrated with the same sentiments, which you testify, will hereafter wait for what may be addressed to it, and with pleasure will behold you as the organ. Accept, sir, the assurances of my perfect consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

No. 17.

Mr. Gerry to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic.

PARIS, June 22, 1798.

I received, citizen minister, on the evening of the 20th instant, your letter of the 30th Prairial (18th of June) in answer to mine of the 13th. You say you have not made the mistake respecting your letter of the 28th Ventose. I am not disposed to impute to you a mistake, if you have not made it; although I think that your letter will warrant the construction I gave it: be this as it may, justice requires that the President of the United States should be free from the imputation of having concealed official communications, when he had published all which it was possible for him to have received.

You should have presumed, as you state, that, after having received and transmitted to Philadelphia your note of the 28th Ventose, (the 18th of March) I would wait at Paris for instructions, and further powers, if necessary. But I had a right to expect, from what had passed between us before the arrival of the brigantine Sophia, and indeed after it, that I should have received, for the consideration of the Government of the United States, propositions on the part of this Government for reconciling the differences and restoring friendship between the two republics; that I should, ere this, have been on my passage to the United States; and that a French minister would have been sent to Philadelphia to complete the negotiation.

I accordingly informed you, before the arrival of the brigantine, that I should embark for America in June; and after her arrival, that I should take my passage in her, as soon as she could be fitted for the sea.

You have stated, and developed three points, on which you conceive the negotiation between France and the United States ought essentially to rest. Your letter on this subject I will carefully communicate to my Government; and if, after the voluminous official discussions, on the part of each of the republics, of the subjects in dispute between them, you conceive that a reconciliation will be best promoted by this mode only, I sincerely wish it success.

You say that France, in her treaty with the United States, has stipulated few advantages, which in no wise injure them, and the legality of which cannot be contested by any foreign nation. You then add, that the French Government will never renounce them.

The Government of the United States never desired of France a renunciation of any right, to which she is entitled by their existing treaties; in construing some parts of these, the two Governments have different opinions; but this is not unusual between nations; and when they are amicably disposed, and governed by the principles you have justly laid down, that neither party has the right of exclusive interpretation, they are generally successful, if direct measures fail, in adjusting their disputes by arbitration: this mode has been successfully adopted by the United States with other nations.

My connexions in France, citizen minister, have neither preserved me from, nor subjected me to prejudices. I am governed by my own principles; those, you may be assured, will always prompt me, in the discharge of my duty, to present to my Government exact documents and statements of facts.

It is impossible for me to apply to the Government for the necessary instruments to conduct the negotiation. On the other hand, should such a proposition be made to me, I should certainly, under existing circumstances, decline it. Nevertheless, I again assure you, that it will give me the greatest pleasure, if, by any other means, I can contribute to a just and honorable accommodation of the differences between the two republics.

My return to the United States, which is indispensable, cannot, as I conceive, be attended with the effect you mention; more especially as the connexion between the two countries will be still kept up by their respective consuls. Accept, citizen minister, the assurances of my perfect respect.

PARIS, June 25, 1798.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

I am again under the necessity of applying for necessary documents to enable me to return to the United States; and as you cannot be insensible of the manifest disadvantages on my part resulting from the delay of them, I presume that they are now in readiness.

Accept my assurances of esteem and respect.

E. GERRY.

No. 19.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Gerry, envoy of the United States.

PARIS, 9th Messidor, 6th year, (June 27, 1798.)

In answering, sir, your letter of the 4th of this month (22d June, 1798,) I regret that I am obliged to recur to the first paragraph. I complained that the publications made at Philadelphia on the 19th Germinal (8th April, 1798,) did not contain all that your Government then knew. You supposed that I alluded to my note of the 28th Ventose (18th March,) which could not, however, have reached the President. I begged you not to attribute that mistake to me. You appear to adhere to your interpretation. From respect to your sincerity, of which I cannot doubt, I will surmount my repugnance to minute digressions, and will point out to you that one of the concealments which is the most striking.

I have been furnished from the United States with the clearest proofs, supported even by articles extracted from the American papers, of the knowledge which subsisted there before Germinal (before the 21st of March) of the objections of the Executive Directory to any negotiation with two of the envoys, and of its express desire of treating with you. In effect I early testified to you these dispositions; and the declaration on this subject, inserted in my note of the 28th Ventose (18th March) was only the official expression of a thing already comprehended as well at Philadelphia as at Paris.

For the rest, sir, let us hereafter pass over these useless episodes, and let not our communications further bear the tint of recriminations. Those who are truly impartial, will, perhaps, discover a degree of generosity in this proposition coming from my side.

Let us seriously resume our explanations. It is for facts to prove the reality of the intentions professed on both sides. My last letter attested to you very forcibly those of the Executive Directory. You do not allow those of the President of the United States to be doubted. How, then, happens it that, after having received propositions, wherein every thing is combined for a frank and prompt conciliation, you in some sort shut the door against all future advance?

You seem to insinuate that these propositions have long been delayed. They could not have been made until after the departure of your colleagues: the first open negotiations upon the differences which subsist between the two countries take their date only since that recent period: nothing was entered upon as long as the three envoys were present: one alone manifested a temper of reconciliation. Afterwards, some time was necessary to unite the views you suggested with the determination the Executive Directory has made, to place the respective interests in front. I did not, above all, partake in your opinion concerning the utility of your carrying the overtures of the French Government personally to Philadelphia; and I never thought it advantageous to send thither a minister plenipotentiary from the republic, before the happy issue of the negotiations commenced. I was, nevertheless, about to transmit the result of my reflections in the beginning of Prairial, (between the 20th and the last of May) when the incident happened, which for a moment suspended the principal object. I do not see what delay I could have prevented. I am mortified that circumstances have not rendered our progress more rapid, and it is in order to accelerate it, as well as to obviate every new casualty, that I have pressed you in my last letter to remain at Paris.

Did you not come here, sir, to establish friendship between the two republics, and determined to spare nothing to attain this end, as desirable to the United States as to France? Do not the full powers given to the envoys authorize them to negotiate separately? Is it after what has passed at Philadelphia that you can withdraw yourself? Ought you to do so when the French Government, superior to all resentments, and never listening to any thing but justice, manifests itself anxious to conclude a solid and mutually satisfactory agreement? I have invited you to request promptly new powers, if you thought you stood in need of them, and they were not on their passage. You answer, that this step is for you impossible, and that you would, besides, under existing circumstances, decline taking upon yourself the conducting of the negotiation, if it was confided to you. I cannot reconcile this language with the avowed object of your voyage to France, with your full powers, with your attachment to your country, with the assurances you do not cease to give of the sincerity of your Government.

I commend these observations to you, sir. Reflect on the possible consequences of your departure, and judge for yourself, whether he who truly wishes for peace ought to consent to it.

Let us continue more and more to advance the work we have entered upon. I may almost venture to say that it is your duty. The propositions which I have made to you embrace three points.

The first will take but little time, and may be postponed.

The third will doubtless experience no difficulty on either side, after the second shall be amicably settled.

It is to the second, therefore, that we should first attend; and it is so much the more important, as it embraces the source of all our differences. A calm and candid discussion will successively clear up every article of them. I do not see that the voluminous discussions which have been entered into at Philadelphia have shed any light upon it. They have rather contributed to set up the passions in the seat of reason. Ours shall always be followed by a conclusion either in the cessation or admission of the right reclaimed. It is necessary, in order to effect the act declaratory of the meaning of our treaties. As to the eventual arbitrament of a third Power, I do not know whether the United States have sometimes had recourse to it. The French republic has never experienced the want of it; and I am persuaded, that, on this particular occasion, it will readily come to an understanding with the United States, if they are determined to be just towards it, as it desires to be towards them.

Let us begin with the ninth article of the consular convention of the 14th November, 1788. I annex a note upon the difficulties its execution meets with in the ports of the United States. It shall be followed by similar notes, upon each of which we will endeavor to come to an agreement.

Accept, sir, &c.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Note upon the 9th article of the Convention between France and the United States of the 14th November, 1788.

The beginning of this article declares, "that the consuls and vice consuls may cause to be arrested the captains, officers, mariners, sailors, and all other persons, being part of the crews of the vessels of their respective nations, who shall have deserted from the said vessels, in order to send them back and transport them out of the country. For which purpose the said consuls and vice consuls shall address themselves to the courts, judges, and officers competent." Before 1792 it frequently happened that the judges, acting under the authority of the individual States, have pretended that they were incompetent. On the 14th April, 1792, an act of Congress declared that the district judges, acting under the authority of the United States, should be competent. All the judges of the individual States have since thought themselves justified in declining to render their aid; but as there are many more ports in the United States than district judges, and as they do not even always reside at a port, the French consuls and vice consuls have often been unable to hinder desertion, to the great detriment of the vessels of their nation. The consuls of the United States do not experience those difficulties in the ports of the republic. Reciprocity, as well as the meaning of the article, require that it should be declared "that all the officers of justice having power to order the arrest of mariners, shall be considered competent, and as such bound to comply with the request of the consuls, in the manner and in the cases stipulated."

The article proceeds: "and shall demand the said deserters in writing, proving, by an exhibition of the registers of the vessel or ship's roll, that those men were part of the said crews."

The mariners have often waited till the departure of their vessel to desert, and have afterwards not only braved the authority of the consul, but served to debauch other crews. It has often been sufficient for them to go from one port to the nearest neighboring port, to be secure from all pursuit. The consul being no longer able to produce the roll with ease, or not having it in his power to detach it from the vessel, where it should remain, is no longer admitted to make a claim. He in vain produces a copy of the roll made in chancery and duly authenticated: no faith is ascribed to it, notwithstanding the tenor of the first paragraph of the 5th article of the convention; it is maintained that the original roll is necessary; and thus the spirit of an important stipulation is destroyed by the ambiguity attributed to the letter. It would be requisite to declare "that, by register or ship's roll, not only the original is understood, but every authentic copy or extract, certified to be conformable to the original, by a judge of the country, before the departure of the vessel, and that this extract or copy shall have, in all the ports of the respective Powers, the same force with the original for three months."

The Minister of Exterior Relations.

PARIS, 9th Messidor, 6th year.

No. 20.

Mr. Gerry to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic.

PARIS, July 1, 1798.

I have received, citizen minister, on the 11th, your letter of the 9th Messidor, (27th of June) but without an answer to mine of the 25th of June, or the documents therein demanded for my voyage to America. You say "they have furnished you from the United States with the most clear proofs, supported even by articles extracted from the American papers, of the knowledge which they had there before Germinal (20th of March) of the objections of the Executive Directory to any negotiation with two of the envoys, and of its formal desire to treat with me." Admitting this, it does not prove, to my mind, that the President of the United States had received official communications and concealed them; but it is a convincing proof that the information of these facts must have been sent from hence to the United States, when secrecy respecting them, imposed on me previously to their communication, was strenuously insisted on.

You have made what you consider a generous proposition, that our communications should not be tinged with any more recriminations: is the subsequent part of your letter altogether free from them? My silence on the abuse offered to the Government of the United States, its envoys in general, and myself in particular, in an anonymous, but apparently official publication of the 7th of June, must afford you unequivocal evidence that I had already adopted the measure you have proposed.

It is inconceivable to me that being without powers to negotiate my return to the United States, after such long notice, can be supposed in any degree to close the door to subsequent steps for a reconciliation. The door has always been, and still is open, on the part of the Government of the United States. It is impossible for any Government to exceed it, in the moderation and justice of its measures towards France, or in its perseverance and patience to execute them; but it having failed in two attempts, will not France make one effort to obtain a reconciliation between the two republics? Consider the disagreeable predicament in which the Government of the United States has been involuntarily placed, and it is conceived you cannot fail to see the propriety and policy of this measure.

I have, in my last letter, stated to you truly, what I conceived was well understood between us, respecting my return to the United States with the overtures of France, and her sending a minister there to complete the negotiation. How we could misunderstand each other on these points is to me incomprehensible. Be this as it may, it is not very material who is to be the bearer of the propositions, if they are such as can be accepted by the United States.

You inquire whether I am not come to establish friendship between the two republics, and determined to spare no pains to attain this desirable object? Judge, yourself, citizen minister, whether I have not faithfully discharged my duty in this respect.

You ask whether I am not authorized to treat separately? Had my colleagues relinquished their office, been recalled, or by physical means been disqualified to act, my powers would have been adequate to a separate negotiation, and I would have entered on it without delay. As matters are circumstanced, I have no such powers. You differ from me in opinion on this subject, but I must abide by my own judgment.

You declare that France, superior to all resentment, and only listening to justice, manifests a zeal to conclude a treaty solid and mutually satisfactory. Be assured, citizen minister, that the United States will with ardor meet such a disposition on the part of France; and that it cannot fail of success, if accompanied with a suspension of the long and ruinous depredations on our commerce, and with proper arrangements for a negotiation.

In my last letter you will perceive that, having particularly referred to the mode adopted by the United States with other nations, I could only allude to that of deciding, by commissioners, disputes which could not be adjusted by direct means. You have misconceived my intention, if, you supposed it extended to the eventual arbitration of a third Power.

My frequent applications for a passport, letter of safe conduct for the vessel, and her exemption from the embargo at Havre, have been altogether unnoticed. I hope you will not, by the continuance of this unusual mode of conduct, render an explanation of it immediately necessary.

Accept, citizen minister, the assurances of my perfect respect.

E. GERRY.

No. 21.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Gerry, envoy of the United States.

PARIS, 18*th Messidor*, 6*th year of the French republic*, (July 6, 1798.)

I have received, sir, your answer of the 13th of this month to my letter of the 9th. I will not conceal from you that this kind of correspondence gives me the more pain as it injures the progress of our business.

It is clear that before Germinal (before 21st March) the intentions of the Executive Directory could not be known at Philadelphia, but by communication from Paris; but I attest, that they did not proceed either from the French Government, or its agents, or from any one whatever, to my knowledge.

In the mean time, let us admit the gratuitous supposition that you make upon this subject. Is it, therefore, less true that my overtures to treat with you were known in the United States, when it was there declared that France refused all negotiation?

You tell me that the United States having been twice baffled in their attempts, it belongs to France to make an effort in order to effect a reconciliation between the two republics. What name, therefore, do you give to the indefatigable zeal which I manifest to smooth all the difficulties, and bring about an honorable accommodation? It is a genuine effort, sir, the merit of which might be better appreciated. What, on the other hand, are the two attempts of the United States? I know of no other mission on their part, in consequence of the declaration made at Philadelphia, on the 25th Brumaire, 5th year (Nov. 15, 1796) than that confided jointly and separately to Messrs. Pinckney, Marshall, and yourself. I will not retrace the causes which have prevented the envoys collectively from attaining the most complete success: but I will affirm that they are foreign to the French Government, and that, in any state of the cause, it depends upon you to fulfil the expectation of the two countries.

You deny, sir, that there was some generosity on my part in proposing to you to banish hereafter, from our communications, all useless episodes, and especially no longer to give a place in them to recriminations. This is another episode; but, since you force me to it, it is necessary that I should explain myself more fully. If, now and then, some anonymous publications, of a nature disagreeable to the American Government, have crept into the French papers, it would not become it to complain. For a long time, certain papers of the United States, the editor of one of which is the printer of the Senate, daily spread abroad the most atrocious calumnies, the most injurious insinuations, the most base reflections upon the French people, their institutions, their Government, their legislators, the heads of their executive, their ministers, their agents, their glorious defenders. Yes, those same warriors, who respect their enemies, receive the most ignominious appellations among a friendly people for whom many have combated. Nay, more; within the very walls of the national representation of the United States how many deeply insulting speeches have been and yet are delivered. Nothing is spared in order to endeavor to degrade the French republic in the opinion of the American people; and the silence of your Government leaves an open field to this torrent of invectives, whilst scarcely now and then a word of reply escapes, notwithstanding our vigilance, from the indignation of some French citizen. Is it not repeated in the United States, that the Executive Directory repels negotiations in order to wait an opportunity of carrying the war there? This odious assertion has been credited; and your Government, which ought to know that such a thought was never conceived, opposes no corrective to the impression which it is calculated to make. Whatever may be your opinion of it, sir, it is generous to stifle all the sentiments which arise in abundance on reading your public papers, and even the debates of your legislature upon the subject of France. And yet until the two Governments shall be so far reconciled as to concert the means of remedying these abuses, it is expedient that those who are to treat upon the interest of the two nations adopt a conciliatory language, and hereafter avoid what may give rise to painful recollections. I repeat to you, that it is my desire; that I will set the example; that I am impatient to abjure reproaches; and that I insist that this point may be well understood.

This is the last time I shall yield to these digressions, which ought to be as disagreeable to you as they are to me.

You have not transmitted to me any opinion, sir, upon the note annexed to my letter of the 9th of this month. I have delayed until now sending you the following ones. I flatter myself that the long conference which I have had with you will have produced some modification of the resolution in which you might appear to persevere. I therefore recommend to your attention two fresh notes, one upon the twelfth article, and the other upon the sixteenth article of the convention of the 14th November, 1788. They contain every thing which it is important to explain at present, in relation to this act. We will immediately after proceed to the treaties of February, 1778. You desired that I might send you some propositions. I did so on the 30th Prairial, (18th June) and you should have had them sooner, had it not been for the incident which has happened. I have therein traced the plan of the negotiation. I have therein pointed out generally the intentions of France; I have therein entered into an engagement to discuss every proper subject; I have assured you that the Executive Directory would render to the United States that justice which it expects itself: I have excluded nothing which we can suggest, on either side, to strengthen still more the good understanding between our two republics.

But it is not enough to transmit these propositions to your Government; they are only the foundation of the necessary discussions upon every question of detail of which we ought to find the solution. The reconciling of the different points upon which we will have fixed our ideas will form the act to be drawn up. I do not think that we could come to conclusions in any other manner. It even appears to me, that there will be an evident loss of time if, in the state of things, this discussion is adjourned. I have already given you to understand that it would be inconvenient to give it in charge to a minister plenipotentiary at Philadelphia. Circumstances have rendered this inconvenience more important, and I will not conceal from you that I should fear fresh incidents.

I therefore urge you more pressingly than ever, sir, whilst I refer to what I have already written to you on this subject, to postpone your departure, and to attend quickly to the discussions which I urge. I know that you are not of the same opinion with me, with respect to the validity of your full powers; but reflect, that, in any case, you can in nothing bind your Government, which has reserved the right of ratifying.

I will add that, in the situation in which you stand, it is contrary to all usage to depart, without notifying that you have received an order therefor; that the usage on the contrary is, when a doubt is raised upon the full powers, the envoy waits the decision of his Government, without breaking off the negotiation. Receive, sir, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

EXTERIOR RELATIONS.

Note upon the twelfth article of the Convention between France and the United States, of the 14th November, 1788.

This article has been executed in France in its literal meaning, and in its implicit meaning: that is to say, that all the differences between the citizens of the United States in France have been left to the decision of their consuls, and that the sentences of the latter have been executed, when coercion was necessary, in the same manner, and by the same officers of justice as the sentences of the French tribunals.

Nothing has been changed, in this respect, since the establishment of the republican form of government, notwithstanding the jealousy which is peculiar to it, and which the judiciary authorities of every country possess in general.

It has been judged, as to the literal meaning, that the jurisdiction given to the consuls of the United States over their countrymen was not in any respect optional. The 12th article does not declare in effect that all the differences may be determined, &c. which would imply only a power in persons of the nation to sue before their consuls, and a power in the latter to admit or decline. It declares formally, that all differences shall be determined, &c. which implies a reciprocal obligation upon the persons of the nation and their consuls. This obligation is confirmed by the last paragraph, which pronounces an absolute interdiction upon the territorial officers, civil or military, to interfere in any manner whatever, and consequently obliges the persons of the nation to apply to their consuls, and the consuls to decide their differences.

It has been judged, as to the implied meaning, that the stipulation being express, mutual, and guarantied by the public faith, included within it the engagement to give it effect. It would have been ridiculous to put the citizens of the United States in France under the necessity of referring, exclusively, their differences to their consuls, and the necessity of taking them up, as the only competent judges, without intending the execution of the sentences. But this execution can proceed only from the territorial power which disposes of the force.

It has finally been judged, that this kind of jurisdiction was not, in any respect, repugnant to the local sovereignty, because its admission was mutually agreed upon; that it did not stand in competition with the French tribunals, because it did not embrace objects common to them; that it did not abridge the territorial rights, because it extended only to foreigners.

There has been no reciprocity on the part of the United States, wherein this question has been viewed under a different aspect, and the French Government has constantly received complaints upon this subject. In 1792, attention seemed to be paid to the representations which it caused to be made. An act of Congress of the 14th April, of that year, declares, "that in all cases wherein, by any article of the convention, the consuls of France are entitled to aid in the execution of any order, the marshals of the district courts of the United States, or their deputies, should be the officers competent, and should give their aid according to the tenor of the stipulations." The same act having provided, in the preceding paragraphs for the execution of the seventh and ninth articles of the convention, that which has been just cited is applicable only to the twelfth article, the last of the three which were foreseen, and the only one wherein an order might be issued. But soon afterwards the officers designated eluded this provision.

Since that time, some courts in the United States have declared that they would not take cognizance of actions at law between Frenchmen. These actions have been sustained in other courts, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the defendants. On the other hand, the consuls of the republic decided in vain upon the differences submitted to their judgment. One while the justice of the country was refused, by arguing from the tenor of the twelfth article; at another time the consular jurisdiction was palsied, by arguing from its pretended silence; and sometimes it was entirely forgotten.

It is of pressing importance to put an end to these uncertainties, which are discouraging to the French merchants, and embarrassing to their Government, whose protection they claim.

The twelfth article of the convention between France and the United States gives to the consuls a judiciary authority over their countrymen, to the exclusion of the respective tribunals. This authority is not optional; it does not derogate from the rights of sovereignty of either republic; it is founded on a reciprocal agreement; it is conformable with the principles asserted by the most enlightened writers upon public law; it meets with no opposition in France, and it ought to be faithfully facilitated in the United States.

The French Government will not insist upon a particular mode of executing the sentences of the consuls in the United States. It asks only the express recognition of the implied meaning of the twelfth article, and a promise to provide for it fully at the next session of Congress, in the manner most consonant with the forms used in the country.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND,
The Minister of Exterior Relations.

PARIS, 18*th Messidor*, 6*th year*, (July 6, 1798.)

EXTERIOR RELATIONS.

Note upon the sixteenth article of the Convention between France and the United States, of the 14*th November*, 1788, and general observations.

PARIS, 18*th Messidor*, 6*th year*, (July 6, 1798.)

This article declares that the convention shall be fully and completely executed during the space of twelve years, to be reckoned from the day of the exchange of the ratifications.

The exchange took place in January, 1790, and the term appointed will expire in January, 1802.

It will be proper, before that period, to set about the revision of the convention. Many articles require it. The French republic will show itself less jealous of the privileges of the consuls than of the stipulations useful to its merchants and navigators. The United States will doubtless be guided by the same laudable views. Two republics will the more readily agree on this subject, as they are founded upon the same principles.

But it is possible that, on the one side or the other, the parties may not be prepared at the time fixed for the intended negotiation; that more experience may be desired; or that they may not even agree as to the best system to be adopted. The French Government proposes that it be declared "that, on account of the events which have prevented a judgment upon the effect of the present convention, it shall be prolonged for six years after the expiration of the twelve first years, if it be not renewed in the interval."

The French Government also proposes, "that in all quotations of any article of the convention, the denomination of French citizen be submitted for that of subject; and the words French republic be placed in the stead of most christian king, most christian majesty.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND,
The Minister of Exterior Relations.

No. 22.

Mr. Gerry to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic.

PARIS, July 10, 1798.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

I received, on the 9th instant, your letter of the 6th, being the 18th Messidor, and shall briefly reply to it.

You inform me that the communication of the intentions of the Executive Directory, sent to Philadelphia before Germinal, the 20th of March, did not proceed from the French Government, its agents, or any person whatever, to your knowledge: and I affirm that it did not directly, or indirectly, proceed from me.

The rumor then must have been vague, and could not have merited the attention of the President of the United States, much less could it have authorized his formal communication thereof to Congress.

The two attempts of the United States to obtain a reconciliation between the republics, to which I referred in my last, were those of the mission of a minister to efface unfavorable impressions, banish suspicions, and restore cordiality between them, and afterwards, of the three envoys, whose powers were more extensive. I made no allusion to your conduct, and, with respect to my own, have done every thing incumbent on me.

You complain that certain newspapers of the United States, one of which has, for its editor, the printer of the Senate, calumniate, daily, the French people, their institutions, government, legislators, and others. The envoys, in their letter to yourself, of the 3d of April, have discussed this subject so fully as to leave nothing further necessary to be said thereon.

You also complain of some speeches of the national representation of the United States, degrading the French republic in the opinion of the American people, and of the silence of our Government thereon. The constitution of the United States expressly provides that the Senators and Representatives, for any speech or debate in either house, shall not be questioned in any other place. So essential is the freedom of debate to each house, as to be sacredly preserved by the constitution, and to be above the control of every other department of Government. The Government of the United States, on their part, pay no regard to offensive speeches in foreign Legislatures, well knowing that, however amicably disposed Governments may be towards each other, such a mode of conduct must be productive of perpetual sources of discord between them.

And now having replied, citizen minister, to your observations, on these subjects, I assure you that nothing can be more disagreeable to me than such discussions. I did not give rise to them, and here I shall terminate them.

On the 27th of June, about six weeks after I had demanded my passport, and when my baggage was on board the Sophia, you sent me a note containing some remarks on the consular convention, and expected a formal discussion of them: to this, without powers, I should not have consented at any time; I have repeatedly refused it; and must adhere to my determination,

You conclude by observing that, in my situation, which is that of an unaccredited minister, it is contrary to all usages to depart, without notifying that I have received orders therefor; and that, on the contrary, it is customary, when a doubt arrises upon full powers, to wait the decision of the Government of which one is the envoy without breaking the negotiation. On my part there has been no doubt of a want of powers, and there has not been any negotiation; there cannot, then, be a rupture of it by my departure. I am to judge of the necessity of demanding my passport. I now renew my demand of it, and the other documents necessary for the voyage, and request a definite answer.

Accept, citizen minister, the assurances of my perfect consideration.

E. GERRY.

No. 23.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Gerry, envoy of the United States.

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN RELATIONS, PARIS, 24th Messidor, (July 12, 1798.)
6*th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.*

As long as I could flatter myself, sir, with fulfilling the wish of the Executive Directory, by endeavoring with you to re-establish the good understanding between the French republic and the United States, I used my efforts, both in our conferences and in my correspondence with you, to smooth the paths; to establish the basis; to enter on the business; and to convince you of the utility of your presence at Paris. It is in your character of envoy of the American Government, that I received you and wrote to you: it depended upon yourself to be publicly received by the Executive Directory. Without partaking in your opinion with respect to the change which the departure of Messrs. Pinckney and Marshall might produce in the full powers, wherein I have read that you have been authorized to treat separately; it appeared to me that, in the hypothesis even in which you placed yourself, you ought to refer the question to your Government, and, in the interval, fix with me, by a calm and friendly discussion, all the questionable points of our differences.

This proceeding was the more natural, as, setting aside the premature knowledge which your Government had of the offer to treat with you, after the departure of your colleagues; my note, of the 28th Ventose, (18th of March) which must have reached Philadelphia about the end of Floreal, (May 19) left no more doubt upon this subject. It comprehends three objects perfectly distinct. It begins by rectifying, with the dignity which becomes the French Government, the statement of grievances of the United States, drawn up by their envoys in the inverted order of facts, on the 28th Nivose preceding, (17th January.) It next points out the reasons which prevented the negotiation from being carried on with the envoys collectively. It finally declares, solemnly, the conciliatory dispositions of the Executive Directory; its express desire of renewing, between the two countries, the ties of their former friendship; and the intention to treat with you. A declaration so explicit was made only to furnish the President of the United States with an infallible means of accommodation. It was a pledge of peace that might be taken up. I presumed you could not be long in receiving analogous instructions, and even other powers, if they were necessary; or that at least if you had announced to the President a wish to return to America, another envoy would come to consummate the happy work, which we should have had the satisfaction to prepare.

With such well grounded hopes were mingled considerations upon the inconveniences of your departure. I have given you to understand that, notwithstanding the assurances you have given me, nobody would believe that it was owing solely to your inclination, to a thorough conviction of the invalidity of your powers, or to a wish to see the care of the negotiation confided to other hands. I have conversed with you respecting the conjectures which it would give rise to; on the means it would furnish the British cabinet, which spares nothing to draw France and the United States to extremities, from which it calculates to derive the sole profit; and on the suspicions even which the French Government would be made to conceive. I endeavored to make you see into its possible consequences. The happening of several circumstances has already retarded the reconciliation of the two republics. It may be permitted to him, who sincerely wishes for peace, to fear new ones. These views, for which I shall ever honor myself, induced me to resist, as much as I could, the desire you manifested of quitting France. You decisively insist upon it in your letter of the 22d of this month, (10th July.) The Executive Directory has consequently authorized me to send you the passports which you request, for yourself and the vessel which awaits you at Havre. You will find them enclosed.

May your return to the United States, and the communication of what has passed between us, since you have solely represented your Government, remove there the injurious opinion of hostile intentions on the part of France: you have often repeated to me, since you pressed your departure, that if you could not treat here as an envoy, your good offices in the United States should not be spared as a citizen. You have it not in your power to render to the two countries a more signal service, than by contributing to make their political and commercial relations accord with their inclination and interest. Assure your Government that the Executive Directory perseveres in the intention of conciliating with sincerity, the differences which have arisen between the French republic and the United States, as soon as an opportunity for that purpose shall be sincerely presented. If it be really true that the dispositions of your Government correspond therewith, let it give a proof of it, and you may answer beforehand for the success.

You cannot dissemble, sir, that if nothing prevented you from pursuing with me the examining and reconciling of the grievances which divide the two countries, we should not long stand in need of any thing but the respective ratifications.

Who will doubt of the sincerity of the French Government, when it shall be known that, for nearly three months every pressing solicitation came from me, and that, faithful to the engagements I have made in my note of the 28th Ventose, (18th March) I have been the first seriously to press the negotiation after the departure of Messrs. Pinckney and Marshall? It will not be said, I hope, that the refusal to treat with them is a refusal of conciliation, because this refusal was accompanied with a promise to treat with you, and your full powers presented you as separately authorized.

I shall incessantly appeal to that document, because it is the foundation of the opinion which the Government must have formed; and even admitting that you were tied down by secret restrictions, I could not in my mind oppose what I did not know, on account of the credence due to the ostensible power.

Yes, sir, when scarcely informed of the departure of Messrs. Pinckney and Marshall, I endeavored, in every conference I afterwards had with you, to demonstrate to you the urgency, the propriety, and the possibility of an active negotiation. I collected your ideas; they differed from my own; I endeavored to reconcile them, and I was about to transmit some propositions to you, when a packet from your Government arrived at Havre. You then appeared to be preparing to depart. Until then I never supposed you entertained the design of embarking before we had come to an agreement upon the definitive articles to be ratified by your Government. A few days afterwards, I received some despatches from Philadelphia, the contents of which for a moment gave a new course to my correspondence with you. On the 22d Prairial, (10th June) I notified you that the dispositions of the Executive Directory were the same, and I prayed you to inform me, whether you were finally in a situation to negotiate. On the 30th Prairial, (18th June) I transmitted to you a complete plan of the negotiations. On the 9th Messidor, (27th June) I sent you my first note for discussion upon one of the points of our treaties, which are unexecuted in the United States. You declined answering it. It is necessary, however, to be agreed upon the details in order to arrive at the conclusions. On the 18th Messidor, (6th July) I sent you two others. In vain I accompanied these documents with the most cordial invitation rapidly to run over with me this series of indispensable discussions upon all our grievances. You have not even given me an opportunity of proving what liberality the Executive Directory would use on the occasion. You never wrote, in fact, but for your departure. And it is the French republic, which is accused in the United States with not wishing for peace! Perfidious instigators will insinuate that it never wished it. I will therefore ascend to the period when the first symptoms of discontent manifested themselves, that is to say, to the arrival of the minister Genet at Philadelphia in Prairial of the 1st year. An universal joy burst forth in the United States at the declarations he was charged to make. He then expressed the friendly and generous intentions of the French Government, which, powerful in the national energy, forbore to claim aid from its allies. Some of his measures soon afterwards gave umbrage. They were the effect of a zeal badly adapted to local circumstances, and unfortunately still worse interpreted. The President caused his complaints concerning them to be made in France at the close of the same year. The committee of public safety immediately rendered satisfaction; and other agents arrived at Philadelphia in the beginning of Ventose, 2d year: their instructions will bear the utmost publicity: not to interfere in any party matter; to respect the Government; to prompt it to maintain its neutrality with vigor; to repress all armaments which might endanger it; to maintain the rights secured to France by its treaties: such is the substance of them: such also were the instructions given to the minister Adet, who succeeded them in the 3d year. Surely nothing cah be more pacific. Nevertheless, the rights of France are insensibly forgotten; the most important clauses of its treaties are rendered insignificant: its vessels experience the most discouraging vexations; England sports with impunity with the neutrality of the United States, which to France, who is too confident in it, becomes a source of loss. A transaction clandestinely negotiated ends by consecrating, to the detriment of a friendly nation, the pretensions of its implacable enemy. After that time, nothing has passed between the American Government which the representations thwart, and the ministers plenipotentiary of the republic, who could not avoid making them, but a correspondence gradually increasing in asperity. The French Government never interferes in them: it reposes upon the hope, that their own interest would lead the United States to perceive that England was drawing them within its vortex. Far from taking an hostile attitude, it affects indifference in order to show itself patient with dignity. The crowd of complaints which it receives, obliges it finally to change this line of conduct. It causes its grievances to be declared on the 25th Brumaire, 5th year, (November 15, 1796) and in order to produce a negotiation, too long delayed, it draws from the treaties of Paris and of London the most suitable means of hastening it. It is animated by no view of aggression, by no hostile intention. In order to obtain from the United States some degree of justice, it places them in a situation to be obliged to demand an arrangement themselves. Let us now see whether it has rejected any honorable propositions.

Mr. Pinckney had departed before the declaration of the 25th Brumaire (November 15, 1796) which suspended the customary relations. He came to succeed Mr. Monroe, and, like him, to explain and palliate the conduct of the United States, without any special power for the negotiation demanded by France. He could not be received, because he was not in a situation to fulfil the conditions required, upon the resumption of political connexions. The President of the United States thought it his duty to call an extraordinary meeting of the Legislature. I shall not review the opening speech, nor the turn which the debates took in that session. But I will say, that the impression, which resulted therefrom, at Paris, was unfavorable previous to the arrival of the envoys; that this circumstance alone raised an obstacle, which ought to have been foreseen at Philadelphia; that the envoys themselves, unwilling to comprehend the natural effect of this kind of provocation, have contributed to render the impression more durable. It has finally, however, yielded to the primitive desire of a sincere reconciliation. You find a proof of it in the very expedient suggested of treating with you separately; for a Government hostilely disposed would not have taken the delicate course which guards its honor and fulfils its pacific intentions.

You have given me to understand, sir, that it would have been well had the Executive Directory supported the declarations which I have made to you in its name, by a change in the measures which affect the commerce of the United States.

I might answer you, that your Government might have also secured its object by restoring at first the French republic to the rights which flow from its treaties. But let us exact less rigidly and be more equitable towards each other. Although the measures of France are no more than the consequence of those of the United States, you must have remarked, that, in my propositions of the 30th Prairial (18th June) the intention of the Executive Directory is, that the respective pretensions may be collaterally examined and adjusted. It intends to place, in a single act, a durable monument of the future friendship of the two republics, and the justice which they owe to each other, and no idea of false glory enters its mind. On taking leave of you, sir, I have supposed that I owed you a testimony of my esteem: it consists altogether in the unreservedness with which I have just spoken to you, and in the expression of the regret which your departure, under the present circumstances, gives me.

Receive the assurance of my perfect consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

P. S. of the 27th Messidor, (July 15, 1798.)

A circumstance, sir, of infinite importance, has delayed the despatching of this letter. I do not know how it happens that at every step towards a reconciliation a cause of irritation intervenes, and that the United States always give rise to it. Some days since different advices were successively received by the Executive Directory. It seems that, hurried beyond every limit, your Government no longer preserves appearances. A law of the 7th of last month authorizes it to cause every French vessel of war to be attacked, which may have stopped or intended to stop American vessels. A resolution of the House of Representatives suspends, from the 13th of this month, all commercial relations with the French republic and its possessions. Several plans of a law have been proposed for banishing the French and sequestrating French property.

The long suffering of the Executive Directory is about to manifest itself in the most unquestionable manner. Perfidy will no longer be able to throw a veil over the pacific dispositions which it has never ceased to manifest.

It is at the very moment of this fresh provocation, which would appear to leave no honorable choice but war, that it confirms the assurances which I have given you on its behalf. In the present crisis, it confines itself to a measure of security and self-preservation, by laying a temporary embargo on American vessels, with a reserve of indemnities, if there be occasion for them. It is yet ready, it is as much disposed as ever, to terminate, by a candid negotiation the differences which subsist between the two countries. Such is its repugnance to consider the United States as enemies, that, notwithstanding their hostile demonstrations, it means to wait until it be irresistibly forced to it by real hostilities.

Since you will depart, sir, hasten, at least, to transmit to your Government this solemn declaration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

No. 24.

Mr. Gerry to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French Republic.

PARIS, July 20, 1798.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

I received, on the 27th Messidor, (15th July) your letter of the 24th (the 12th of July) on which permit me to make some observations.

You allege that, in the United States, the French republic is accused of not wishing for peace, and to show that it was always desirous thereof, you recur to the arrival of Mr. Genet in America. Far from accusations of any kind, I wish to cultivate harmony between the two Governments, as the solid basis of peace. From that epoch, to the departure from the United States of Mr. Adet, the correspondence of the Secretaries of State of the United States, with the French ministers in America, and the American ministers in France, contains the history to that time, of the unhappy differences between the two republics, and evinces the sincere desire of the Government of the United States, amidst the inevitable embarrassments resulting from the convulsive state of Europe, to preserve harmony and friendship with the French republic, and to perform, with scrupulous attention, the duties of neutrality. If, by any unfortunate events, France had sustained injuries during that term, still the manifest disposition of the Government of the United States to justice and moderation, was a sure pledge of redress.

When Mr. Monroe was recalled, a minister was sent to supply his place, and you say, "he could not be received, because he was not in a situation to fulfil the conditions necessary for the renewal of the political connexions." Had he been received, he could have applied for other powers if necessary: nothing is more usual. The application, which you have so strenuously urged on my part, must have been for the renewal of powers annulled by the act of sending away the other envoys: surely, then, your arguments would have applied with much more force to the case of a minister, whose powers were only supposed inadequate to the objects of his mission. The act of rejecting this minister, accompanied with circumstances of high displeasure on the part of the Government of the French republic, could not fail to wound deeply the Government of the United States, and to produce observations on such an important event. Let the cause and effect be buried in oblivion: the remembrance thereof cannot promote harmony. This you will readily accede to, when you consider the amicable and attentive conduct immediately adopted by the American Government, in sending three envoys extraordinary with adequate powers to effect a reconciliation and a renewal of a commercial intercourse between the republics.

From the arrival of the envoys at Paris to the departure of two of them, the objects of their mission were defeated by insuperable bars arising from demands of loans, which, violating the neutrality of the United States, would have involved them in immediate war, and of procuring reparations for the observations hinted at. Towards the end of that period, after imposing on me secrecy, you stated the embarrassments and dissatisfaction of the Executive Directory, on account of the opinions and conversations of my colleagues, its determination not to treat with them, and its desire to negotiate with me; and you added, that my departure would produce an immediate rupture. Astonished as I was at this communication, I informed you that I had no powers to treat separately; the measure was impossible; and that had my powers been adequate, a treaty made under such circumstances could never be ratified by my Government. You differed from me, we reasoned on the subject, and each adhered to his opinion. I urged, in vain, the unreasonableness of admitting prejudices against my colleagues, without informing them of the causes thereof; the good effect in removing these, which might result from such information, and the necessity of making known to them all that had now passed between us. You held me to the promise of secrecy, adding that, if I would negotiate, we could soon finish a treaty; for the Executive Directory were not in the habit of spending much time about such matters. You desired another interview, in which, after a discussion of the subject, I confirmed and adhered to my determination. In this state affairs remained for some time, and I flattered myself with the hope that, failing in the proposition for negotiating with me separately, your next would be to accredit the three envoys; in such an event the secrecy mentioned would have been proper. This expectation was strengthened by the two subsequent interviews which they had with you; and you may judge of my surprise on the receipt of your letter of the 28th Ventose, (18th of March) containing a refusal to treat with two of the envoys, and renewing the proposition to treat with me. Finding that I was the person alluded to, and that all hopes of our being jointly accredited were at an end, I again refused, in the most positive terms, to negotiate separately: another proposition was then made, that, to prevent a rupture, I should remain here till information could be sent to my Government of the events. Embarrassing as such a state was, I submitted to it, rather than to bring on a war. You afterwards sent me your note of the 14th Germinal, (3d April) proposing that I should resume our reciprocal communications upon the interests of the French republic and the United States. To this I replied on the 4th of April "that I could only confer informally and unaccredited, on any subject respecting our mission, and communicate to the Government of the United States the result of such conferences; being, in my individual capacity, unauthorized to give them an official stamp." The day after the departure from Paris of the last of my colleagues, I again addressed you, and quoting the above paragraph, informed you that this I considered as the line of conduct well understood to be observed on my part; to this you made no objection, verbally or by writing, and thus acquiesced in it. Had you not, I should have immediately demanded my passport.

At one of our first interviews, after that letter, you stated a difficulty in adopting the plan proposed by my letter of the 20th of April, from your not being informed of the wishes of the Government of the United States in regard to a treaty: these were so reasonable that I thought it best to communicate them to you; and according to your own opinion, since expressed, they would require little or no time for discussion: nothing can exceed them for moderation or justice. Believing that you were seriously disposed to bring forward the plan of a treaty, for the consideration of the Government of the United States, and being also convinced that the subject thereof had been so fully discussed, and was so well understood, as not to require much time to accomplish it, I informed you that I should embark for America in June; and although you objected to it in the first instance, you afterwards appeared to be fully convinced of the necessity of it, promised to digest the plan proposed without delay, and to send it to me for examination. I conferred with you, at different times, on the expediency of sending a minister to Philadelphia to complete the negotiation; and you promised to consider of it. At length the Sophia arrived, and a few days afterwards you informed me that I might make myself quite easy, that France did not wish a war with the United States; that she had no thoughts of it; that the American affairs were before the Executive Directory; and that every thing would be arranged to my wishes. I again stated the necessity of sending a minister to America to complete the negotiation. You said you would propose one to the Executive Directory. This I could not suppose was for the purpose you have since stated, of residing there after the ratification of the treaty.

Thus were matters circumstanced until the arrival of the gazettes, containing the despatches of the envoys to their Government, which gave more than a momentary turn to your correspondence with me. When I informed you that I should embark in the Sophia, as soon as she could be fitted for sea, there was still time to finish the plan of the treaty, and to send it by me, if expedient. You desired me to remain here; I told you my return was indispensable, and gave you no other reason. I thought that sufficient. You conceive it depended on me to be publicly received by the Executive Directory; but our opinions are different on this point. A Government sends three envoys to treat with another Government; this rejects two of them, and proposes to treat with the third. Candor must admit, I think, that the latter cannot accept the proposal, without transferring, in this instance, the Executive authority of his Government, who would only have nominated three envoys to the foreign Government, who would have appointed one of them. You say that if my powers are altered by the departure of my colleagues, yet, on my own hypothesis, I ought to have referred the question to my Government, and in the interim to have fixed with you, by a calm and amicable discussion, all the contentious points of our differences. If my Government, as you repeatedly have asserted, was apprized before the 20th of March of the proposition to treat with me separately, it is evident that it was not disposed to send me new powers; for the Sophia sailed on the 28th of that month, and knowing this, you still urged me to make the application. I have been always ready, and had you come forward with the project of a treaty, would have entered into a calm and amicable conference with you on every part of it; but not into a formal epistolary discussion, which was not proposed till some time after I was ready to embark, was only relative to the consular convention, which will soon expire, was contrary to my stipulation relative to conferences, in which you acquiesced, and would have required months to be completed.

You was the first, you affirm, to press seriously the negotiation: you will agree with me that the merit would have been greater had the measure itself been feasible.

You frequently remind me of your exertions, which I am disposed as much as possible to appreciate, regretting at the same time their circuitous direction. On my part, I think you will be convinced that every thing has been done which circumstances herein truly detailed would admit.

It is with pleasure I learn that the Executive Directory is still ready, and is as much disposed as ever to terminate, by a liberal negotiation, the differences which subsist between the two countries.

This disposition has always existed on the part of the Government of the United States. A negotiation, then, if set on foot free from all propositions of loans and explanations of speeches, to be held, if necessary, in a city of some neutral nation, and providing for a decision by three or five commissioners of all points which may not be determined by direct negotiation, would still be accompanied, in my opinion, with success: but having no authority, I cannot make the proposition. A preliminary measure appears to be requisite, in which the dignity of this Government is as deeply concerned as the interest of the United States. The depredations, outrages, and cruelties, committed on our commerce and citizens, in the West Indies and on our coasts, by French privateers, some of which it is said have no commissions, are perhaps seldom paralleled amongst civilized nations. It is said that this Government has not been early apprized of these events, which have been a great source of irritation in the United States, and a principal cause of the repressive measures adopted by them. A recall of the commissions of the privateers, and restraining them by severe penalties to the proper objects of capture, cannot fail to have a happy effect.

You claim a promise of my good offices as a private citizen in America. These shall not be wanting to represent truly every measure of this Government, and to render successful all such as may be well adapted to effect a reconciliation. This is all that can be expected of me, and the duty which I owe to my country will require it.

And now, citizen minister, having given you a testimony of my esteem, such as results from a frank and candid conduct, I bid you adieu, wishing sincerely a speedy renewal of amity and commerce between the two republics.

Accept, citizen minister, the assurances of my perfect consideration.

LIBERTY. EQUALITY.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. Gerry, envoy of the United States.

PARIS, 4th Thermidor, (July 22, 1798*)*
6th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

Allow me, sir, to confine myself to the two last paragraphs of your answer of the 2d of this month to my letter of the 24th Messidor, (July 12.) Easy as it may be to rectify those which go before, it would be to enter uselessly into the circle of digressions. It is my duty to feel what in the state of things you think due to your Government; and this consideration would be alone sufficient to stop me if I set a less value upon conciliation.

You repeat to me that the Government of the United States has always been disposed to terminate amicably the differences which subsist between the two republics. This fresh assurance, at a time when hostile demonstrations have just been made, could not but temper their effect. But, let then, a frank, candid, and truly amicable act speedily realize those dispositions. Far from entering into the answers of the President to the addresses which have been presented to him from different parts of the United States, whatsoever they may be, I would fain behold in his expressions nothing but a political expedient. I do not thence judge less favorably of the true intentions which you profess in his name, and I would not have engaged you to warrant the success of the first proof which he will render of them, if the Executive Directory, which was ready to receive you, had not made a fixed determination upon the subject. A negotiation may therefore be resumed even at Paris, where I flatter myself you have observed nothing but testimonies of esteem, and where every envoy who shall unite your advantages cannot fail to be well received. Moreover, I know not, sir, why you tell me that it would be requisite to lop from this negotiation every preliminary respecting a loan, and explanations on the subject of the speeches delivered. Be pleased to read over again the propositions which I transmitted to you on the 30th Prairial, (June 18;) they contain all the ideas of the French Government; and you will not find in them a word which justifies your recurring to those two questions. An odious intrigue had got possession of them: the dignity of the French Government could not permit this mixture; and it did not wish that views as pure as its own should be associated therewith hereafter. As to the preliminary measures which you suggest, sir, the Government has already anticipated your desire. By information which it has just received, it indeed learns that violences have been committed upon the commerce and citizens of the United States in the West Indies, and on their coasts. Do it the justice to believe that it needs only to know the facts, to disavow all acts contrary to the laws of the republic and its own decrees. A remedy is preparing for it, and orders will soon arrive in the West Indies calculated to cause every thing to return within its just limits, until an amicable arrangement between France and the United States shall re-establish them respectively in the enjoyment of their treaties.

This period, sir, cannot be too near at hand. I do not cease to regret, that you should refuse yourself the accelerating of it, by yielding to circumstances, persuaded as I ever am, that you were fully authorized.

Accept my wishes for your happy passage, and the assurance of my perfect consideration.

Mr. Gerry having seen in the Redacteur of this morning the publication of a letter to him from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the French republic, dated the 24th Messidor, (12th of July) requests him to order a just translation of the answer dated the 20th of July, to be also published. Mr. G. being on the eve of his departure from Paris, presumes the minister will readily comply herewith, to prevent partial and undue impressions against him in his absence.

Presuming, sir, that you have not yet embarked, I address to you a decree of the Executive Directory, wherein you will find a part of the measures which I announced to you the 4th of this month. Its solicitude will not be confined to that. Neutrals, in general, will have reason soon to be convinced of its firm attachment to the principles to which it is desirous that all the maritime nations might agree. It depends upon the United States, in particular, to cause every misunderstanding immediately to disappear between them and the French republic.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my perfect consideration.

No. 29.

Extract from the Registers of the Deliberations of the Executive Directory.

PARIS, the 13th Thermidor, 6th year of the French republic,
(July 31, 1798.)

The Executive Directory having heard the report of the Minister of Marine and the Colonies;

Considering that information recently received from the French colonies and the continent of America leave no room to doubt that French cruisers, or such as call themselves French, have infringed the laws of the republic relative to cruising and prizes;

Considering that foreigners and pirates have abused the latitude allowed at Cayenne, and in the West Indian islands, to vessels fitted out for cruising, or for war and commerce, in order to cover with the French flag their extortions, and the violation of the respect due to the law of nations, and to the persons and property of allies and neutrals;

Decrees—

ART. I. Hereafter no letters of marque, authorizations, or permissions, to fit out vessels either for cruising, or for war and commerce, shall be issued in the colonies of America, but by the special agents of the Directory themselves, who shall not delegate that power to any one: they shall exercise it only in favor of owners of vessels whose principles and responsibility are well known to them; and they shall be bound to conform themselves to all the laws relative to cruising and prizes, and especially to those of the 1st October, 1793 (O. S.)

ART. II. All letters of marque, authorizations, or permissions, granted in the colonies of America by the particular agents of the Executive Directory, and all other agents, civil and military, under their orders, to fit out vessels either for cruising, or for war and commerce, shall be considered as not having been done, after the thirtieth day from the publication of the present decree in the said colonies.

ART. III. All agents and other deputies in the neutral possessions, appointed to decide there upon the validity of prizes taken by the French cruisers, and who shall be suspected of having a direct or indirect interest in the vessels fitted out for cruising, or for war and commerce, shall be immediately recalled.

ART. IV. The special agents of the Executive Directory at Cayenne, St. Domingo, and Guadaloupe, shall studiously take care that the interests and property of vessels belonging to neutrals or allies, be scrupulously respected; and they shall in no case bargain for their cargoes, but by mutual consent, and to the full and entire satisfaction of the contracting parties.

ART. V. The said special agents of the Executive Directory, the commanders of all vessels of the republic, the consuls, vice consuls, and all others invested with powers for that purpose, shall cause to be arrested and punished, conformably to the laws, all those who shall contravene the provisions of the present decree, which shall be printed in the bulletin of the laws, and with the execution of which the ministers of foreign relations, and of the marine and the colonies, are charged.

PARIS, June 9, 1798.

SIR:

In your letter to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, of the 13th Prairial, published in the Bien Informé of this day, you have deviated in some points, not very material, from the statement communicated by the envoys of the Government of the United States respecting a conference which I had with the minister aforesaid on the 22d of October last, viz: that I requested the interview, instead of the minister, and that I met him twice on this communication, whereas I saw him but once. I wish, therefore, you would revise the statement referred to, and inform me whether it is not, to the best of your memory, literally true; it is precisely the same, without changing a word, which we communicated to my colleagues.

I am, sir, &c. E. GERRY.

Mr. HAUTEVAL.

No. 31.

PARIS, the 22d Prairial, 6th year, (June 10, 1798.)

SIR:

I have received the letter which you did me the honor to write to me yesterday, relative to that which I deemed it my duty to write to the Minister of Exterior Relations, on the 13th of this month, and which the Government caused to be printed.

It is not at all astonishing that my memory may not have served me with precision upon a subject which passed more than six months ago, and of which I have not taken notes. I undertook merely to repeat with exactness the essential heads, which I believe I have done.

I, indeed, recollect that, having been together at the minister's, and not having met with him, I left our names with his porter; that, having returned there the next day alone, he expressed to me his regret at not having been at home when you called there the day before, and charged me to tell you that he would receive you with a great deal of pleasure, on a day he assigned to me. The appointment, therefore, proceeded from the minister, and not from your request, as I have said in my letter; but the matter appears to me to be of little consequence.

The second error which you remind me of having committed, is that of having separated into two conferences what passed in one. On every occasion when I have had the pleasure to see the minister, I have always conversed with him on matters relating to the negotiations with the United States of America, the success of which I have never ceased anxiously to desire. In my letter, I might be mistaken in some details; but you, sir, could not, having immediately taken a written note of what had just passed between the minister, yourself, and me. I regret that I had not the pleasure to see you before I transmitted my letter to the minister. By communicating it to you, I should have rectified the two slight errors which crept into it; but I was constrained by the occasion, and was very far from thinking that it would be printed.

I shall ever be anxious to render homage to the truth, and to seize occasions of assuring you of my respectful attachment.

I have the honor to be, &c.

PARIS, July 16, 1798.

DEAR SIR:

Some part of the last instructions of the Secretary of State of the United States to the envoys, and to Mr. Humphreys, who brought the despatches, induces me to think, that, in the precarious state of our affairs with France, you may have conditional instructions, which may require particular information of what respects the existing state of affairs here. I have, therefore, thought it best to enclose, in the most perfect confidence, by my Secretary, Mr. Tazewell, the documents necessary to attain this object, and contained in the schedule annexed, for your use only. If you have not received such instructions, your prudence will dictate the necessity of observing the most profound secrecy, pending any subsequent measures which may take place for restoring friendship between the two republics.

I shall leave Paris for Havre as soon as possible, and expect on my arrival there to embark immediately for the United States.

Be assured that I remain, &c.

E. GERRY.

No. 33.

Extract of Mr. Gerry's letter to Dr. Tazewell, as far as it relates to Mr. King, minister of the United States at London.

MIGNON, July 27, 1798.

DEAR SIR:

The despatches for Mr. King are to be delivered to him by yourself; in the interim, you will please not to let them be put out of your possession, or communicated to any one.

No. 34.

Substance of a conference with the Dutch minister the 25th July, 1798.

Just before dinner, the Dutch minister called on me, and said he had received from Mr. Talleyrand a printed copy of his letter to me, dated 24th Messidor, (12th July) that the Dutch Government took a friendly part in the disputes between France and the United States, and that he came to offer his services, and the mediation of his Government, who had authorized and instructed him on this head.

I answered, that the conduct of Mr. Talleyrand, in publishing his letter to me, had an hostile appearance; that, if a mediation could be supposed necessary, it must be offered to the Government of the United States; I had no authority to accept it; that, if the Government of France was sincere in its declaration, made through M. Talleyrand, its minister, all that was wanting was to open a negotiation: for he had expressed a desire to show, by treaty, how well disposed France was to put an end to these disputes; that the Government of the United States was so reasonable and just in its demands that it could not fail to evince a good disposition to a reconciliation; that the etiquette of setting on foot a negotiation appeared, at present, to be the only embarrassment, more especially as the principal obstruction to a negotiation had ceased, this Government having relinquished all claims of loans and reparations on account of the President's speeches; that, as the United States had been twice defeated in sending ministers to Paris, the Government might not be disposed to send them a third time; and, that, if the French Government would propose some city in a neutral nation, as a place for opening a new negotiation, or, which would be better, would send a minister to the United States, I did not doubt it would succeed; that this was a mere matter of opinion: for I had no instructions on the subject; neither was I informed whether my Government had or had not formed an alliance with any other nation, as had been frequently reported. The Dutch minister answered that the proposal of a mediation must go to the Government, and inquired, in that case, if I would stay at Paris: I answered no, it was not necessary: neither did I conceive the propriety of offering, at this period, a mediation: the proper mode of settling disputes was, in the first instance, by treaty; if, in any points, this should fail, still there were other means besides the mediation of a third Power, which might be adopted; but that, if his Government wished to make the proposition, I would carefully transmit it to the Government of the United States.

He said that Mr. Talleyrand, who had styled his letter a pacific manifesto, and had sent a printed copy to each foreign minister, had no hostile intention in publishing it; but considered it as a friendly measure. I answered we then had different views of the subject. I then showed the answer to that letter, which the Dutch minister read. I thought it necessary, for the information of his Government, to make to him the communications mentioned.

No. 35.

Upon the communications made by the President of the United States to the American Congress, on the 14th Germinal, 6th year, (April 3, 1798.)

The American and English papers have lately resounded with the publication of the most strange communications, which the envoys of the United States have thought it their duty to make to their Government. It is, with respect to those envoys, a deplorable monument of credulity and contradictions; and it is, with respect to that Government, a provocation still more deplorable.

It is requisite, by the evidence of facts and the very words of the envoys themselves, to show their inconceivable error. It is requisite, by the force of reason and the mere sentiment of the happiness of the two republics, to answer to the provocation so visibly suggested by the British Government.

That Government, indeed, after so many and such ridiculous efforts against the French republic, endeavors to organize corruption around it. Grown desperate on account of so many glorious treaties of peace which the latter has concluded, it has flattered itself, by its peculiar perfidies, to rekindle the former wars in Europe, and to excite against it a new war in America; but all this system of British corruption shall be exposed and confounded; and the American people shall know the height of the precipice to which they are urged by the servile friends of their former oppressors.

For a long time the French republic complained, and certainly it had a right to do so, against the inexecution of the most important parts of the convention of 1788, concluded between France and the United States. The maritime hostilities were soon followed by the most aggravating injuries. It was in vain that the republic made a sacrifice of armaments, which might compromit the American neutrality.

The most legitimate of its armaments was soon after contested. The French vessels experienced a thousand vexations. Their prizes were no longer under the protection of the treaties. The courts of justice arrogated a jurisdiction over them; lengthy and ruinous chicaneries discouraged the captors; the French ports in the two worlds were soon declared to be blockaded by British proclamations; the vessels which departed from them were stopped on a loose suspicion of being enemies' property; those which carried provisions thither were turned back. On the other hand, the British ships of war entered the ports of the United States, after seizing French property or property claimed to be such. By degrees they became stationary there, and made of them military stations, whence they attacked both the French, and the Americans in connexion with France. The republic, however, confined itself to appealing to its treaties with the United States, and to pressing their Government to cause their own neutrality to be respected. They answered it with a treaty clandestinely negotiated and concluded with Great Britain.

Does this treaty, however, secure the neutrality of the United States? No. It renders the presence of the English forces in their ports lawful; it gives to England rights which, in the midst of war, ameliorate its situation to the prejudice of France; it allows the facility of again starving France and its colonies; it sacrifices the generous principles established, in favour of the liberty of the seas, in former treaties.

France makes complaints; the American Government eludes, and wanders from them; it multiplies official notes without approaching the main point of the question. Reparations are demanded; they are not made. It speaks of nothing but wrongs experienced by the United States; it skips over those which it makes France suffer; the treaty of 1778 is rendered more and more insignificant; and the last blows are struck at the French cruisers in the American seas, by the prohibition to sell their prizes. The republic is under the necessity, in order to manifest its too long suspended resentment, and bring about a negotiation, to appropriate to itself the same clauses of the English treaty. At length the United States, sensible only to the disagreeable consequences which have resulted therefrom to themselves, appeared to wish a reconciliation.

Three commissioners have been sent for that end to the French republic: two of them, General Pinckney and Mr. Marshall, manifesting against France prejudices brought from America, or imbibed from the nature of the connexions which they lost no time in forming here; and the third, Mr. Gerry, announcing more impartiality, and manifesting himself more disposed to lend a favorable ear to every thing which might reconcile the two republics.

From this ill-suited union, which disclosed dispositions not very conciliatory, there must needs result, and there has in fact resulted, a crooked and embarrassed career, on the part of those commissioners: hence, in their constant aversion to do what might reconcile, their eagerness to write what might disgust.

At first they manifested a desire to be acknowledged; but explanations of some expressions, evidently insulting to the republic, which were contained in the opening speech of the President of the United States, were demanded from them as a previous condition. They did more than to refuse; they did not even comprehend this demand; and had recourse to groundless recriminations. Soon afterwards a willingness appeared to spare them the embarrassment of the disavowals; and in order to detach them from England, and to restore, in small degree, the balance so strongly inclined in favor of that Power, by the last treaty, it was wished that an unequivocal proof of attachment to our cause, which so recently was their own, might be obtained from them: it suited the finances to exchange, at that period, for specie, some Batavian inscriptions at gradual instalments: the Minister of Foreign Relations gave them to understand, that their offering to purchase a certain quantity of them would be considered as a friendly act. They said they did not possess the power: and they showed that they had not the will. To come at some accommodation, some friendly explanation, frequent communications with the Minister of the Exterior were necessary. The latter complained publicly that he did not see them, and they avowed that he caused them to be often informed of this reproach; but two of the commissioners, shielding themselves under ceremony, refused to comply with the desire. Mr. Gerry at length resolved to go; spoke twice with the minister; and whether from embarrassment in explaining himself, or fear of compromitting himself, he said but little, and did not venture to decide on any thing.

In the mean time the envoys thought themselves bound to transmit to the President of the United States a very voluminous account of their negotiation. Of what then could this account be composed? It was necessary to fill it with the despicable manœuvres of all the intriguers, who, seeing the commissioners charged with the most important interests, secluding themselves from the Government, with which they ought to treat, hastened to gather round them, and infatuated them with the idea of their credit and the opinion of their importance.

One of these intriguers appears to have grounded himself on some acquaintance which, as a foreigner, having a recommendation, he had succeeded in obtaining with the minister: another, (and it is the one who is the most active) grounds himself solely upon the acquaintance which he had with the first intriguer; for he declares that he does not even know the minister. Such, moreover, is the situation of the man, whoever he may be, who is placed at the head of this department, that he is obliged to receive and listen to many persons, who are far from having any share in his confidence, and he has no means of preventing the abuse they may make, in his absence, of the most insignificant visits, of which they avail themselves, as suits their interest, with men of no experience.

In the publication which the American Government has made of the report of its envoys, these persons, without being avowed, are designated each by a letter. The minister, impatient to know their names, demanded them with importunity, and finally obtained the communication, which he immediately handed to the proper authority. It will be learned with pleasure that they are foreigners, and it will be readily believed that they did justice to themselves by hastening to quit the territory of the republic. Only one of those letters, Z., designates a Frenchman, who hastened to declare himself.* The language he held is irreproachable: he is presented as having sometimes served as interpreter; but it is clearly seen that he interpreted none but honorable propositions.

As to the foreigners who are seen figuring in this negotiation, it appears that the object of their whole intrigue was to obtain from the Americans a sum of one million two hundred thousand livres, to be distributed for corrupt purposes. Hence begin and end all the bustle, all the conversations, all the proceedings, minutely detailed in the report of the envoys.

It will be for ever inconceivable that men, authorized to represent the United States near the French republic, could have been for an instant deceived by manœuvres no evidently counterfeit, and that there should exist a temptation to convert the error in this respect into bad faith.

What! Three men are sent envoys from America to France to negotiate there a reconciliation between the two republics: embarrassed in a preliminary matter, they cannot at once confer with the minister as commissioners; but they have a thousand ways of seeing him as individuals, either at his own house or elsewhere; and two of them constantly refuse all the facilities which are offered to them.

This is not all: we see them present the details of their negotiation, as if persuaded that the disgusting propositions, which they say were made to them, were addressed by a man clothed with the confidence of the Government; and, nevertheless, in the course of their recital, they suffer an avowal to escape, that they several times suspected these clandestine communications, and that they finally decided to reject them for the future. Mr. Gerry even declares positively, that these meddlers did not produce any authority or any documents of any kind whatever.† At the same time, they continued to decline the direct communications, which were offered to them continually by the minister. Is not all this a labyrinth of contradictions?

And when we examine by what a series of intermediate persons they thought to approach the minister, whom it was so easy to them to consult immediately, is it not rendered impossible for us to think that they have seriously adopted the consequences of their recital?

Here it is a lady known to be connected with Mr. Pinckney, who holds with him the most innocent discourse, which has been repeated to him from one end of France to the other: lend us (says she to him one day) money in our war; we lent it to you in yours: and a conversation thus simple is taken up by Mr. Pinckney, who finds it necessary to write every thing, and to poison every thing; it is mysteriously sent by him to his Government, as if it had any relation to the clandestine propositions made by the intriguers: thus minute is distrust! Thus is prejudice led astray in its reasonings! In this manner are the politics of some men a pest to social intercourse!

There is one W. whom we have not succeeded in discovering, who introduces to General Pinckney one X., a very hasty fellow, who says he is charged with a message from the minister; who being soon afterwards pressed to answer whether he is personally known to him, is forced to say no; but that he has the propositions which he made from Y. who, he says, had connexions with the minister; and nevertheless when they want to intrust Y. with the negative answer to his proposition for the one million two hundred thousand livres, he declined being charged with it, and is compelled to avow, through a kind of shame, and at the risk of discrediting the part he was playing, that the proposition did not come from the Directory, nor even from the minister; and that it came solely from him, Y., who was desirous of saving the envoys the mortification of the disavowals. If these same men have afterwards held a different language, was it not natural for the envoys for ever to mistrust their reports, and, above all, to endeavor to reach the source? They have not done so. How can this conduct be reconciled either with reason or good faith?

In the same report they manifest themselves desirous of informing their Government, with the utmost detail, of every thing which passed in relation to their commission; and whilst with such a scrupulous care they collect so many absurdities and miserable puerilities, they are silent upon the official communications, which the persons employed in the office of exterior relations had with them on behalf of the minister. It is, without doubt, because those communications, agreeing with the few which the minister himself made, were pure, upright, and calculated to do honor to the French Government. It was part of their plan to pass them over in silence. The others, so suspicious in their origin, were defamatory in their object. They had the utmost impatience to make them known.*

They had just presented a voluminous memorial setting forth their pretended grievances. They well knew that the minister was about to address a note to them in answer, which ought to have formed one of the authentic documents of the negotiation, and which, in fact, was sent to them in the month of Ventose last, (March 19.) They hastened to publish every thing that evidently did not come from the minister, and which they endeavored to impute to him, in order, doubtless, to weaken thereby the very different impression which must have been produced by the note, wherein every thing breathes a sincere desire to conciliate.

This group of facts presents such a tissue of incongruities and contradictions, that the mind is lost in it. One is at a loss to specify with precision the reproaches to be made to the American envoys. But it is very evident that they have been most strangely deceived, if they did not believe, and that they are most perfidious, if they did not believe what they relate. [In the expression of these reproaches which escape from indignation, it is requisite to hasten to except Mr. Gerry, who, doubtless, may have been deceived both by the foreign intriguers, and perhaps, also, by his very colleagues, but to whom no suspicion of bad faith or insincerity can attach.]

Now, what could be the secret motive which caused such puerile communications to be circulated with so much eclat? How, then, can they justify the pompous affectation by which the American people has been prepared to hear them? How can we conceive that it was hoped to render the farce more imposing by fasts and public prayers?

Doubtless, a great object caused them to hazard the holding up as discoveries of the greatest importance the incoherent prating of two intriguers, who were foreigners with respect to France. Perhaps it was supposed that the citizens of the United States would judge of the French Government by these caricatures, and that the French Government would be sensible to such a marked provocation. The effect of the outrage was calculated from the malignity of the intention, and not from the littleness of the means.

In one word, they flattered themselves with exciting indignation instead of pity. They wish for war; and they wished that insulted France might declare it against a people whose cause she defended, and that it might be restored by her to the arms of England.

By that war, the British cabinet would gain an ally who would labor for its interest, second its projects upon the French and Spanish colonies, and retard the moment of its humiliation; by that war, too, the British Government would accelerate the execution of a favorite plan of which it has never lost sight.

It is known that, since it despaired of re-uniting to the triple crown the States whose independence it was obliged to acknowledge, it aspired at least to prejudice them in favor of limited monarchy; that it endeavored to fortify, by the similarity of constitutional forms, the habits common to the English and American people; and that it took care to keep for a long time one of the sons of George III. in the vicinity of the United States. Can it, then, be true that, to the disgrace of the human mind, many citizens of the United States should be found who are seriously reconciled to the English form of government? Can it, then, be true that men, called by the public confidence to the head of the Government of the United States, have written in favor of the British constitution, merely to prepare its adoption in their own country? Can it be true that a thirst for honors, greediness of wealth, and a desire of perpetuating power, have already ripened this conspiracy against liberty?

If this ought to be no longer considered as a suspicion, all is explained. War is necessary in order to raise troops and obtain supplies: an unnatural war against old friends, against brothers, against republicans, is more expecially necessary. It is necessary that this war should excite civil commotions; shock every idea of morality; and rouse to resistance the true sons of America: and pretences will arise in abundance for stigmatizing with sedition the honorable defenders of principles, and for substituting a monarchical in the room of a representative government.

It would be hereafter unnecessary to dissemble. Such are the criminal practices of the English cabinet. Such is the blind propensity of a Government which it influences; and it is the French republic which sacrificed the blood and fortune of its citizens in the cause of liberty; it is the French republic that is instigated to strike the fatal blow! But superior to the influence of her resentments, she will be actuated by nothing but the happiness of the two republics, and she will appeal to the whole universe to judge of the sincerity of the dispositions which she has never ceased, and which she will never cease, to manifest, for living in peace with America.

P. S. It is of extreme importance to lay before the public the letters written to Mr. Gerry, envoy of the United States, by the Minister of Exterior Relations as soon as this strange publication came to his knowledge; and it is of equal importance to know the answers given by Mr. Gerry. Both are as follow. [See the preceding numbers 6, 7, 8, 10, 11.]

NOTE.—The names were in fact sent to the minister, who immediately deposited them in the proper place.

[The following letter of the citizen, designated by the letter Z. it is not less essential to publish.]

13th Prairial, 6th year, (June 1, 1798.)

TO THE MINISTER OF EXTERIOR RELATIONS:

Mr. Gerry having communicated to me the letter which you yesterday wrote to him, by which you expressly desire that he may make known to you the persons meant by the letters W. X. Y. Z. in the correspondence of the American envoys, printed in a public paper of the United States of America, dated April 12, (O. S.)

My sensibility must be much affected on finding myself, under the letter Z., acting a part in company with certain intriguers, whose plan it doubtless was to take advantage of the good faith of the American envoys and make them their dupes. Finding myself implicated in this affair, and wishing to remove my uneasiness respecting the disagreeable impressions, and the consequence which the publication of your letter to Mr. Gerry might produce, I thought it my duty to hasten to you, and pray you, citizen minister, to be pleased to declare in writing that, in the conferences I had with those gentlemen, I pursued the communications which you authorized me to make to them, in the manner I shall state below.

*See in the second letter of Mr. Gerry, dated 15th Prairial, (June 3, 1798) which follows these reflections, the express declaration of Mr. Gerry, that, in the course of the negotiations, he saw persons employed by the office of exterior relations, and the justice he does them of never having uttered a word which had the least relation to propositions, such as the intriguing foreigners X. and Y. appeared to have made.

In the beginning of last Brumaire, (October 22, 1797,) having been to pay my respects to the citizen Minister of Exterior Relations, and, the conversation turning upon the United States of America, he expressed to me his surprize that none of the Americans, and especially the new envoys, ever came to his house; that this was not the way to open a negotiation, the success of which they had more reason than we to wish; that he would receive them individually with great pleasure, and particularly Mr. Gerry, whom he had known at Boston. Knowing my friendly connexions with Mr. Gerry, he charged me to impart to them what he had said. I accordingly waited on Mr. Gerry, who, having sent for his colleagues, I communicated to them the conversation I had had with the citizen minister.

Messrs. Pinckney and Marshall declined waiting on the minister upon the ground of ceremony; but as the same reason did not apply to Mr. Gerry, it was agreed that he should go the next day, and that I should accompany him, Mr. Gerry at that time not being able to express himself in French. The next day we went; but not finding the minister at home, Mr. Gerry requested him to appoint a time for an interview, which was fixed for a few days after. We attended accordingly, and, after the usual compliments, Mr. Gerry having expressed to the minister his desire to see harmony and a good understanding re-established between the two republics, the minister answered him that the Directory had made a determination not to treat with them, unless they previously made reparation for some parts of the President's speech at the opening of Congress, and gave an explanation of some others; that he could not delay, but for a few days, communicating this determination officially to them; that, until then, if they had any propositions to make, which could be agreeable to the Directory, he would communicate them with alacrity; that considering the circumstance, and the services of the same kind which France had formerly rendered to the United States, the best way would be for them to offer to make a loan to France, either by taking Batavian inscriptions for the sum of fifteen or sixteen millions of florins, or in any other manner. Mr. Gerry, after having replied in a polite, but evasive manner to the first article, added, on the subject of the loan, that their powers did not extend so far, but that he would confer with his colleagues upon the subject. It is to be observed that, as the minister spoke nothing but French, I repeated in English to Mr. Gerry what he had said to him, and that, although certain that he very well understood the answers of Mr. Gerry, I repeated them to him in French. We took our leave of the minister who had just received a courier, and he charged me, on parting, to repeat to Mr. Gerry and his colleagues what he had said to us. Accordingly I repeated to Messrs. Pinckney and Marshall, in the presence of Mr. Gerry, the conversation which we had had with the minister.

A few days afterwards Mr. Gerry requested me to accompany him again on a visit to the minister, and having repeated to him the extreme desire he felt to see the most perfect union re-established between the two nations, he resorted to the insufficiency of their powers, and proposed, in the name of his colleagues and himself, that one of them should immediately depart for America with the propositions which the French Government might make. The minister answered that it would require six months to have an answer, and that it was of importance to have a speedy determination; that he was extremely desirous to have frequent communications with them individually and amicably. This course appearing to him to be the best adapted to come at the issue of a speedy negotiation, he therefore lamented that he had yet had no communication with them.

Such, citizen minister, as far as my memory serves me, are the particulars of the only two conferences at which I was present. I shall add that no person has had a greater desire than myself to see this negotiation succeed.

Health and respect,

HAUTEVAL.

MR. SKIPWITH'S COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Secretary of State of the United States of America.

PARIS, August 4, 1798.

SIR:

I have the honor to send you enclosed the official copy of an arrêt of the Executive Directory of the French republic, concerning the French privateers in the West Indies, which was transmitted to me by the French Minister of Foreign Affairs.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

FULWAR SKIPWITH.

PARIS, August 8, 1798.

SIR:

Having had the honor of transmitting to you three official copies of the arrêt of the Directory, of the 13th Thermidor,* concerning their privateers in the West Indies, the present is merely to enclose you a copy of a letter which I yesterday received from the Minister of Foreign Relations, on the subject of that arrêt.

I have the honor to be, sir, &c.

FULWAR SKIPWITH.

To the SECRETARY OF STATE.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to citizen Skipwith, Consul General of the United States of America.

PARIS, 19 Thermidor, (August 6, 1798)
6th year of the French republic.

CITIZEN:

You will have seen in No. 961 of the Redacteur, a copy of a decree made by the Directory, in order to cause the privateers to return within the rules and limits whence they ought never to have departed.

By this measure foreign Powers will be convinced that the Executive Directory, when informed of the abuses which may be directed against them, takes every pains to stop them, and to prevent their return.

You will doubtless see in the intention and the acts of the Directory, cause for feeling a security with respect to the commerce of your fellow citizens, so long as it shall be confined within just bounds.

I wish, citizen, that, for the good of the two countries, the conduct of the Federal Government may correspond with that of the Directory. In this supposition, the friendly relations of the two people would be soon re-established.

C. M. TALLEYRAND.

Fulwar Skipwith, Consul General for the United States near the French republic, to Timothy Pickering, Esq. Secretary of State of the United States.

CONSULATE GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
PARIS, August 22, 1798.

SIR:

With a copy of a letter I have just received from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, I have the honor, under cover hereof, to transmit to you copies of two letters which have been officially communicated to me from the Minister of Marine, to all principal civil and military officers, at the different ports of this republic, concerning the safety and protection of American citizens in general, and those seamen in particular, who were detained or are in confinement at those ports. Agreeably to the intimations contained in the minister's letter to me, I have this day made application to the Minister of Police in favor of the American seamen, who, by means of one of the public authorities at L'Orient, had been arrested as Englishmen, and are at present confined at Orleans as prisoners of war. In a few days I expect to obtain their liberation, and shall procure their passages home.

*31st July, 1798. The arrêt here referred to.

I have likewise the pleasure of forwarding to you an official copy of an arrêt of the Directory for raising the embargo, imposed by Government on all vessels belonging to the United States in the ports of this republic.

I deem it my duty to observe that, from informal communications which I have recently and repeatedly had with some of the best informed individuals of the Government on the subject of American vessels and property, now under trial before the different tribunals of this republic, I have derived such information of the present disposition and intentions of the Directory, as to be satisfied myself that they will, ere long, endeavor to provoke in the Legislature a revision of their maritime laws, and that such a system will be organized as will secure the most important rights of neutrality upon the seas: this pleasing event is generally expected, and will, I am persuaded, arrive before this can reach you. Though many of the late arrêts of the Directory have certainly encouraged the tribunals in the most pernicious applications of existing laws in regard to neutral property captured and brought in for adjudication, yet it may not be unimportant to remark to you, sir, that the Directory, however well disposed, cannot change the conduct of the tribunals in regard to American and other neutral vessels now before them, without legislative interference; and that, owing to particular circumstances, it appears evidently that some time is necessary for them to prepare and dispose that body to alter some laws and make others, which shall cause the tribunals and privateers to respect neutrals in general, and the flag of the United States in particular: but from the present manifest dispositions and endeavors of the Directory to produce that end, I am happy to add, that the tribunal of cassation, before whom appeals have been made on most of the American property condemned in France, appear disposed to procrastinate pronouncing upon them until the sentiment of the Legislature shall be declared upon the laws which are operating against their success.

I have the honor to be, &c.

FULWAR SKIPWITH.

LIBERTY. EQUALITY.

The Minister of Foreign Relations to Mr. Fulwar Skipwith, Consul General of the United States to the French republic.

PARIS, 3d Fructidor, 6th year of the French republic, (August 20, 1798.)

I send you, sir, copies of two letters written by the Minister of Marine to all the principal officers, civil and military, of the ports of the republic. Their contents will prove to you the attention of the Government to remedy the abuses committed against its intentions.

With respect to the persons detained in the civil prisons of Orleans, because they are not possessed of papers to prove that they are not English, and who claim to be Americans, be pleased to call upon the Minister of General Police, to whose functions belong all the measures of safety. The Minister of Marine informs me that he has transmitted their petition to him, and I am going to write to him myself, in order to request him to admit your declaration in their favor, in the absence of other proofs.

Receive, sir, the assurance of my consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Copy of a Circular Letter, written by the Minister of Marine and the Colonies, to all the principal officers of the Ports, civil and military, on the 29th Thermidor, 6th year, (16th August, 1798.)

Our political situation with regard to the United States, citizen, not having, as yet, undergone any change which can affect the respect due to neutral nations, I do not think I have need to remind you that no injury should be done to the safety and liberty of the officers and crews of any American vessel found to be in order, and that the same conduct ought to be observed towards all passengers and other citizens of the United States furnished with the necessary passports or protections. You will be pleased to use a vigilant attention, that the intentions of the Government, in this respect, may be pursued by all those under you, and when any of them has departed from them, you will do justice upon the complaints which may be addressed to you, after ascertaining their validity.

The Minister of Marine and of the Colonies,

E. BRUIX.

For a true copy,
The Minister of Exterior Relations,

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

Copy of the Circular Letter written by the Minister of Marine and the Colonies to the Agents of the Marine in the ports of the republic.

PARIS, the 24th Thermidor, 6th year (11th August, 1798.)

I observe, citizen, by the correspondence of the greater part of the administrators of the ports, that the embargo recently laid upon the American vessels has occasioned the detention of the crews. The intentions of the Government were very badly understood, when a measure was adopted which, in the first place, hazards the safety of these vessels, and, in the second place, appears to place us in a hostile attitude with respect to the United States, whilst the acts of the Government evince, on the contrary, that it desires a good understanding between the two republics. I therefore charge you, citizen, immediately upon the receipt of this, to order the discharge of all the Americans who may have been considered as prisoners of war, in consequence of the embargo of their vessels. You will be pleased to render me a prompt account of the execution of this order.

Copy of a Decree. Extract from the Register of the Decrees of the Executive Directory, of the 29th Thermidor, 6th year of the French republic, one and indivisible, (16th August, 1798.)

The Executive Directory considering that, notwithstanding the hostile manifestations of the Government of the United States, which have occasioned a momentary embargo upon their vessels, it must be believed that, unless abandoned to the passions of the British cabinet, that Government, faithful to the interests of the American nation, will take measures conformable to the pacific dispositions of the French republic, after it shall receive a confirmation of them; and, wishing to pursue the friendly and fraternal habits of France towards a people whose liberty it defended,

Decrees as follows:

ART. 1. The embargo laid upon the American vessels shall be immediately raised.

ART. 2. The Minister of Marine and of the Colonies is charged with the execution of the present decree, which shall not be printed.

5th CONGRESS.] No. 149. [2d SESSION.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 21, 1799.

UNITED STATES, January 21, 1799.

Gentlemen of the Senate and
Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

According to an intimation in my message of Friday last, I now lay before Congress a report of the Secretary of State, containing his observations on some of the documents which attended it.

JOHN ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 18, 1799.

The Secretary of State respectfully submits the following report of the transactions relating to the United States and France, since the last communications to Congress on that subject.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

Report of the Secretary of State on the transactions relating to the United States and France, since the last communication to Congress on that subject.

The points chiefly meriting attention are the attempts of the French Government—

1. To exculpate itself from the charge of corruption, as having demanded a douceur of fifty thousand pounds sterling (222,000 dollars) for the pockets of the directors and ministers, as represented in the despatches of our envoys;
2. To detach Mr. Gerry from his colleagues, and to inveigle him into a separate negotiation; and
3. Its design, if the negotiation failed, and a war should take place between the United States and France, to throw the blame of the rupture on the United States.

1. The despatches of the envoys published in the United States, and republished in England, reached Paris towards the last of May; and on the 30th of that month, the French minister, Mr. Talleyrand, affecting an entire ignorance of the persons designated by the letters W. X. Y. and Z.—calling them intriguers, whose object was to deceive the envoys—writes to Mr. Gerry, and "prays him immediately to make known to him their names."

Mr. Gerry, in his answer of the 31st, wishes to evade Mr. Talleyrand's request; and with reason, for he and his colleagues had "promised Messrs. X. and Y. that their names should in no event be made public." Mr. Gerry, in his letter of October 1, in noting the repetition of Mr. Talleyrand's request for those names, states as an objection to giving them up "that they could be otherwise ascertained;" and that Mr. Talleyrand's messenger, admitting the fact that they were already known, immediately mentioned their names. Mr. Gerry, nevertheless, certified in writing the names of X. Y. and Z; with the reserve "that they should not be published on his authority:" and besides formally certifying to Mr. Talleyrand the names of his own private agents, added, that "they did not produce, to his knowledge, credentials or documents of any kind." "Credentials" in writing were certainly not to be expected to be produced by agents employed to make corrupt propositions: but Mr. Gerry had Mr. Talleyrand's own assurance that Mr. Y. was acting by his authority. It is recited in the envoys' despatches, and upon Mr. Gerry's own report to his colleagues, that, on the 17th of December, 1797, Mr. Y. "stated to him that two measures which Mr. Talleyrand proposed being adopted, a restoration of friendship between the republics would follow immediately; the one was a gratuity of fifty thousand pounds sterling; the other a purchase of thirty-two millions of Dutch rescriptions;" and after conversing on these topics, Mr. Gerry and Mr. Y. rode to Mr. Talleyrand's office, where "Mr. Gerry observed to Mr. Talleyrand that Mr. Y. had stated to him that morning some propositions as coming from Mr. Talleyrand, respecting which Mr. Gerry could give no opinion;" and after making some other observations, Mr. Talleyrand answered, "that the information Mr. Y. had given him (Mr. Gerry) was just, and might always be relied on." This declaration stamps with the minister's authority all the communications made by Mr. Y. to the envoys. And Mr. Y. himself, who is Mr. Bellamy, of Hamburg, in his public vindication declares, that "he had done nothing, said nothing, and written nothing, without the orders of citizen Talleyrand." The same may be asserted in regard to Mr. X., for he first introduced Mr. Y. to the envoys; and his separate communications were substantially the same with those of Y.; and both together were present with the envoys when the communications were more than once repeated.

It also deserves notice, that, in stating the preliminary demands of the French Government, the private agents, X. and Y., and the minister, use a similar language. The agents declare that the Directory are extremely irritated at the speech of the President, and require an explanation of some parts of it, and reparation for others; that this must give pain to the envoys, but the Directory would not dispense with it: and that as to the means of averting the demand concerning the President's speech, the envoys must search for them, and propose them, themselves. Being asked to suggest the means, the answer is "money"—the purchase of the Dutch rescriptions, and "the fifty thousand pounds sterling, as a douceur to the Directory."

The minister told the envoys that the Directory were wounded by the President's speech; and, in his conversation with Mr. Gerry on the 28th of October, said, "the Directory had passed an arrêt, which he offered for perusal, in which they had demanded of the envoys an explanation of some parts, and a reparation for others, of the President's speech to Congress of the 16th of May, 1797; that he was sensible that difficulties would exist on the part of the envoys relative to this demand; but that by their offering money he thought he could prevent the effect of the arrêt. Mr. Z., (the "interpreter") at the request of Mr. Gerry, having stated that the envoys have no such powers, Mr. Talleyrand replied, they can in such case take a power on themselves; and proposed that they should make a "loan." But this "loan," as will presently appear, did not mean the "money," which would "prevent the effect of the arrêt." Mr. Gerry then making some observations on the powers of the envoys—that they "were adequate to the discussion and adjustment of all points of real difference between the two nations; that they could alter and amend the treaty, or, if necessary, form a new one;" added, "that as to a loan, they had no powers whatever to make one, but that they could send one of their number for instructions on this proposition, if deemed expedient:" "That as he [Mr. Talleyrand] had expressed a desire to confer with the envoys individually, it was the wish of Mr. Gerry that such a conference should take place, and their opinions thus be ascertained." "Mr. Talleyrand, in answer said, he should be glad to confer with the other envoys, individually, but that this matter about the MONEY must be settled directly without sending to America; that he would not communicate the arrêt for a week; and that if he could adjust the difficulty respecting the speech, an application would nevertheless go to the United States for a LOAN." Now this matter of the MONEY that must be settled directly could only refer to the douceur; for a loan in the purchase of millions of Dutch rescriptions, or in any other form, could only be the subject of a stipulation to be afterwards fulfilled by the United States; but the douceur of fifty thousand pounds sterling was a sum within the immediate reach of the envoys; for their credit would certainly command it: in fact a mercantile house had offered to answer their draughts; and this Mr. Talleyrand unquestionably well knew; for it was a member of the same house who first introduced the minister's agent, Mr. X., to General Pinckney, in the manner stated in the envoys' despatches. A collateral evidence that, in "this matter of the money that must be settled directly," Mr. Talleyrand referred only to the douceur, arises from this circumstance: The very next day (October 29th) Mr. X. called on the envoys and said, "Mr. Talleyrand was extremely anxious to be of service to them, and had requested that one more effort should be made to induce us to enable him to be so." After a great deal of the same conversation which had passed at former interviews had been repeated, the envoys say—"the sum of his proposition was, that if we would pay by way of fees (that was his expression) the sum of MONEY demanded for PRIVATE USE, the Directory would not receive us, but would permit us to remain in Paris as we now were; and we should be received by Mr. Talleyrand, until one of us could go to America and consult our Government on the subject of a LOAN."

Although the envoys' despatches, and the facts and circumstances hereinbefore stated, cannot leave a doubt that X., as well as Y. and Z., was well known to Mr. Talleyrand, it will not be amiss to add, that on the 2d of December X. Y. and Z. dined together at Mr. Talleyrand's, in company with Mr. Gerry; and that after rising from table, the money propositions, which had before been made, were repeated, in the room and in the presence, though perhaps not in the hearing, of Mr. Talleyrand. Mr. X. put the question to Mr. Gerry in direct terms, either "whether the envoys would now give the douceur," or "whether they had got the money ready." Mr. Gerry, very justly offended, answered positively in the negative, and the conversation dropped.

Mr. Z., who has avowed himself to be Mr. Hauteval, was the person who first made known to the envoys the minister's desire to confer with them individually on the objects of their mission. He it was who first introduced Mr. Gerry to Mr. Talleyrand, and served as the interpreter of their conversations; and in his letter to Mr. Talleyrand, at the close of Mr. Gerry's document, No. 35, he announces himself to be the agent of the minister, to make communications to the envoys.

Mr. Hauteval declares "his sensibility must be much affected on finding himself, under the letter Z., acting a part in company with certain intriguers, whose plan, he says, it doubtless was to take advantage of the good faith of the American envoys, and make them their dupes;" yet this person, the avowed agent of the French minister, apparently so anxious to screen himself from the suspicion of an agency in soliciting the bribe required by Mr. Talleyrand, did himself urge a compliance with that corrupt proposition.*

The sensation which these details irresistibly excite is that of astonishment at the unparalleled effrontery of Mr. Talleyrand, in demanding of Mr. Gerry the names of X. Y. and Z., after Y. had accompanied him on a visit to the minister, with whom the conversation detailed in the printed despatches then passed, and who then assured Mr. Gerry "that the information Mr. Y. had given him was just, and might always be relied on;" after Z. had in the first instance introduced Mr. Gerry to the minister, and served as their mutual interpreter, and when the conversation between them had also been stated in despatches; and after X. Y. and Z. had all dined together with Mr. Gerry at Mr. Talleyrand's table, on rising from which X. and Y. renewed the proposition about the MONEY! The very circumstance of Mr. Talleyrand's being continued in office after the account of these intrigues had been published to the world is a decisive proof that they were commenced and carried on with the privity and by the secret orders of the Directory. It was to accomplish the object of these intrigues that the American envoys were kept at Paris unreceived six months after their credentials had been laid before the Directory; and it was only because they were superior to those intrigues, and that no hopes remained of wheedling or terrifying them into a compliance, that two of them were then sent away, and with marks of insult and contempt.

2. The fact that the French Government attempted to inveigle Mr. Gerry into a separate negotiation will not be questioned: at first, it was made privately, and under an injunction of secrecy towards his colleagues; it was afterwards plainly insinuated by the minister, in his letter of the 18th of March, 1798, in which he tells the envoys that the Executive Directory was disposed to treat with one of the three, and that one he openly avowed, in his letter of the 3d of April, to be Mr. Gerry. The pretence for selecting him was, that his "opinions presumed to be more impartial, promised, in the course of the explanations, more of that reciprocal confidence which was indispensable." But when before have their "opinions" been stated as a justifiable ground for rejecting the ambassadors of peace? ambassadors, too, of established probity, whose characters were of the first distinction in their own country, and whose demeanor towards the Government to which they were deputed was decent and respectful; who had, with a frankness which the candor of their instructions warranted, communicated the important points which they contained; and who unremittingly, and with the most anxious solicitude, entreated that the negotiations might be commenced. What more proper or more honorable qualities ought ministers deputed to negotiate with a foreign nation to possess? But why should a foreign Government question the opinions of the ambassadors sent to negotiate with it on subjects of difference between the two nations? If wisely chosen, and faithful to the interests of their own country, they must of course possess different opinions from the Government to which they are sent, the differing opinions maintained by the two nations on their respective rights and interests being the cause and objects of the negotiation. A Government really disposed to treat on fair principles would never object to the opinions of foreign ambassadors: it would receive them, and appoint its own ministers with proper powers to treat with them, propose its terms, and receive those offered, and discuss both; and if then they could not agree, put an end to the negotiation. The French Government did not wish to negotiate, it desired to impose a treaty on the United States. To this practice it had been accustomed towards the minor powers in Europe, whom it had subjected to its will; and it expected equal submission from the United States. Hence Mr. Talleyrand's secret declaration to Mr. Gerry, "that if he would negotiate, they could soon finish a treaty, for the Executive Directory were not in the habit of spending much time about such matters." Hence the objections to General Pinckney and General Marshall: they manifested a discernment superior to the intrigues of the French Government, and an invincible determination not to surrender the honor, the interest, or the independence of their country. It was necessary, then, to get rid of them; and seeing that neither despair of negotiating nor studied indignities could induce them to quit their posts, passports were sent to them to quit France. It was with difficulty that General Pinckney could obtain permission to stay two or three months for the recovery of his sick daughter, to whom an immediate voyage would probably prove fatal. Unembarrassed by the presence of these envoys, the French Government, if it really desired a treaty on any terms, hoped to prevail on Mr. Gerry to negotiate separately, although from the first overture he declined, and continued to decline it. But after the expulsion of his colleagues, it hoped by its seductive arts to prevail over his scruples, and gain his consent to terms which, while they were present, would be rejected; or at all events to retain him, with the semblance of negotiating, regularly or informally, and thus keep the United States in the torpor of indecision, without preparation for offence or defence. Unfortunately, Mr. Gerry was induced, by the threats of immediate war against the United States, to separate from his colleagues, and stay in Paris—threats which, viewed with their motives, merited only detestation and contempt. Four or five months before, the threats of immediate orders to quit France, and the terrors of war in its most dreadful forms, had been held up to all the envoys, to frighten them into a compliance with the groundless, unjust, and corrupt demands of the French Government. Those threats had not been executed, and the unworthy purposes for which they had been uttered had been obvious. Happily for the United States, the character of the French Government, as delineated in the official despatches of all the envoys, and the knowledge of its conduct towards other countries whose Governments it had overturned, and whose people, in the names of Liberty and Equality, it had enslaved, so operated as not to leave us exposed to all the evils which suspense was calculated to produce. Mr. Gerry, indeed, resisted all the arts of the French minister to entice him into a formal negotiation after that Government had driven his colleagues from Paris—a negotiation which in its nature would have been a surrender of our independence, by admitting a foreign Government to choose for us the minister who should represent our country, to treat of our important rights and interests, which that Government had itself violated and deeply injured.

* Extract of a letter, dated June 15th, 1798, from Mr. King, minister of the United States in London, to the Secretary of State:

"Colonel Trumbull, who was at Paris soon after the arrival there of the commissioners, has more than once informed me that Hauteval told him that both the douceur and the loan were indispensable, and urged him to employ his influence with the American commissioners to offer the bribe as well as the loan."

The Directory and their minister Mr. Talleyrand hoped and expected that General Pinckney and General Marshall would voluntarily have quitted France, after the minister's letter of the 18th of March, in which he made the offensive distinction between them and their colleague Mr. Gerry, on the pretence that his "opinions" were more "impartial" than theirs. Accordingly, Mr. Talleyrand, in his letter to Mr. Gerry of the 3d of April, says: "I suppose, sir, that Messrs. Pinckney and Marshall have thought it useful and proper, in consequence of the intimations which the end of my note of the 18th of March last presents, to quit the territory of the republic." Yet Mr. Talleyrand had given them neither passports nor letters of safe conduct! The fact is, the French Government wished to avoid the odium of sending them away, and the blame of a rupture, which Mr. Talleyrand predicted would be the consequence; while it was privately intimated to them that they must leave the country. The minister's conduct on this occasion towards General Marshall (as detailed in his journal) was particularly marked with indignities. When it was observed to Mr. Talleyrand, that this was not the manner in which a foreign minister ought to be treated, Mr. Talleyrand replied, that General Marshall was not a foreign minister, but was to be considered as a private American citizen; and must obtain his passport, like others, through the consul. To this it was answered, that General Marshall was a foreign minister* and that the French Government could not deprive him of that character, which was conferred upon him, not by Mr. Talleyrand, but by the United States; and though the Directory might refuse to receive or to treat with him, still his country had clothed him with the requisite powers, which he held independently of France; that if he was not acceptable to the French Government, and in consequence thereof it was determined to send him away, still he ought to be sent away like a minister; that he ought to have his passports, with letters of safe conduct, which would protect him from the cruisers of France. Mr. Talleyrand replied, that if General Marshall wished for a passport, he must give in his name, stature, age, complexion, &c. to the American consul, who would obtain a passport for him: that with respect to a letter of safe conduct it was unnecessary, as no risk from the cruisers would be incurred. The result of these conversations was a plain demonstration of the intention of the minister, that in consequence of his intimation at the close of his letter of the 18th of March, that the "opinions" of two of the envoys were not agreeable to the Government of France, Generals Pinckney and Marshall should appropriate to themselves the character which the minister had drawn generally. The envoys, aware of this snare, in their answer of the 3d of April to the intimation that "the Directory was disposed to treat with one of the envoys," declare to the minister, "that no one of the envoys was authorized to take upon himself a negotiation evidently entrusted to the whole," and "that no two of them could propose to withdraw themselves from the task committed to them by their Government, while there remained a possibility of performing it;" but that if "it should be the will of the Directory to order passports for the whole or any number of them," it was desired that such passports might be accompanied with letters of safe conduct, to protect them against the cruisers of France.

These endeavors of the French Government, whether real or affected, to draw Mr. Gerry into a separate negotiation, constitute the substance of the correspondence between him and Mr. Talleyrand. They appear to merit consideration in several points of view.

1. Because, if real, it was only in the hope and expectation, that by intrigues and terrors the French Government might influence Mr. Gerry to enter into a formal treaty, on the terms which he and his colleagues had repeatedly rejected as incompatible with the interest, honor, and independence of their country. For at this time Mr. Talleyrand had not renounced the demands of loans and a douceur as the indispensable preliminaries of a treaty. Accordingly we see Mr. Talleyrand, in his letter of the 3d of April to Mr. Gerry, proposed "to resume their reciprocal communications upon the interests of the French republic and the United States of America." And in his letter of July 12th to Mr. Gerry, having mentioned the arrival at Havre of a packet, the Sophia, from the American Government, he says, "until then I never supposed you entertained the design of embarking before we had come to an agreement upon the definitive articles to be ratified by your Government." 2. Because if that Government had so far succeeded, it would have insisted on its ratification by the President and Senate, on the ground constantly taken by Mr. Talleyrand, that the powers of the envoys being several as well as joint, Mr. Gerry when alone, even after the French Government had ordered his colleagues to leave France, were adequate to the formation of the treaty; and that, therefore, the public faith would be violated, if it were not ratified. 3. Because under such circumstances, the French Government doubtless calculated at least on a division of the public opinion in the United

* On the 9th of October, 1797, the day after the envoys had delivered to the minister a copy of their letter of credence, "cards of hospitality were sent to them and their secretaries, in a style suitable to their official character." [See page 158.] And in the minister's letter to them of the 18th of March, 1798, he calls them "the commissioners and envoys extraordinary of the United States of America." [See page 188.]

States in favor of the ratification of such a treaty; by means of which it might enforce the ratification, or effect still greater mischiefs. 4. But these endeavors to draw Mr. Gerry into a formal negotiation are chiefly remarkable because they were persevered in during nearly five months, against his constant, direct, and positive refusals to treat separately; Mr. Talleyrand asserting, and Mr. Gerry denying, the competency of his powers.

We have seen the envoys, from the 6th of October, 1797, the date of their first letter to the French minister, to the 3d of April, 1798, when their last was delivered to him, expressing their earnest desire to enter upon and prosecute the great business of their mission: we have seen them during that long period patiently enduring neglect and indignities, to which an ardent zeal to re-establish harmony and peace could alone induce freemen to submit: we have seen them while held in suspense—neither received nor rejected—yielding to the importunities of private agents of the French Government, and hearing and discussing their propositions, insulting as they were, in the hope that when these should be shown to be utterly inadmissible, others founded in reason and equity, and in the usual course of diplomatic negotiation, might be brought forward. Doubtless, they also wished, when their astonishment at the first overtures had subsided, by listening still longer to such dishonorable propositions, to ascertain the true character of the French Government. We have seen them, after waiting five weeks, from the presentation of a copy of their letters of credence, entirely unnoticed, "solicit an attention to their mission," and soliciting in vain. Thus denied an official hearing, they hoped, by an unusual step, to excite the attention of that Government: they determined to transmit to the minister a letter representing the views of their own Government in relation to the subjects in dispute with France. This letter, dated the 17th, was delivered the 31st of January, 1798. Waiting near a month without an answer, and "still being anxious to hear explicitly from Mr. Talleyrand himself, before they sent their final letter, whether there were no means within their powers of accommodating our differences with France, on just and reasonable grounds, on the 27th of February they desired "a personal interview on the subject of their mission;" and afterwards a second interview. They remark on what passed at these meetings, "that the views of France, with regard to the United States, were not essentially changed since their communications with its unofficial agents in the preceding October."

At length they received Mr. Talleyrand's letter of the 18th March, 1798, in answer to theirs of the 17th of January. The minister's letter represented the complaints of France; as usual, charging the American Government with the inexecution of the treaties with France; with dissimulation; insinuating that our tribunals were subject to a secret influence; holding up the British treaty as replete with evil and injury, and "the principal grievance of the republic;" accusing the American Government of a wish to seize the first favorable occasion to consummate an intimate union with Great Britain, and suggesting that a devotion and partiality to that Power have long been the principle of the conduct of the Federal Government.

To this letter of the French minister, the envoys sent their reply on the 3d of April. This reply and their former letter detect the sophisms and erroneous statements of the minister; expose his naked assertions; refute his arguments; repel his calumnies; and completely vindicate the fidelity, the justice, and, as a neutral power, the impartiality of the Government of the United States; and, at the same time, exhibit the weighty and well founded complaints of the United States against the French republic.

Hitherto, instead of a desire to obtain a reconciliation, we can discover in the French Government only empty professions of a desire to conciliate, while it haughtily refused to receive our envoys, and, during six months, disregarded their respectful and ardent solicitations to negotiate, and after one of them, whom it induced to remain in France, had declared that "he had no powers to treat separately, that the measure was impossible," then the Directory expelled the other two!

If now we survey Mr. Gerry's individual correspondence, we shall find no solid evidence of any change in the disposition of the French Government.

In his first letter to Mr. Gerry Mr. Talleyrand's artifice is visible; he addresses him as "envoy extraordinary of the United States of America to the French republic;" and proposes to him to "resume their reciprocal communications." Mr. Gerry, apprehending that the minister intended to draw him into a negotiation, repeats what he had often before declared, that for him to treat separately was impracticable; and that he can only confer with him informally.

On the 20th of April Mr. Gerry addresses a letter to the minister, and presses him to come forward with propositions for terminating all differences, restoring harmony, and re-establishing commerce between the two nations. He receives no answer. On the 28th he confers with the minister, who says he cannot make propositions, because he does not know the views of the United States in regard to a treaty. Mr. Gerry gives him the information. He then promises, in three or four days, to deliver Mr. Gerry the project of a treaty. This promise was never performed. On the 12th of May the new instructions of March 23d, sent by the Sophia packet, reached Mr. Gerry; and he gave immediate notice to the minister that he should return to America in the Sophia, as soon as she could be fitted for sea.

"On the 24th of May the minister sent his principal secretary to inform Mr. Gerry that his Government did not wish to break the British treaty; but expected such provisions as would indemnify France, and put her on a footing with that nation." Yet that treaty had been made, by the French Government, its chief pretence for those unjust and cruel depredations on American commerce, which have brought distress on multitudes, and ruin on many of our citizens; and occasioned a total loss of property to the United States of probably more than twenty millions of dollars, besides subjecting our fellow citizens to insults, stripes, wounds, torture, and imprisonment. And Mr. Talleyrand, in his letter of the 18th March to the envoys, declared that treaty to be "the principal grievance of the republic." But now, instead of breaking that treaty, France desires to be put on the same footing. This the United States would at any time have done, and the envoys were now explicitly instructed to do: and seven months before, all the envoys, in their conversation with Mr. Bellamy, (Y.) the confidential and authorized agent of the French minister, told him "that he might be assured that their powers were such as authorized them to place France on equal ground with England, in any respects in which an inequality might be supposed to exist at present between them, to the disadvantage of France."

The secretary also mentioned the claims of the American citizens on the French republic: he said if the latter should be unable to pay them, when adjusted, and the United States would assume and pay them, France would reimburse the amount thereof. This has the semblance of candor; but on the 4th of March, when the envoys were in conference with Mr. Talleyrand, and they disclosed their principal instructions, "General Pinckney and Mr. Gerry told him they were positively forbidden to assume the debts to our own citizens, even if we were to pay the money directly to them." And doubtless it was because the proposition was already known to be inadmissible that it was now renewed.

The secretary and Mr. Gerry had also some unimportant conversation about the consular convention. And it is plain that the whole object of the secretary's visit was to amuse, by keeping alive Mr. Gerry's hopes of some pacific arrangements.

On the 26th of May, Mr. Gerry had a conference with the minister, pressing on this, as on former occasions, the necessity of sending a minister to the United States, with powers to negotiate; to which, he says, the minister acceded; but afterwards explained himself to mean a minister to reside there after the ratification of the talked of treaty.

Such are the proceedings of the French Government by its minister, Mr. Talleyrand, before the arrival of the printed despatches of the envoys. We discover nothing but a proposition for treating with Mr. Gerry alone, which he had repeatedly declared to be impossible; and on terms which Mr. Gerry himself, as well as the other envoys, had long before pronounced to be utterly inadmissible, because directly repugnant to their instructions. We shall now see, by an examination of Mr. Gerry's subsequent communications, that the publication of the envoys' despatches, far from causing a discontinuance of negotiations with him, or any change in the disposition of the French Government more unfriendly to the United States, incomparably greater zeal for negotiating was exhibited afterwards than before.

On the 30th of May, the minister announces to Mr. Gerry the publication of the envoys' despatches. In his letter of the 27th of June, he says this incident only, "for a moment, suspended the principal object"—the negotiation with Mr. Gerry; and in his letter of June 10th he declares, that "the French Government, superior to all the personalities, to all the manœuvres of its enemies, perseveres in the intention of conciliating with sincerity all the differences which have happened between the two countries." On the 18th of June the minister sends him a plan for conducting the negotiations; for the first time states the "three points" on which he says "all negotiations between France and the United States must essentially rest;" and "gives (what he calls) a large development" of them; concluding by pressing him to remain at Paris, to accelerate the negotiation; "the drawing together of those ties which the French republic and the true Americans have regretted to see relaxed."

On the 27th of June the minister again writes to Mr. Gerry, and, in language the most importunate, such as had never before been used, urges him not to withdraw, "when the French Government, superior to all resentments, and never listening to any thing but justice, manifests itself anxious to conclude a solid and mutually satisfactory agreement." The minister even observes that the first of the "three points," mentioned in his preceding letter, (respecting amicable declarations about mutual recriminations) might be postponed; that the third, (about the examination of reciprocal damages,) would doubtless experience no difficulty on either side, after the second should be amicably settled; that it was to the second, therefore, they should first attend; it being so much the more important, as it embraced the source of all the differences between the two nations. And on the 22d of July, the minister renounces all demands of "loans and explanations on the subject of speeches;" and even affects to be hurt that Mr. Gerry should have mentioned them; although both he and his private agents had, before, so long and so obstinately persevered in demanding them of the envoys, as the indispensable preliminaries to a negotiation. And doubtless it is partly owing to the publication of their despatches, thereby exposing to the world those shameless demands, with the scandalous proposition of the douceur, that they are now relinquished.

In adducing these circumstances to show the increased zeal of the French Government since the publication of the despatches, to negotiate on its differences with the United States, it is not to be understood that they afford a shadow of evidence of its sincerity. But as professions, verbal or written, furnished the only ground on which Mr. Gerry could form his opinion, that "before the arrival of the despatches of the envoys, the minister was sincere and anxious to obtain a reconciliation," much more professions stronger, and more importunate, afterwards made, afford proportionably higher evidence of sincerity. But the present details demonstrate that all those professions were merely ostensible. In the minister's last mentioned letter, after saying that his "second point" (to fix the meaning of the treaties between the two countries) was most important, "as it embraced the source of all the differences," and that to this they should first attend: he purposely passes by the most interesting questions which it involves, and sends Mr. Gerry a note on the consular convention, of all possible subjects in difference the most insignificant, as it would have expired by its own limitation in two years and a half, within which time the commerce of France, judging from its present state of annihilation, would probably not furnish a single ship to visit the ports of the United States. In his next letter, dated July 6th, he pursues his speculations on the consular convention, and sends Mr. Gerry two more notes upon it, complaining that he had not transmitted to him his opinion upon his first note, and recommending the two last to his attention, although Mr. Gerry had repeatedly and positively declined a formal discussion, such as the minister now urged, in writing. Mr. Gerry states, also, that this first note of the minister on the consular convention was sent to him six weeks after he had demanded his passport, and when his baggage was actually on board the Sophia!

In a word, the more clearly the impossibility of entering on a formal negotiation appeared, the more was it pressed by the French minister. Mr. Gerry, in his letter to Mr. Talleyrand, of July 20th, as justly as pointedly exposes the boasted zeal of the minister. "You was the first, you affirm, to press seriously the negotiation; you will agree with me that the merit would have been greater, had the measure itself been feasible." Again he says to the minister, "you frequently remind me of your exertions, [to negotiate] which I am disposed as much as possible to appreciate, regretting, at the same time, their circuitous direction."

From this detail of facts, the following are the necessary conclusions:

That, by the exclusive attentions of the minister to Mr. Gerry, the French Government intended to excite the jealousy of his colleagues, to promote dissensions between them, to separate him from them, and induce him to remain in France, expecting either to seduce him into a formal negotiation of a treaty, on terms exclusively advantageous to France, and injurious and dishonorable to the United States; or, failing in this, to hold the United States in suspense, and prevent any measures for our security, in the event of a war; while we, amused and deluded by warm, but empty professions of the pacific views and wishes of France, and by "informal conferences," might wait in spiritless torpor, hoping for a peaceful result; and that, by this course of proceeding, this ostentatious display of zeal to adjust differences, and restore harmony and a friendly intercourse between the United States and France, the French Government intended, in case of a rupture, to throw the blame on the former.

It is necessary to make a few observations on the decree of the Executive Directory of the 31st July, 1798.

This decree was sent after Mr. Gerry to Havre, and he supposes that the official impediments which, for several days, prevented his sailing, are to be ascribed to the minister's desire of sending the decree by him. The minister introduces it as "a part of the measures which he had announced to Mr. Gerry on the 22d of July." In his letter of that date, to Mr. Gerry, the minister says: "By information which the Government has just received, it indeed learns that violences have been committed upon the commerce and citizens of the United States in the West Indies, and on their coasts. Do it the justice to believe that it needs only to know the facts, to disavow all acts contrary to the laws of the republic, and its own decrees. A remedy is preparing for it, and orders will soon arrive in the West Indies, calculated to cause every thing to return within its just limits." This "remedy" is the decree of the 31st of July.

1. The first article of this decree confines to the special agents of the Directory the right of issuing commissions to cruisers, and requires these to conform themselves to all the laws relative to cruising and prizes, and especially to those of the 1st of October, 1793. Although the injunction to conform to all the laws of the republic relative to cruising was ominous, as the laws most recently promulgated and best known were themselves the sources of the depredations and evils of which we complained, yet, not imagining that a decree, introduced with so much solemnity, of which one copy was sent to Mr. Gerry, another to the American consul general, at Paris, and a third to Mr. Létombe, late consul general of France, all to be communicated to the Executive of the United States, and all of which have been received, could be a mere parade of words, I was disposed to conclude that the law of the 1st of October, 1793, to which all cruisers were especially enjoined to conform, might contain regulations that would afford some relief from French depredations. By the favor of Mr. Létombe, I obtained a copy of that law, and to my astonishment, found its object, conformably to its title, was "To determine the mode of dividing prizes made by French vessels on the enemies of the republic."* And the only restriction in this lengthy law of six-and-forty articles, imposed on the individuals, officers, and all others composing the crews of their armed vessels, is, "that they shall not sell, beforehand, their eventual shares of prizes."

2. The second article declares that all commissions granted by the agents, in the French colonies in America, to fit out vessels for cruisers, or for war and commerce, shall be void in thirty days after the publication of the decree in those colonies.

It has been supposed that, by this regulation, the agents may gather a fresh harvest of fees for new commissions; and that this would be its only effect. The agents, however, had before taken care of this; they had been accustomed to limit the duration of privateers' commissions, and if they continued to cruise after their expiration, such privateers should have been considered as destitute of commissions, and, consequently, if they made any captures, as pirates. But the agents knew their interest better; they did not punish the piratical captors; they did not declare their captures void, and restore the property to the neutral owners; but, declaring such captors to have no title to the captured vessels and cargoes, took the whole to themselves. A remarkable instance occurred in the last year, in the case of the East India ship New Jersey, belonging to Philadelphia, to redeem which, the owners have paid to General Hedouville, special agent of the Executive Directory, in St. Domingo, upwards of two hundred thousand dollars in cash. Whether any, and what portion of such prize-money goes into the chest of the republic, I am not informed.

* "Décret de la Convention Nationale, du 1 8bre 1793, l'an 2d de la république Française, que détermine le mode de repartition des prises faites par les vaisseaux Français sur les ennemis de la république."

3. The third article declares that all agents, and other deputies, in the neutral possessions, appointed to decide there on the validity of prizes taken by the French cruisers, and who shall be suspected of having a direct or indirect interest in the cruisers, shall be immediately recalled.

It is remarkable that this article, apparently designed to correct the monstrous abuse of public officers sitting in judgment in their own causes, should be limited to such of the French agents, and their deputies, as were appointed to reside in neutral places. I do not know that an instance of the kind exists: for, although the French privateers, and their prizes, find asylums in the Swedish and Danish islands, yet the papers are carried thence to Guadaloupe, and there the captured vessels receive their doom, under the superintendence of another special agent of the Executive Directory, Victor Hugues. And even the captured American vessels carried into the West India ports of Spain and Holland do not there receive sentence: these cases are decided by the agent, or his deputies, or other French tribunals, established in the island of St. Domingo, frequently, if not generally, in the absence of the masters and supercargoes. The French agents and judges find no difficulty in this mode of proceeding, justice being administered with more facility and despatch when only one of the parties is present at the trial, especially when the agents, or other judges, are interested in the privateers; and this the present decree impliedly allows, the penalty of "recall" being applicable, as above suggested, to such agents only as reside in neutral places, if any such there be.

It is also remarkable that this decree, which was to give the United States a proof of the justice of the French Government, (a Government, Mr. Talleyrand says, "never listening to any thing but justice") and of its desire of a reconciliation with the United States, should be limited to the West Indies, when as great, if not as numerous abuses were practised by French agents and tribunals in Europe, and even France itself, as in her remote possessions. This, too, many of our citizens well know. For captures and condemnations are not the less abuses, because made under the color of municipal laws and decrees which directly violate treaties, the law of nations, and the plainest principles of justice. At present I shall only mention that, in a report made by Major Mountflorence, chancellor of the American consulate at Paris, to General Pinckney, in December, 1796, and which was laid before Congress in May, 1797, he states, "That the tribunals of commerce in every port of France take cognizance, in the first instance, of every matter relative to captures at sea;" and "these tribunals (he adds) are chiefly composed of merchants, and most of them are, directly or indirectly, more or less interested in the fitting out of privateers; and therefore are often concerned in the controversies they are to determine upon."

4. The fourth article requires the special agents of the Executive Directory at Cayenne, St. Domingo, and Guadaloupe, studiously to take care that the interests and property of vessels belonging to neutrals and allies be scrupulously respected.

We have too long witnessed the studious and scrupulous care of these gentlemen respecting the property of neutrals and allies, and experienced its ruinous consequences; and as the same laws which authorized that "care" remain in force, and with a fresh injunction of a strict conformity to them, we can expect only a continuance of the same abuses.

5. The fifth article enjoins the special agents of the Executive Directory, consuls, and all others invested with powers for that purpose, to cause to be arrested and punished all who shall contravene the provisions of the present decree. Unfortunately, these special agents, consuls, and their deputies, are themselves the aggressors, and justify their proceedings under the laws of the republic and the decrees of the Executive Directory.

This analysis of the present decree manifests its futility; and, with some remarks on its preamble, will demonstrate it to be a bold imposture, intended to mislead the citizens of the United States into a belief that the French Government was going to put an end to the depredations of French cruisers on American commerce, while the means proposed are so gross as to be an insult on our understandings.

The preamble to the decree sets forth, "that information, recently received from the French colonies and the continent of America leaves no room to doubt that French cruisers, or such as call themselves French, have infringed the laws of the republic relative to cruising and prizes;" and "that foreigners and pirates have abused the latitude allowed at Cayenne and the West India islands to vessels fitted out for cruising, or for war and commerce, in order to cover with the French flag their extortions, and the violation of the respect due to the law of nations, and to the persons and property of allies and neutrals." And Mr. Talleyrand, in one of his letters before noticed, dated the 22d of July last, speaks of this information as having been "just received."

But what has been more notorious than French depredations on neutral, and especially on American commerce, in violation of treaties and the law of nations? These have been coeval with the existing war in Europe; but were multiplied under the loose decree of the Executive Directory, passed the 2d of July, 1796, declaring, that "the flag of the French republic will treat neutral vessels, either as to confiscation, to searches, or to capture, in the same manner as they shall suffer the English to treat them."

This decree committed the whole commerce of neutrals, in the first instance, to the rapacity of French privateers, and then to the discretion of their agents, consuls, and tribunals. These had only to say, truly or falsely, that the English treated neutrals in any given way, and then they were to treat them in the same manner. Accordingly we have seen Santhonax and Raimond, commissioners of the French Government in St. Domingo, in their adjudication of an American vessel, on the 10th of January, 1797, declare, "that the resolution (or decree) passed by the Executive Directory, on the 2d of July, 1796, prescribes to all the armed vessels of the republic, and the armed vessels belonging to individuals, to treat neutral vessels in the same manner as they suffer the English to treat them;" and "that it is in consequence of the above resolution of the Executive Directory, and in consequence of the manner in which the English Government in the Antilles treats neutral vessels, that the commission passed their resolution of the 7th of January, by which they declare all neutral vessels bound to or from English ports, to be legal prize." From these facts, and the tenor of the decree itself, we can form but one conclusion, that it was framed in such indefinite terms on purpose to give scope for arbitrary constructions, and consequently for unlimited oppression and vexation.

But without waiting for this decree, the commissioners of the French Government at St. Domingo began their piracies on the commerce of the United States; and, in February, 1797, wrote to the Minister of Marine, (and the extract of the letter appeared in the official journal of the Executive Directory of the 5th of June) "That, having found no resource in finance, and knowing the unfriendly dispositions of the Americans, and to avoid perishing in distress, they had armed for cruising, and that already eighty-seven cruisers were at sea; and that for three months preceding the administration had subsisted, and individuals been enriched, with the product of those prizes." "That the decree of the 2d of July was not known by them until five months afterwards. But (say they) the shocking conduct of the Americans, and the indirect knowledge of the intentions of our Government, made it our duty to order reprisals, even before we had received the official notice of the decree." "They felicitate themselves that American vessels were daily taken, and declare that they had learnt, by divers persons from the continent, that the Americans were perfidious, corrupt, the friends of England, and that, therefore, their vessels no longer entered the French ports, unless carried in by force."

After this recital, before the council of five hundred, Pastoret makes the following remarkable reflections:

"On reading this letter we should think that we had been dreaming; that we had been transported into a savage country, where men, still ignorant of the empire of morals and of laws, commit crimes without shame and without remorse, and applaud themselves for their robberies, as Paulus, Æmilius, or Cato, would have praised themselves for an eminent service rendered to their country. Cruisers armed against a friendly nation! Reprisals, when it is we ourselves who attack! Reprisals against a nation that has not taken a single vessel of ours! Riches acquired by the confiscation of the ships of a people to whom we are united by treaties, and whom no declaration of war had separated from us!" "The whole discourse of the agents may be reduced to these few words: 'Having nothing wherewith to buy, I seize; I make myself amends for the property which I want, by the piracy which enriches me; and then I slander those whom I have pillaged.'" "This is robbery, justified by selfishness and calumny." Yet Santhonax, one of these "robbers," and the chief of those directorial agents, continued in office, and, going a few months afterwards from St. Domingo to France, was received as a member into one of the legislative councils.

Pastoret also adverts to a letter from Merlin, then minister of justice, and now a member of the Executive Directory, to Mr. Skipwith, consul general of the United States, which also appeared in the journal of the Directory, and quotes the following passage: "Let your Government break the inconceivable treaty which it concluded on the 19th of November, 1794, with our most implacable enemies, and immediately the French republic will cease to apply in its own favor the regulations in that treaty, which favor England to the injury of France, and I warrant you that we shall not see an appeal to those regulations, in any tribunal, to support unjust pretensions." "Have I (says Pastoret) read this rightly? Unjust pretensions! Could it be possible that they should thus have been characterized by the minister who is himself their agent and defender?"

After all, this "inconceivable British treaty" was itself but a pretext to countenance the "unjust pretensions," as Merlin himself calls them, used by the French Government in its tribunals, for the purpose of condemning American vessels. The details I have already given prove it. I beg leave to adduce other evidence. It is the testimony of Mr. Barlow, an American by birth, but for several years past a citizen of France, a man of acknowledged discernment and talents, devoted to the French republic, and intimate with their leading men. Mr. Barlow has long resided at Paris, and cannot have mistaken the views of the French Government, nor the motives of its conduct. Mr. Barlow's letter dated at Paris the first of March, 1798, to his brother-in-law Mr. Baldwin, has doomed the writer to infamy: yet when it describes the principles and conduct of the French republic, it merits attention. He says, "that act of submission to the British Government, commonly called Jay's treaty, is usually considered, both by its friends and enemies, as the sole cause, or at least the great cause, of the present hostile disposition of the French republic towards the United States. This opinion (says he) is erroneous." He then proceeds to an enumeration of a variety of matters which he says have influenced the conduct of France. But the most provoking, and the most unpardonable of all the offences of the United States against France, was, fortunately, not an act of the Government, but an act of the people. The freemen of the United States, "the true Americans," dared to exercise their independent rights, and contrary to the wishes of the French Government and the endeavors and practices of its minister Adet, elected Mr. ADAMS to the office of President. Mr. Barlow's observations on this event further develop the character and the principles of that Government. He says, "when the election of ADAMS was announced here, it produced the order of the 2d March,* which was meant to be little short of a declaration to war:" "the Government here was determined to fleece you of your property, to a sufficient degree to bring you of your feeling in the only nerve in which it was presumed your sensibility lay, which was your pecuniary interests." And what was this "feeling" to produce? The answer is obvious—Submission to the will of the French Government. The mystery of French politics is here unveiled. The United States did not submit. Hence the non-reception of her envoys, and their haughty treatment: hence the insulting demands of tribute as a preliminary even to their reception; and hence the expulsion of two of them from France.

But to return to the decree of the Executive Directory of the 31st of July last.

I have already shown that the mass of depredations on the commerce of the United States, under the French flag, of which we so justly complain, are not those committed, as the Directory in their preamble insinuate, by "foreigners and pirates" but by French armed vessels commissioned by the Government or its agents; or whether commissioned or not, whose acts in capturing American vessels receive the sanction of French consuls, of French tribunals, and of the special agents of the Directory. I have shown that the laws of France and the directorial decrees are themselves the sources of those violations of treaties and the law of nations, which have caused such immense losses to the citizens of the United States. And to the proofs already offered, that the information of such aggressions and abuses, particularly in the West Indies, and on the coast of America, was not, as the preamble suggests, but "recently received." I may add that their "special agents" authorized those depredations and violations of the law of nations, by decrees assuming the laws of the republic, or the acts of the Executive Directory, for their bases; by decrees printed and published, and undoubtedly from time to time reported by those agents to the Directory itself. Further, these outrages on the American commerce have for years past been the theme of every tongue, and filled columns in our newspapers—those newspapers which, Mr. Barlow says, the office of foreign affairs (at Paris) regularly receives." I will conclude this point with the testimony of Mr. Létombe, late consul general of the French republic, and still residing in Philadelphia. He has long since, and repeatedly assured me, that he collected all those accounts of depredations and outrages committed by French privateers, and transmitted them to his Government at Paris.

In relation to the depredations and outrages committed by the French on the commerce of the United States, I have said that as great, if not as numerous abuses were practised by the French in Europe, and even in France itself, as in her remote possessions; and that this fact was but too well known to our citizens, who had felt severely their effects. Among these we have seen the case of the ship Hare, Captain Hayley; but never in all its disgusting features. With this I will close my observations on the preamble of the directorial decree of the 31st July.

Extract of a letter from Rufus King, Esq. minister of the United States in London, dated September 3, 1798, to the Secretary of State of the United States.

"The pretence for this arrêt [the decree of the Directory of July 31st] is of a piece with the vindication of Talleyrand respecting X. Y. and Z. and the justice and sincerity of the Directory should be ascertained, not by their word, but by the following cotemporaneous fact:

"Hayley, an American citzien, master of the American ship Hare, lying in the port of London, laden with a rich cargo, the property of Americans, and bound to New York, went with my passport from London to Paris, where, in a personal interview, not with the agents of the Minister of Marine, but with the minister himself, he disclosed his plan of bringing the ship Hare and her cargo into France; and to enable him to receive the profits of the fraud, without risking the punishment of piracy, he demanded and received from the Minister of Marine, a commission naming him the commander of a privateer that did not exist; with which in his pocket, he returned to London; and soon after carried the ship Hare and her cargo as a prize into France.

"The ship and cargo were both claimed by the American owners; and upon the unveiling of this infamous proceeding before the lower tribunals, the judges hesitated; and finally refused to sanction so unheard of a fraud; though instead of restoring the property to its lawful owners, they on some frivolous pretence adjudged both ship and cargo to be good prize to the nation. Lately, the tribunal in the last resort, upon the appeal of Hayley, has reversed the judgment of the lower court, and "decreed the ship and cargo to be condemned as good prize to this renegado."

"If a transaction more grossly corrupt and infamous has occurred in the West Indies, I have not heard of it; and yet with this case of unequalled infamy and corruption before them, sanctioned by the highest tribunals of the nation, the Directory expect to amuse us with a disavowal of the conduct of a few subaltern agents in a remote part of their dominions!!!"

Besides the communications from Mr. Gerry, I have received from Fulwar Skipwith, Esq. consul general of the United States at Paris, three letters dated the 4th, 8th, and 22d of August, copies of which and of the papers therein referred to, are herewith presented, excepting the decree of July 31st, which appears among the communications from Mr. Gerry. Mr. Skipwith's letter of August 22d, with its enclosures, was delivered to me by Doctor Logan; I had previously received the original, which had been brought over by Mr. Woodward of Boston.

*It will be recollected that this is the decree of the Executive Directory, ordering the capture and condemnation of American vessels, not having a role d'équipage—that fruitful source of plunder to Frenchmen, and of ruin to American citizens: and which also declared all American seamen, making a part of the crew of enemies' ships, even when put on board of them by force, to be pirates, and directed them to be treated as such.

Docter Logan having been the bearer of the last mentioned communications from the French Government, and his EMBASSY having not only engaged the attention of the public, but been made the subject of debate in Congress, I trust it will not be deemed improper to introduce into this report some circumstances respecting it.

On the 12th of November the doctor came to me at Trenton: he advanced with eagerness, and handed me the packet from Mr. Skipwith. On examining its contents, I told the doctor that I already possessed the same papers. I made some remarks on the decree of the Directory of the 31st of July, to show that it was only ostensible and illusory, and that it would not give any relief to the commerce of the United States. The doctor, not contesting my arguments or opinion, said that more was intended to be done, but that the Directory could not accomplish it of themselves, seeing it depended on the laws which the legislative councils alone could change. I answered, that this was easy to be done; that as the Directory, on the 18th Fructidor, (September 4th, 1797) had garbled the two councils, and banished some, and dismissed others of the best members, all who were firmly opposed to their views, and as on the new elections to supply the vacancies and the new third of the councils, the Directory sent home every new member who was not agreeable to them, every body must see that the Directory had but to declare its will and it would be obeyed. The doctor said, that the Directory was very well disposed towards the United States, and desired a reconciliation; that they would promote a revision of the laws in regard to privateering, so as to put the rights of neutral nations on a just footing; but that it would take some time to bring this about, "the people concerned in privateering having gained a very great influence in the two councils!" ——! ——! Is it necessary to inquire how this "very great influence" has been obtained? Are the leading members owners of privateers? Or do they receive their shares of prize money from those who are? Do the legislative councils really act independently of the Directory? Or does the same "influence" actuate both? The printed despatches of our envoys, under the date of October 29, 1797, state, on the information of Mr. Talleyrand's private agent X. that Merlin, one of the members, and now or late president of the Directory, was to receive no part of the douceur demanded of the envoys, because he was paid by the owners of privateers; and in respect to the loan then demanded, on which subject it was suggested that one of the envoys should go to America to consult the Government, the envoys "asked Mr. X. if, in the mean time, the Directory would order the American property not yet passed into the hands of the privateers' men, to be restored? He said explicitly that they would not. The envoys asked him whether they would suspend further depredations on our commerce? He said they would not: but Mr. Talleyrand observed, that on this subject we could not sustain much additional injury, because the winter season was approaching, when few additional captures could be made." Here we see our envoys inquiring, not whether the two councils would suspend those depredations, but whether the Directory would do it: and Mr. Talleyrand's agent X., without intimating that the Directory wanted power, or that they could only "endeavor to provoke in the Legislature a revision of their maritime laws," answered peremptorily, that the Directory would not suspend the depredations. The truth is, that it was an act of the Directory alone, (their decree of the 2d of March, 1797) which authorized and produced more extensive depredations on the commerce of the United States than any other decree or law of the French republic. To effect a repeal of that decree, no application to the legislative councils could be necessary. They could also have repealed another of their own decrees, that of the 2d of July, 1796, which subjected neutral property, and particularly that of American citizens, to the discretion of their consuls and cruisers in the European seas, as well as of their privateers and agents in the West Indies, and on which these agents have founded other numerous decrees, which have occasioned those shocking depredations and abuses there and on the coast of the United States, which the Directory, by their decree of the 31st of July last, affect to restrain.

When the Executive Directory wished to enlarge the field of depredations on neutral commerce, and on the 4th of January, 1798, proposed to the two councils the project of the iniquitous law "to declare to be good prize every vessel and her cargo, to whomsoever belonging, if any part of the cargo came from England or her possessions," there was a ready obedience. "The Directory thinks it urgent and necessary to pass the law." The plan of a decree is reported to the council of five hundred on the 11th, and "urgency" being declared, is immediately and unanimously adopted. It goes to the council of ancients—that council approves the act of "urgency;" and on the 18th of January the project of the Directory becomes a law.

This law was necessary for the French Government: so many American vessels had been entrapped by the Directory's decree of March 2d, 1797, requiring the rôle d'équipage, that the residue were now generally provided with that paper: some new pretext was therefore requisite for "fleecing" the people of the United States of their property, and an ordinance of one of the Kings of France made near a century past, having declared lawful prize the vessels and their cargoes in which was found English merchandise belonging to enemies," the Directory declare that the provisions of this ordinance ought to be extended, to comprehend the vessels and cargoes of friends; that is, of allied and neutral nations. The Directory knew that the United States, whose inhabitants were chiefly cultivators, required a greater supply of English manufactures than any other neutral country of equal population; and those manufactures, too, were, from the course of American commerce, combined with almost all our mercantile operations, and pervaded entirely our great coasting trade. Hence, it is evident that this law was chiefly aimed at them.

It will be remembered also that this law was passed while our three envoys were at Paris, where they had passed three months unheeded by the French Government, except by its indignities, and where they had in vain solicited to be heard on the just claims of our citizens, plundered and ruined under the former decrees of the republic. This time was preferred, in order to add insult to injury. The envoys had firmly resisted her demands of loans and douceurs, and when speaking of their country, dared to intimate that it was independent. It was therefore requisite, on the French system, to "chastise," as well as to "fleece" it.

In closing this subject, it will be proper to notice an assertion of Mr. Talleyrand in a conversation with the envoys on the 2d March, 1798. In reply to some observations of his respecting the proofs of friendship required by France from the United States, General Pinckney observed, "that the envoys being in France was a proof of the friendly disposition of our Government; and that while they were there, the French Government had passed a decree for seizing neutral vessels having on board any article coming out of England, which in its operation would subject to capture all our property on the ocean. Mr. Talleyrand replied that this was not particular to us, but was common to all the neutral Powers." This assertion of Mr. Talleyrand is not true. Although the decree in its terms is general, and applicable to all the neutral Powers, yet in its operation it was not designed to be, and has not been so applied—it has not touched a vessel of Prussia. The motives to this exemption are obvious: France wished not, by irritating Prussia, to add so powerful a nation, and one so near at hand, to the number of her enemies, while her peace with Austria remained precarious. But this exemption of Prussian vessels from the operation of a general law merits particular notice. It demonstrates that there exists in the French republic a dispensing power—a power above the laws—a power which can prevent their execution: and it is alike demonstrable that this sovereign controlling power can exist, and in fact does exist, in the Executive Directory. It might then, if the Directory desired it, be exercised in the exemption of American as well as Prussian vessels: but the Directory do not desire it: we have not yet been sufficiently "fleeced" and "chastised."

Mr. Skipwith's letter of the 4th of August enclosed the decree of the Executive Directory already noticed, passed the 31st of July, respecting French depredations in the West Indies, and on the coast of the United States. His letter of the 8th of August enclosed Mr. Talleyrand's letter to him of the 6th, respecting that decree, in which it is plain that the minister supposes the world, and particularly the United States, will be amused by that illusory device, and imagine that it was intended to stop abuses, and give security to neutral commerce.

Mr. Skipwith's letter of the 22d of August covers another letter from Mr. Talleyrand, dated the 20th of August, in which he encloses copies of two letters from the Minister of Marine, respecting American seamen who had been imprisoned. When in July last an embargo was laid on the American merchant vessels in the ports of France, the agents of the marine took out their crews, and threw them into prison; thus hazarding the loss of the vessels, and injuring the men by confinement, and the bad provisions of their gaols. These seamen were ordered to be released. The other letter from the Minister of Marine required that no injury should be done to the safety and liberty of the officers and crews of American vessels found to be in order, nor to passengers and other citizens of the United States having passports and protections.

The same letter from Mr. Skipwith enclosed the copy of a decree of the Directory, passed the 16th of August, for taking off the embargo, laid a month before on American vessels.

The decree itself occupies but two lines; but its preamble is extended, for the purpose of insulting the Government of the United States, when an act of common justice was done to some of their citizens; by insinuating that the Government was "abandoned to the passions of the British cabinet." This, however, is but the repetition of a calumny familiar in French diplomacy, respecting other nations as well as our own. Barras, President of the Directory, in his valedictory address to Mr. Monroe, declared that "France would not abase herself by calculating the consequences of the condescension of the American Government to the suggestions of her former tyrants;" professing, at the same time, great "esteem for the American people." Mr. Adet had before charged the American Government with a "perfidious condescension to the English;" and after making his last communications to the Government, he, by their immediate publication under his orders, appealed from the Government to the people of the United States. Yet Mr. Talleyrand says, that the French Government has indeed "complained of the American Government, but to the Government itself;" meaning to have it understood, though carefully avoiding the expression, that it had complained to the Government alone. With the like sophistry he attempts to evade our well founded allegations, that the French Government has made reproachful and injurious distinctions between the Government and people of the United States, endeavoring to separate the latter from the former. He says "it is utterly false, notwithstanding the public and private insinuations which have been made, in private writings and in solemn acts, that the French Government has ever sought to detach the people of the United States from the constitution they have given themselves." Such a charge against the French Government has not, that I know, ever been made by the American Government; but we have accused them, and truly, with endeavors to detach the people of the United States from the government chosen by themselves to administer that constitution: and this the minister does not attempt to deny. The Directory would perhaps be contented that the people should retain the forms of "the constitution they have given themselves," and to which they are attached, provided they would elect to administer it men devoted to France, and ready to obey the intimations of her will. And because the people have not been thus obsequious, but have dared to make a different election, the French Government has expressed its "terrible" resentment; Mr. Barlow has assured us, in the passage already cited from his letter, that for this single act of the people of the United States, in exercising freely their right of election, the Directory passed a decree "which was meant to be little short of a declaration of war;" by which it "was determined to fleece the people of their property:" certainly in expectation that, by touching their feeling in that "nerve," they would be induced, in order to save their property, to submit implicitly to the Government of France. Failing in this attempt, the French Government made another, in the decree of the 18th of January, 1798, which though general in its terms, I have shown to have been levelled directly and chiefly at the commerce of the United States. And this at the time (as I have before remarked) when three envoys extraordinary were waiting, month after month, and most respectfully soliciting to be heard, and to enter on the discussion of all the subjects of difference between the two countries; and among these, on the French depredations on our commerce. Yet Mr. Talleyrand has the confidence to assert, and to Mr. Gerry too, one of those envoys, that the French Government "never refused and never will refuse to enter into discussion upon every proper subject." Does the minister mean that those depredations are not "a proper subject of discussion?" Yes, with respect to a vast proportion of them. Mr. Y., his private agent, explicitly told our envoys, that the condemnations of vessels for want of the rôle d'équipage were not to be questioned; "that being a point on which Merlin while minister of justice had written a treatise, and on which the Directory were decided."

It is fit here to recollect another and a peremptory refusal of the French Government, "to enter into discussion" upon the subjects of difference between France and the United States.

General Pinckney, appointed the minister plenipotentiary of the United States to the French republic, went to Paris in the autumn of 1796. There was at first (as in the case of the envoys extraordinary in 1797) a show of receiving him: but soon the scene was changed; and he was not only refused a hearing, but after bearing a thousand indignities, ordered to leave France; but the predecessor of Mr. Talleyrand, Charles de la Croix, in a letter to Mr. Monroe, intended to be communicated to General Pinckney, declared, (being specially charged to do so by the Directory, and Mr. de la Croix repeated the declaration to General Pinckney's secretary) "that it will not acknowledge nor receive another minister plenipotentiary from the United States, until after the redress of the grievances demanded of the American Government, and which the French republic has a right to expect from it." To this resolution we have seen the Directory adhere; and we have also seen, in the demands it made to our envoys extraordinary, as the indispensable preliminaries to any negotiation, what it meant by a "redress of grievances," prior to the reception of a minister from America: it consisted in a douceur for the pocket of the directors and ministers: in the purchase at par of thirty-two millions of Dutch securities, then worth but half that sum; and in loans as immense and indefinite as their depredations on our commerce.

The same letter from the French minister De la Croix to Mr. Monroe, affords another proof of the aim and endeavors of the French Government to separate the people from the Government of the United States. In the sentence next following the above quoted passage, Mr. de la Croix says, "I pray you to be persuaded, citizen minister, that this determination having become necessary, allows to subsist between the French republic and the American people the affection founded upon former benefits and reciprocal interests."

If I were to allow myself to make any further reflections on the conduct of France towards the United States, it would be to illustrate the truth of Mr. Barlow's assertion, that the French Government determined to fleece us. If the French Government "listened (as Mr. Talleyrand says it does) to nothing but justice," and really desired a reconciliation, it would have proposed to fix some measure of satisfaction for the injuries it said it had received. Or, if too proud to propose to us, at least it would have prescribed to itself some limit to reprisals: or at any rate, it would not have spurned us from its presence, when we respectfully presented ourselves, sought a reconciliation, and offered to make a just satisfaction for every injury we had committed. And if, (as Mr. Talleyrand asserts) "the French Government has not ceased to offer the exact justice it demands," it would also have permitted us to state our claims. But it would have been so easy to ascertain all the damages we had done; and their amount would have been so small, even if we agreed to pay for all English, Spanish, and Dutch vessels brought by French cruisers into our ports, while all those nations were at war with France; a few of which the justice of the Federal courts, in vindication of the sovereignty of the United States, rescued from the hands of the French consuls, agents and privateers' men; and if to that amount we also added ten times the value of the miserable corvette Le Cassius, a vessel which had been unlawfully fitted out for war in the United States, but which has been the burthen of every note from Adet's in 1795 to De la Croix's and Talleyrand's in 1796 and 1798, the amount of the whole, it was known, would be so small, the French Government did not choose to have it ascertained; for then the injuries done by the French to the commerce of the United States must also have been examined and adjusted; and when adjusted, payment must have been made or stipulated; but in this, the French Government doubtless thought "it would find only a real disadvantage;" the amount of its own demands deducted from those of America would hardly seem to have diminished the latter.

Such a mutual adjustment would also have been accompanied with a settlement of all questions and disputes about the construction of treaties, and all other subjects of difference: but in this also, the French Government, upon its own system, "would have found a real disadvantage." For it would have vastly reduced the field for privateering in the European seas; and in the West Indies it would have been nearly annihilated: for there, for every vessel taken from the enemies of France, her cruisers have probably captured twenty belonging to the United States. But the French Government, by always abstaining from making specific demands of damages; by refusing to receive our ministers; by at length proposing to negotiate in a mode which it knew to be impracticable; with the person who had no powers, and who, therefore, constantly refused to negotiate; and thus wholly avoiding a negotiation; it has kept open the field for complaints of wrongs and injuries, in order, by leaving them undefined, to furnish pretences for unlimited depredations. In this way "it determined to fleece us." In this way it gratified its avarice and revenge—and it hoped also to satiate its ambition. After a long series of insults unresented, and a patient endurance of injuries, aggravated in their nature and unexampled in their extent, that Government expected our final submission to its will. Our resistance has excited its surprise; and as certainly increased its resentment. With some soothing expressions, is heard the voice of wounded pride. Warmly professing its desire of reconciliation, it gives no evidence of its sincerity; but proofs in abundance demonstrate that it is not sincere. From standing erect, and in that commanding attitude requiring implicit obedience—cowering, it renounces some of its unfounded demands. But I hope we shall remember "that the tiger crouches before he leaps upon his prey."

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, JANUARY 28, 1799.

Gentlemen of the Senate and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

An edict of the Executive Directory of the French republic of the 29th of October, 1798, enclosed in a letter from our minister plenipotentiary in London of the 16th of November, is of so much importance, that it cannot be too soon communicated to you and to the public.

JOHN ADAMS.

January 28, 1799.

Extract of a letter from Rufus King, Esq. Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at London, to the Secretary of State, dated

NOVEMBER 16, 1798.

"The annexed arrêt would appear extravagant and incredible, if it proceeded from any other authority; but mankind is so accustomed to the violence and injustice of France, that we almost cease to express our surprise and indignation at the new instances that she continues to display."

DIRECTOIRE EXECUTIF.

Arrêt du 8 Brumaire, an 7, Octobre 29, 1798.

Le Directoire Exécutif, sur le rapport du Ministre des Relations Extérieures, considerant que les escadres, armemens en courses, et navires de l'Angleterre et de la Russie, sont en partie équipés par des individus étrangers.

Considérant que cette violation est un abus manifeste du droit des gens, et que les Puissances de l'Europe n'ont pris aucun mésure pour le faire cesser, arrête,

ART. 1. Tout individu, natif ou originaire des pays amis, alliés de la république Française, ou neutres, porteur d'une commission donnée par les ennemis de la France, ou faisant partie des équipages des bâtimens de guerre et autres ennemis, sera, par ce seul fait, déclaré pirate, et traité comme tel. sans qu'ils puisse, dans aucun cas, alléguer qu'il y a été forcé par violence, ménaces, ou autrement.

2. Les Directoires Exécutifs des républiques Batave, Ligurienne, Cisalpine, et Romaine, seront instruits de cette mésure.

3. Les dispositions contenues en l'article premier seront notifiées aux Puissances neutres ou alliées de la république Française.

4. Le Ministre des Relations Extérieures est chargé de l'exécution du present arrêt, qui sera imprimé au bulletin des lois.

The Executive Directory, upon the report of the Minister of Foreign Relations, considering that the fleets, privateers, and ships of England and Russia, are in part equipped by foreigners.

Considering that this violation is a manifest abuse of the rights of nations, and that the Powers of Europe have not taken any measures to prohibit it, decrees,

1st. Every individual, native (ou originaire) of friendly countries, allied to the French republic, or neutral, bearing a commission, granted by the enemies of France, or making part of the crews of ships of war and others, enemies, shall be by this single fact declared a pirate, and treated as such, without being permitted, in any case, to allege that he had been forced into such service by violence, threats, or otherwise.

2d. The Executive Directories of the Batavian, Ligurian, Cisalpine, and Roman republics, shall be instructed to this effect.

3d. The provisions contained in the 1st article shall be notified to those Powers which are neutral or allied to the French republic.

4th. The Minister of Exterior Relations is charged with the execution of the present arrêt, which shall be printed in the bulletin of the laws.

COMMUNICATED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 15, 1799.

UNITED STATES, February 15, 1799.

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

In pursuance of the request in your resolve of yesterday, I lay before you such information as I have received touching a suspension of the arrêt of the French republic communicated to your House by my message of the 28th of January last. But if the execution of that arrêt be suspended, or even if it were repealed, it should be remembered that the arrêt of the Executive Directory of the 2d of March, 1797, remains in force; the third article of which subjects, explicitly and exclusively, American seamen to be treated as pirates, if found on board ships of the enemies of France.

JOHN ADAMS.

Extract of a letter from Rufus King, Esq. Minister Plenipotentiary, &c. to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, November 28, 1798.

Annexed I send you a copy of a note from Lord Grenville, respecting the French arrêt transmitted to you with my No. 9. A late French paper contains a second arrêt which postpones the execution of the first.

Lord Grenville to Mr. King.

The undersigned, His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor of communicating to Mr. King, minister plenipotentary for the United States of America, for the information of his Government, that by a decree published officially at Paris, it appears to have been declared, in the name of the French Directory, that every person being a native of or originally belonging to neutral countries, or to such as are in amity and alliance with the French republic, who shall bear no commission under His Majesty, or who shall form a part of the crews of any British ships of war or other vessels, should, on the proof of that fact alone, he considered and treated as a pirate; and that it has been ordered that this resolution shall be notified to the neutral Powers and to those in alliance with France.

Even this decree, contrary as it is to the usages of every civilized nation, cannot excite any surprise, as proceeding from those in whose name it has been published. To the different Powers who are thus insulted, and whose innocent subjects are exposed to the most cruel treatment on the part of a Government professing friendship or alliance with them, His Majesty must leave it to adopt such measures as they will, without doubt, judge necessary, in the case of an outrage hitherto unexampled in the history of the world.

The King, however, feels that protection is also due from him to those who sail under his flag, either in His Majesty's ships of war or in other British vessels; His Majesty has therefore not hesitated to direct it to be signified to the commissary for French prisoners in Great Britain that the first instance of the execution of this decree shall be followed by the most rigorous retaliation against the French prisoners whom the fortune of war has already, or may hereafter place at the King's disposal.

It would certainly never be but with extreme reluctance that the King could yield to the painful necessity of exposing so many unfortunate individuals to the fatal but inevitable effects of this atrocious decree; but His Majesty will have at least the satisfaction of feeling that nothing has been omitted on his part to prevent its execution, and that the authors of it can alone be considered responsible for all its guilt and all its consequences.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 18, 1799.

FEBRUARY 18, 1799.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I transmit to you a document which seems to be intended to be a compliance with a condition mentioned at the conclusion of my message to Congress, of the 21st of June last.

Always disposed and ready to embrace every plausible appearance of probability of preserving or restoring tranquillity, I nominate William Vans Murray, our minister resident at the Hague, to be minister plenipotentiary of the United States to the French republic.

If the Senate shall advise and consent to his appointment, effectual care shall be taken in his instructions that he shall not go to France without direct and unequivocal assurances from the French Government, signified by by their Minister of Foreign Relations, that he shall be received in character; shall enjoy the privileges attached to his character by the law of nations; and that a minister of equal rank, title, and powers, shall be appointed to treat with him, to discuss and conclude all controversies between the two republics by a new treaty.

LIBERTY. EQUALITY.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to citizen Pichon, Secretary of Legation of the French republic near the Batavian republic.

PARIS, the 7th Vendemiaire, of the 7th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

I have received successively, citizen, your letters of the 22d and 27th Fructidor, (8th and 13th of September.) They afford me more and more reason to be pleased with the measure you have adopted to detail to me your conversations with Mr. Murray. These conversations, at first merely friendly, have acquired consistency, by the sanction I have given to them by my letter of the 11th Fructidor. I do not regret that you have trusted to Mr. Murray's honor a copy of my letter. It was intended for you only, and contains nothing but what is conformable to the intentions of Government. I am thoroughly convinced that, should explanations take place with confidence between the two cabinets, irritation would cease; a crowd of misunderstandings would disappear; and the ties of friendship would be the more strongly united, as each party would discover the hand which sought to disunite them.

But I will not conceal from you that your letters of the 2d and 3d Vendemiaire, just received, surprise me much. What Mr. Murray is still dubious of has been very explicitly declared, even before the President's message to Congress, of the 3d Messidor (21st of June) last, was known in France. I had written it to Mr. Gerry, namely, on the 24th Messidor and 4th Thermidor; I did repeat it to him before he set out: a whole paragraph of my letter to you, of the 11th Fructidor, of which Mr. Murray has a copy, is devoted to develope still more the fixed determination of the French Government. According to these bases, you were right to assert that, whatever plenipotentiary the Government of the United States might send to France, to put an end to the existing differences between the two countries, would be undoubtedly received with the respect due to the representative of a free, independent, and powerful nation.

I cannot persuade myself, citizen, that the American Government need any further declarations from us to induce them, in order to renew the negotiations, to adopt such measures as would be suggested to them by their desire to bring the differences to a peaceable end. If misunderstandings on both sides have prevented former explanations from reaching that end, it is presumable that those misunderstandings being done away, nothing henceforth will bring obstacles to the reciprocal dispositions. The President's instructions to his envoys at Paris, which I have only known by the copy given you by Mr. Murray, and received by me the 21st Messidor, (9th of July) announce, if they contain the whole of the American Government's intentions, dispositions which could only have added to those which the Directory has always entertained; and, notwithstanding the posterior acts of that Government, notwithstanding the irritating and almost hostile measures they have adopted, the Directory has manifested its perseverance in the sentiments which are deposited both in my correspondence with Mr. Gerry, and in my letter to you of the 11th Fructidor, and which I have herein before repeated in the most explicit manner. Carry, therefore, citizen, to Mr. Murray those positive expressions, in order to convince him of our sincerity, and prevail upon him to transmit them to his Government.

I presume, citizen, that this letter will find you at the Hague; if not, I ask it may be sent back to you at Paris.

Salute and fraternity.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, FEBRUARY 25, 1799.

UNITED STATES, February 25, 1799.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The proposition of a fresh negotiation with France, in consequence of advances made by the French Government, has excited so general an attention, and so much conversation, as to have given occasion to many manifestations of the public opinion, from which it appears to me that a new modification of the embassy will give more general satisfaction to the Legislature and to the nation, and perhaps better answer the purposes we have in view.

It is upon this supposition, and with this expectation, that I now nominate Oliver Elsworth, Esq., Chief Justice of the United States.

Patrick Henry, Esq., late Governor of Virginia, and William Vans Murray, Esq., our minister resident at the Hague, to be envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French republic, with full powers to discuss and settle, by a treaty, all controversies between the United States and France.

It is not intended that the two former of these gentlemen shall embark for Europe until they shall have received from the Executive Directory assurances, signified by their Secretary of Foreign Relations, that they shall be received in character; that they shall enjoy all the prerogatives attached to that character by the law of nations; and that a minister or ministers of equal powers shall be appointed and commissioned to treat with them.

FRANCE.

COMMUNICATED TO CONGRESS, DECEMBER 5, 1799.

UNITED STATES, December 5, 1799.

Gentlemen of the Senate and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress certain documents which have relation to the communications made on Tuesday, on the subject of the renewal of commerce with St. Domingo, and the mission to the French republic.

JOHN ADAMS.

Renewal of Commerce with St. Domingo.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, by an act of the Congress of the United States, passed the 9th day of February last, entitled "An act further to suspend the commercial intercouse between the United States and France, and the dependencies thereof," it is provided, That, at any time after the passing of this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interests of the United States, by his order, to remit and discontinue for the time being, the restraints and prohibitions by the said act imposed, either with respect to the French republic, or to any island, port, or place, belonging to the said republic, with which a commercial intercourse may safely be renewed; and also to revoke such order whenever, in his opinion, the interest of the United States shall require; and he is authorized to make proclamation thereof accordingly:

And, whereas, the arrangements which have been made at St. Domingo, for the safety of the commerce of the United States, and for the admission of American vessels into certain ports of that island, do, in my opinion, render it expedient, and for the interest of the United States, to renew a commercial intercourse with such ports:

Therefore, I, John Adams, President of the United States, by virtue of the powers vested in me by the above recited act, do hereby remit and discontinue the restraints and prohibitions therein contained, within the limits and under the regulations here following, to wit:

1. It shall be lawful for vessels which have departed or may depart from the United States, to enter the ports of Cape François and Port Republicain, formerly called Port-au Prince, in the said island of St. Domingo, on and after the 1st day of August next.

2. No vessel shall be cleared for any other port in St. Domingo than Cape François and Port Republicain.

3. It shall be lawful for vessels, which shall enter the said ports of Cape François and Port Republicain, after the thirty-first day of July next, to depart from thence to any port in said island between Monte Christi, on the north, and Petit Goave, on the west, provided it be done with the consent of the Government of St. Domingo, and pursuant to certificates or passports expressing such consent, signed by the consul general of the United States, or consul residing at the port of departure.

4. All vessels sailing in contravention of these regulations will be out of the protection of the United States, and be, moreover, liable to capture, seizure, and confiscation.

[L. S.] Given under my hand and the seal of the United States, at Philadelphia, the twenty-sixth day of June, in the year of our Lord 1799, and of the independence of the said States the twenty-third.

MISSION TO FRANCE.

Letter from Patrick Henry, Esq. to the Secretary of State.

CHARLOTTE COUNTY, Virginia, April 16, 1799.

SIR:

Your favor of the 25th ultimo did not reach me till two days ago. I have been confined for several weeks by a severe indisposition, and am still so sick as to be scarcely able to write this.

My advanced age and increasing debility compel me to abandon every idea of serving my country, where the scene of operation is far distant, and her interests call for incessant and long continued exertion. Conscious as I am of my inability to discharge the duties of envoy, &c. to France, to which, by the commission you send me, I am called, I herewith return it.

I cannot, however, forbear expressing, on this occasion, the high sense I entertain of the honor done me by the President and Senate in the appointment; and I beg of you, sir, to present me to them in terms of the most dutiful regard, assuring them that this mark of their confidence in me, at a crisis so eventful, is a very agreeable and flattering proof of their consideration towards me, and that nothing short of absolute necessity could induce me to withhold my little aid from an administration whose abilities, patriotism, and virtue, deserve the gratitude and reverence of all their fellow-citizens.

With sentiments of very high regard, and unfeigned esteem, I am, sir, &c.

P. HENRY.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Talleyrand, as Minister of Exterior Relations, to Mr. Pichon, Secretary of Legation, Hague, dated PARIS, 11*th Fructidor*, (August 28, 1798) 6*th year.*

I see with pleasure, citizen, that the intercourse of society has procured you some political conversations with Mr. Murray. I entertain an esteem for that minister. Like all the men at the head of the affairs of the United States, he has received the impressions which the British cabinet has known how to give against us. He thinks the measures of his Government just, and supports them; but he possesses reason, understanding, and a true attachment to his country: he is neither French nor English: he is ingenuously an American. I am not at all surprised that he has appeared to you to wish sincerely for the reconciliation of the two republics. I will, therefore, cheerfully answer the questions you put to me on different points, which appeared to you not to be well established in his mind.

I do not see between France and the United States any clashing of interests, any cause of jealousy. The Americans wish to be fishermen, sailors, manufacturers, and especially husbandmen. In all these points of view, their success is more at the expense of England than us. Why should we be uneasy about them? They aspire to the consolidation of their national existence, and it is to our purpose that they should succeed. In fact, we should have decided upon very superficial views to sustain their independence, if the matter was to separate them from England merely to leave them finally insulated among themselves, on an extensive seacoast, weak, rivalling, and impoverished by each other, and torn by foreign intrigues. We know that Great Britain would soon have put together, piece by piece, those scattered shreds, and we should have done nothing useful for ourselves, if so miserable a chance of it were not daily rendered more remote.

What, therefore, is the cause of the misunderstanding, which, if France did not manifest herself more wise, would henceforth induce a violent rupture between the two republics? Neither incompatible interests, nor projects of aggrandizement divide them. After all, distrust alone has done the whole. The Government of the United States has thought that France wanted to revolutionize it. France has thought that the Government of the United States wanted to throw itself into the arms of England. It does not require much skill to divine which is the cabinet interested in the two events producing each other, and which invisibly puts in motion all the expedients calculated to make them take effect. Let us open our eyes on both sides. I am disposed to admit that the conduct of the Government of the United States may be explained by other causes than those heretofore presumed. But let it on its part understand that the French Government, wounded as it may be, is too wise to entertain the views of disturbance which the other supposes. It concerns a republic, founded on the system of representation, to support and not to weaken similar establishments. The stability of this system abroad is a necessary example at home. France, in fine, has a double motive, as a nation and as a republic, not to expose to any hazard the present existence of the United States. Therefore, it never thought of making war against them, nor exciting civil commotions among them; and every contrary supposition is an insult to common sense.

These fundamental principles being established, it is natural to ask by what fatality a good understanding was not long since restored. It was because irritation being mingled with distrust, neither party yielded to real conciliatory inclinations. In the United States it was supposed that the French Government was temporizing, in order to strike the blow with greater certainty; whence resulted a crowd of measures more and more aggravating. In France it was supposed that the Government of the United States wished only the appearances of a negotiation, whence resulted a certain demand for pledges of good faith.

Let us substitute calmness for passion, confidence for suspicions, and we shall soon agree. I used my endeavors to enter upon a negotiation in this spirit with Mr. Gerry. My correspondence with him, until the day of his departure, is a curious monument of advances on my part, and of evasions on his. It is wrong to think that I confined myself to vague protestations. Among that series of official letters, which will doubtless be published at Philadelphia, I select one, of the 30th Prairial, wherein you will see that I make very positive propositions, without any mixture of preliminary conditions. This letter was followed by three notes upon the articles to be discussed, and I intended to complete the others in this manner, if Mr. Gerry had not refused to answer thereto.

When it became necessary to abandon the idea of treating with that envoy, who thought it important only to know how a negotiation might thereafter be resumed, I gave him the most solemn assurances concerning the reception that a new plenipotentiary would receive. It was far from my thoughts to insinuate that the President should send one from the United States, instead of investing with his powers some one who was in Europe; far less that the envoy should land directly in France, instead of announcing it in a neighboring country. I wished merely to say, that the Executive Directory was so decided for a reconciliation, that all tampering would be superfluous, that an act of confidence in it would excite its own. I should be very badly understood, if there should be found in my expressions a restriction on the nature of the choice which the President might make. I wished to encourage Mr. Gerry, by testimonies of regard, that his good intentions merited; although I could not dissemble that he wanted decision, at a moment when he might have easily adjusted every thing. It does not thence follow that I designated him. I will even avow that I think him too irresolute to be fit to hasten the conclusion of an affair of this kind. The advantages which I prized in him are common to all Americans who have not manifested a predilection for England. Can it be believed that a man who should profess a hatred or contempt of the French republic, or should manifest himself the advocate of royalty, can inspire the Directory with a favorable opinion of the dispositions of the Government of the United States? I should have disguised the truth, if I had left this matter ambiguous. It is not to wound the independence of that Government, to point out a sincere friend of peace the shoals he ought to avoid.

As to the mediation of the Batavian republic, and of Spain, I do not know that there is any serious question about it, and it appears to me absolutely useless. The United States might hesitate, in the present state of things, to refer themselves to their impartiality, and besides, I perceive no subject which may not be arranged directly.

I know that the distance which separates France and the United States opens a vast field for incidents, and there have been but too many of them. But the Executive Directory is unshaken in the conduct which may best obviate them. The excess even of provocations has deadened their effect. The Government of the United States surrounds itself with precautions against an imaginary attack. To stretch the hand to deluded friends, is what one republic owes to another, and I cannot doubt that the dignity of that attitude will convince the President of our pacific intentions.

The two Governments ought, above all, to be attentive to indirect attempts to alienate them still more. Their prudence will secure this object, and I shall cite but one example of it. You have told Mr. Murray the truth respecting Dr. Logan. But I perceive, that on all hands it is attempted to produce a belief in America, that we are negotiating with him. On the 7th of this month, a very insidious paragraph was inserted in the "Bien Informé." It is therein intimated that, guided by the citizen Thomas Paine, Dr. Logan has made application to the Executive Directory, in the character of a secret agent. The doctor has complained bitterly of it to me. He has no need of justifying himself concerning the matter, the falsity of which I know better than any body: but he assured me, that having once only met Thomas Paine, at the house of a third person, he found him so prejudiced against the United States, and so opinionative, with respect to an influence he neither possesses among them nor us, that he abstained from conversing any more with him. Moreover, to cut short all misunderstanding, I engaged Dr. Logan to postpone, till another time, the experiments he proposes to make on agriculture, and to return home. As to Mr. Hitchborn, of Massachusetts, I was even ignorant till now that he was in Europe. A single word will suffice for the rest.

We want nothing but justice on the part of the United States: we ask it: we offer it to their Government: it may depend upon the candor of the Executive Directory.

You will not doubt, citizen, that I approve of the communications which your zeal has caused you to seek with Mr. M. since I enabled you to resume them with official elucidations, &c.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

[This letter was received from Mr. Murray, without the French original.]

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Citizen Pichon, Secretary of Legation of the French republic near the Batavian republic.

PARIS, the 7th Vendemiaire, (September 28, 1798)
7th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.

I have received successively, citizen, your letters of the 22d and 27th Fructidor, (8th and 13th of September.) They give me more and more cause to be pleased with the measures you have adopted to detail to me your conversations with Mr. Murray: those conversations, at first merely friendly, have acquired a consistency, by my sanction, transmitted to you on the 11th Fructidor, (28th of August.) I do not regret that you have trusted to Mr. Murray's honor a copy of my letter. It was intended only for you; and it contains nothing but what is conformable to the Government's intention. I am fully convinced that should explanations once take place with confidence between the two cabinets, irritation would cease, a number of misunderstandings would disappear, and the ties of friendship would be more strongly united, as both parties would be made sensible what hand had attempted to disunite them. But I do not conceal from you that your letter of the 2d and 3d Vendemiaire, (23d and 24th of September,) this moment arrived, surprises me much. What Mr. Murray is still doubtful of has been very explicitly declared, before even the President's message to Congress, of the 3d Messidor, (21st of June,) was known in France. I had written it to Mr. Gerry, namely, on the 24th Messidor, (12th of July,) and 4th Thermidor, (July 22d.) I repeated it to him before he set off. A whole paragraph of my letter to you, of the 11th Fructidor, (28th of August,) of which Mr. Murray has a copy, is devoted to develop still more the fixed determination of the French Government. According to these bases, you were right to assert that whatever plenipotentiary the Government of the United States might send to France, in order to terminate the existing differences between the two countries, he would be undoubtedly received with the respect due to the representative of a free, independent, and powerful nation.

I cannot persuade myself, citizen, that the American Government need any further declaration from us, to take the resolution, in order to renew the negotiations; to adopt such measures, as would suggest their wish to bring the differences to a peaceable end. If misunderstandings on both sides have prevented former explanations reaching that end, it is presumable that these misunderstandings being done away, nothing henceforth will raise any obstacle to the reciprocal dispositions. The President's instructions to his envoys at Paris, which I have only been acquainted with, by the copy given to you by Mr. Murray, and by me received the 21st Messidor, (9th of July,) announce, if they contain the whole of the American Government's intentions, dispositions which can only add to those the Directory has always entertained: and notwithstanding the posterior acts of that Government, notwithstanding the irritating and almost hostile measures which they have adopted, the Directory has shown that it persisted in the dispositions consigned as well in my correspondence with Mr. Gerry, as in my letter to you of the 11th Fructidor, and which I have herein before repeated in the most explicit manner. Carry therefore, citizen, to Mr. Murray these positive expressions, to convince him of our sincerity, and request him to transmit them to his Government.

I presume, citizen, that this letter will find you at the Hague. If not, I ask it may be sent back to you at Paris.

Salute and fraternity.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

No. 22.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, PHILADELPHIA, March 6, 1799.

SIR:

I enclose a commission constituting you, in conjunction with the Chief Justice Ellsworth and Patrick Henry, Esq. of Virginia, envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French republic. By the President's direction I enclose, for your information, copies of his messages to the Senate of the 18th and 25th of March, by the latter of which you will see the motives inducing the nomination of a commission for the purpose of negotiating with France, instead of resting the business wholly with you. This will doubtless be agreeable by relieving you from the weight of a sole responsibility in an affair of such magnitude.

It is the President's desire that you, by letter to the French Minister of Foreign Relations, inform him "that Oliver Ellsworth, Chief Justice of the United States, Patrick Henry, late Governor of Virginia, and yourself, are appointed envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States to the French republic, with full powers to discuss and settle by a treaty all controversies between the United States and France:" But, "that the two former will not embark for Europe until they shall have received, from the Executive Directory, direct and unequivocal assurances, signified by their Secretary of Foreign Relations, that the envoys shall be received in character to an audience of the Directory, and that they shall enjoy all the prerogatives attached to that character by the law of nations, and that a minister or ministers of equal powers shall be appointed and commissioned to treat with them."

The answer you shall receive to your letter you will be pleased to transmit to this office.

You will also be pleased to understand it to be the President's opinion, that no more indirect and inofficial communications, written or verbal, should be held with any persons whatever, agents on behalf of France, on the subjects of difference between the United States and the French republic. If the French Government really desire a settlement of the existing differences, it must take the course above pointed out; unless the Executive Directory should prefer sending a minister plenipotentiary to the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

WILLIAM VANS MURRAY, Esq. Minister of the United States, at the Hague.

THE HAGUE, May 5, 1799.

CITIZEN MINISTER:

It is with the greatest pleasure that I hasten to fulfil the instructions, which I have just had the honor to receive from the Government of the United States of America, by informing you that the President has appointed Oliver Ellsworth, Chief Justice of the United States, Patrick Henry, late Governor of Virginia, and William Vans Murray, minister resident of the United States at the Hague, to be envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States to the French republic, with full powers to discuss and settle by a treaty, all controversies between the United States and France; but that the two former (Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Henry) will not embark for Europe until they shall have received from the Executive Directory direct and unequivocal assurances, signified by their Minister of Foreign Relations, that the envoys shall be received in character to an audience of the Directory, and that they shall enjoy all the prerogatives attached to that character by the law of nations, and that a minister or ministers of equal powers shall be appointed and commissioned to treat with them.

I request you, citizen minister, to lay this subject before your Government, and, as the distance is so great and the obstacles so numerous in an Atlantic voyage, that you will favor me, as speedily as possible, with the answer which is to lead to such happy and important consequences. Accept, citizen minister, the assurances of my perfect and high esteem.

WM. V. MURRAY.

To the Citizen TALLEYRAND,
Minister of the Exterior Relations of the French republic, &c. &c. PARIS.

THE HAGUE, May 7, 1799.

DEAR SIR:

On the 4th instant, late in the evening, I had the honor to receive your No. 22, containing the commission of envoys.

On the fifth I addressed, precisely agreeably to your instructions, as I conceived, the enclosed letter to Mr. Talleyrand, the Minister of Exterior Relations. You will perceive, sir, that I did not think myself at liberty to go, not only not out of the commas, but beyond them; in one word alone I deviated, in the word "minister" instead of "secretary" of foreign relations. No direct nor indirect and inofficial communications written or verbal will be held by me with the French agents on American affairs.

I accept the appointment which it has pleased the President to clothe me with, under a grateful sense of the high honor conferred upon me, so unexpectedly, by this mark of his confidence. I may be allowed to say, that though I was deeply sensible of the honor conferred by the first nomination, and shall always, I hope, retain a most grateful recollection of it, yet, sir, the new modification of that nomination gave me great pleasure. Always conceiving, as I thought I did, that any negotiation with France would be full of anxieties and political perils to the envoys that should be employed by our Government, I had no wishes to be engaged in it, and no expectation that I should be: to have a share in it was by me unsought. You will excuse this declaration, because I was instrumental in certain preliminary steps relative to the advances of France, which produced the basis of the appointment.

I sent the original of the enclosed to Mr. Talleyrand by post, another (a copy) to Major Mountflorence to be handed to him, a third to a Mr. Griffith for Major M. in case the other failed, to be opened by Mr. G. if Major M. should have been out of Paris, and directed Mr. G. to follow the instructions which he would find in the letter to Major M. which were to deliver the enclosed to Mr. Talleyrand and take his letter, answer for me, and to send it to me.

As soon as I have the answer of the Directory, I shall have the honor of transmitting copies to you, sir, by different ways.

I am, with the greatest respect, &c.

WILLIAM V. MURRAY.

The Hon. TIMOTHY PICKERING, Esq.
Secretary of State of the United States of America.

The Minister of Exterior Relations to Mr. William Vans Murray, Minister Resident of the United States, at the Hague.

PARIS, 23*d Floreal*, (May 12, 1799) 7*th year of the French republic, one and indivisible.*

I augur too well, sir, from the eagerness you display in fulfilling the instructions of your Government, not to hasten to answer the letter I received from you dated the 15th of this month.

The Executive Directory being informed of the nomination of Mr. Oliver Ellsworth, of Mr. Patrick Henry, and of yourself, as envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary of the United States to the French republic, to discuss and terminate all differences which subsist between the two countries, sees, with pleasure, that its perseverance in pacific sentiments has kept open the way to an approaching reconciliation. It has a long time ago manifested its intentions with respect to this subject. Be pleased to transmit to your colleagues, and accept yourself, the frank and explicit assurance that it will receive the envoys of the United States in the official character with which they are invested; that they shall enjoy all the prerogatives which are attached to it by the law of nations, and that one or more ministers shall be duly authorized to treat with them.

It was certainly unnecessary to suffer so many months to elapse for the mere confirmation of what I have already declared to Mr. Gerry, and which after his departure I caused to be declared to you at the Hague. I sincerely regret that your two colleagues await this answer at such a great distance. As to you, sir, whom it will reach in a few days, and who understand so well the value of time, when the restoration of harmony between two republics, which every thing invites to friendship, is in question, be assured, that as soon as you can take in hand the object of your mission, I shall have the honor immediately to send you passports.

Accept, sir, the assurances of my very sincere consideration.

CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND.

6th CONGRESS.] No. 155. [1st SESSION.

PRUSSIA.

COMMUNICATED TO THE SENATE, DECEMBER 6, 1799.

UNITED STATES, December 6, 1799.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

I lay before you, for your consideration, a treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and the King of Prussia, signed by their ministers on the 11th of July last.

JOHN ADAMS.

No. 2.

Traité d'amitié et de commerce entre sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse et les Etats Unis de l'Amérique.

Sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse, et les Etats Unis de l'Amérique, désirant d'entretenir sur un pied stable et permanent les liaisons de bonne intelligence, qui ont si heureusement subsisté jusqu'ici entre leurs Etats respectifs, et de renouveller pour cet effet le traité d'amitié et de commerce, qui a été conclu entre les deux Puissances a la Haye, le 10 Septembre, 1785, pour le terme de dix années, sa Majesté Prussienne a nommé et constitué ses plénipotentiaires, le sieur Charles Guillaume, Comte de Finckenstein, son ministre d'état, de guerre, et de cabinet, chevalier des ordres de l'aigle noir, et de l'aigle rouge, et commandeur de celui de St. Jean de Jérusalem; le sieur Philippe Charles, Baron d'Alvensleben, son ministre d'état, de guerre, et de cabinet, chevalier des ordres de l'aigle noir, et de l'aigle rouge, et de celui de St. Jean de Jérusalem; et le sieur Chretien Henri Curce, Comte de Haugwitz, son ministre d'etat, de guerre, et de cabinet, chevalier des ordres de l'aigle noir, et de l'aigle rouge; et le Président des Etats Unis a muni de leurs pleinpouvoirs Jean Quincy Adams, citoyen des Etats Unis, et leur ministre plénipotentiare à la cour de sa Majesté Prussienne; lesquels plénipotentiaires, après avoir échangé leurs pleinpouvoirs, trouvés en bonne et due forme, ont conclu, arreté, et signé les articles suivans:

ART. 1. Il y aura dans la suite, comme par le passé, une paix ferme, inviolable, et universelle, et une amitié sincere entre sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse, ses héritiers, successeurs, et sujets, d'une part, et les Etats Unis d'Amérique, et leurs citoyens, d'autre part, sans exception de personnes ou de lieux.

ART. 2. Les sujets de sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse pourront fréquenter toutes les côtes et les pays des Etats Unis de l'Amérique, y résider et trafiquer en toutes sortes de productions, manufactures, et marchandises, et n'y payeront d'autres ni de plus forts impôts, charges, ou droits, que ceux que les nations les plus favorisées sont, ou seront obligées de payer. Ils jouiront aussi dans la navigation et le commerce de tous les droits, priviléges, et exemptions dont jouit ou jouira la nation la plus favorisée; se soumettant, néanmoins, aux lois et usages établis, auxquels sont soumis les citoyens des Etats Unis et les nations les plus favorisées.

ART. 3. Pareillement, les citoyens des Etats Unis de l'Amérique pourront fréquenter toutes les côtes et tous les pays de sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse, y résider et trafiquer en toutes sortes de productions, manufactures, et marchandises, et ne payeront d'autres ni de plus forts impôts, charges, ou droits, dans les domaines de sa dite Majesté, que ceux que la nation la plus favorisée est, ou sera obligée de payer, et ils jouiront de tous les droits, priviléges, et exemptions dans la navigation et le commerce, dont jouit ou jouira la nation la plus favorisée; se soumettant, néanmoins, aux lois et usages établis, auxquels sont soumis les sujets de sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse, et les sujets et citoyens des nations les plus favorisées.

A treaty of amity and commerce between His Majesty the King of Prussia and the United States of America.

His Majesty the King of Prussia, and the United States of America, desiring to maintain, upon a stable and permanent footing, the connexions of good understanding, which have hitherto so happily subsisted between their respective States, and for this purpose to renew the treaty of amity and commerce, concluded between the two Powers, at the Hague, the 10th of September, 1785, for the term of ten years, His Prussian Majesty has nominated and constituted as his plenipotentiaries, the Count Charles William de Finckenstein, his minister of state, of war, and of the cabinet, knight of the orders of the black eagle, and of the red eagle, and commander of that of St. John of Jerusalem; the Baron Philip Charles d'Alvensleben, his minister of state, of war, and of the cabinet, knight of the orders of the black eagle, and of the red eagle, and of that of St. John of Jerusalem; and the Count Christian Henry Curt de Haugwitz, his minister of state, of war, and of the cabinet, knight of the orders of the black eagle, and of the red eagle; and the President of the United States has furnished, with their full powers, John Quincy Adams, a citizen of the United States, and their minister plenipotentiary at the court of His Prussian Majesty; which plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their full powers, found in good and due form, have concluded, settled, and signed the following articles:

ART. 1. There shall be in future, as there has been hitherto, a firm, inviolable, and universal peace, and sincere friendship between His Majesty the King of Prussia, his heirs, successors, and subjects, on the one part, and the United States of America, and their citizens, on the other, without exception of persons or places.

ART. 2. The subjects of His Majesty the King of Prussia, may frequent all the coasts and countries of the United States of America, and reside and trade there in all sorts of produce, manufactures, and merchandise; and shall pay there no other or greater duties, charges, or fees whatsoever, than the most favored nations are, or shall be obliged to pay. They shall also enjoy, in navigation and commerce, all the rights, privileges, and exemptions which the most favored nation does or shall enjoy, submitting themselves, nevertheless, to the established laws and usages, to which are submitted the citizens of the United States and the most favored nations.

ART. 3. In like manner, the citizens of the United States of America may frequent all the coasts and countries of His Majesty the King of Prussia, and reside and trade there in all sorts of produce, manufactures, and merchandise, and shall pay, in the dominions of His said Majesty, no other or greater duties, charges, or fees, whatsoever, than the most favored nation is, or shall be, obliged to pay; and they shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions in navigation and commerce, which the most favored nation does, or shall, enjoy; submitting themselves, nevertheless, to the established laws and usages to which are submitted the subjects of His Majesty the King of Prussia, and the subjects and citizens of the most favored nations.

Art. 4. En particulier, chacune des deux nations aura le droit d'importer ses propres productions, manufactures, et marchandises, à bord de ses propres bâtimens ou de tel autre, dans toutes les parties des domaines de l'autre, où il sera permis à tous les sujets et citoyens de l'autre nation de les achèter librement; comme aussi d'y charger les productions, manufactures, et marchandises de l'autre, que tous les dits sujets ou citoyens auront la liberté de leur vendre, en payant dans l'un et l'autre cas tels impôts, droits, et charges seulement, qui sont ou seront payés par la nation la plus favorisée. Cependant, sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse et les Etats Unis de l'Amérique, se reservent le droit, au cas que quelque nation restreigne le transport des marchandises aux vaisseaux de pays dont elles sont la production ou la manufacture, d'établir envers cette nation des réglemens reciproques, se reservant de plus le droit de prohiber dans leurs pays respectifs l'importation ou l'exportation de toute marchandise quelconque, dès que la raison d'état l'exige. En ce cas, les sujets ou citoyens d'une des parties contractantes ne pourront importer ni exporter les marchandises prohibées par l'autre. Mais si l'une des parties contractantes permet à quelque autre nation d'importer ou d'exporter ces mêmes marchandises, les citoyens ou sujets de l'autre partie contractante jouiront tout aussitôt d'une liberté pareille.

Art. 4. More especially, each party shall have a right to carry their own produce, manufactures, and merchandise, in their own or any other vessels, to any parts of the dominions of the other, where it shall be lawful for all the subjects and citizens of that other freely to purchase them; and thence to take the produce, manufactures, and merchandise of the other, which all the said citizens or subjects shall in like manner be free to sell them, paying in both cases such duties, charges, and fees only, as are or shall be paid by the most favored nation. Nevertheless, His Majesty the King of Prussia and the United States respectively reserve to themselves the right, where any nation restrains the transportation of merchandise to the vessels of the country of which it is the growth, or manufacture, to establish against such nations retaliating regulations; and also the right to prohibit, in their respective countries, the importation and exportation of all merchandise whatsoever, when reasons of state shall require it. In this case the subjects or citizens of either of the contracting parties shall not import nor export the merchandise prohibited by the other. But if one of the contracting parties permits any other nation to import or export the same merchandise, the citizens or subjects of the other shall immediately enjoy the same liberty.

Art. 5. Les marchands, commandans de vaisseaux, et autres sujets ou citoyens de chacune des deux nations, ne seront pas forcés, dans les ports ou dans la jurisdiction de l'autre, de décharger aucunes sortes des marchandises dans d'autres vaisseaux, ni de les recevoir à bord de leurs propres navires, ni d'attendre leur chargement plus longtemps qu'il ne leur plaira.

Art. 5. The merchants, commanders of vessels, or other subjects or citizens of either party, shall not, within the ports or jurisdiction of the other, be forced to unload any sort of merchandise into any other vessels, nor to receive them into their own, nor to wait for their being loaded longer than they please.

Art. 6. Pour éviter que les vaisseaux de l'une des deux parties contractantes ne soient inutilement molestés ou détenus dans les ports, ou sous la jurisdiction de l'autre, il a été convenu que la visite des marchandises, ordonnée par les loix, se fera avant qu'elles ne soient chargées sur le navire, et qu'ensuite elles ne seront plus assujettis à aucune visite. Et en général il ne se fera point de recherche à bord du vaisseau, à moins qu'on n'y ait chargé clandestinement et illégalement des marchandises prohibées. Dans ce cas, celui par l'ordre duquel elles ont été portées à bord, ou celui qui les y a portées sans ordre, sera soumis aux loix du pays où il se trouve, sans que le reste de l'équipage soit molesté, ni les autres marchandises, ou le vaisseau, saisis ou detenus par cette raison.

Art. 6. That the vessels of either party, loading within the ports or jurisdiction of the other, may not be uselessly harassed or detained, it is agreed, that all examinations of goods, required by the laws, shall be made before they are laden on board the vessel, and that there shall be no examination after; nor shall the vessel be searched at any time, unless articles shall have been laden therein clandestinely and illegally; in which case, the person by whose order they were carried on board, or who carried them without order, shall be liable to the laws of the land in which he is; but no other person shall be molested, nor shall any other goods, nor the vessel, be seized or detained for that cause.

Art. 7. Chacune des deux parties contractantes tâchera, par tous les moyens qui seront en son pouvoir, de protéger et de défendre tous les vaisseaux et autres effets appartenans aux citoyens ou sujets de l'autre, et se trouvant dans l'étendue de sa jurisdiction par mer ou par terre, et elle employera tous ses efforts pour recouvrer et faire restituer aux propriétaires légitimes les vaisseaux et effets, qui leur auront été enlevés dans l'étendue de sa dite jurisdiction.

Art. 7. Each party shall endeavor, by all the means in their power, to protect and defend all vessels and other effects belonging to the citizens or subjects of the other, which shall be within the extent of their jurisdiction, by sea or by land; and shall use all their efforts to recover, and cause to be restored to the right owners, their vessels and effects, which shall be taken from them within the extent of their said jurisdiction.

Art. 8. Les vaisseaux des sujets ou citoyens d'une des deux parties contractantes, arrivant sur une côte appartenante à l'autre, mais n'ayant pas dessein d'entrer au port, ou qui, en y entrant, ne voudroient pas décharger leurs cargaisons, ou rompre leur charge, auront la liberté de repartir et de poursuivre leur route sans empêchement, et sans être obligés de rendre compte de leur cargaison, ni de payer aucuns impôts, charges, ou droits quelconques, excepté ceux établis sur les vaisseaux une fois entrés dans le port, et destinés à l'entretien du port même, ou à d'autres établissemens, qui ont pour but la sûreté et la commodité des navigateurs; lesquels droits, charges, et impôts seront les mêmes, et se payeront sur le même pied qu'ils sont acquittés par les sujets ou citoyens de l'état où ils sont établis.

Art. 8. The vessels of the subjects or citizens of either party coming on any coast belonging to the other, but not willing to enter into port, or who, entering into port, are not willing to unload their cargoes or break bulk, shall have liberty to depart and to pursue their voyage, without molestation, and without being obliged to render account of their cargo, or to pay any duties, charges, or fees whatsoever, except those established for vessels entered into port, and appropriated to the maintenance of the port itself, or of other establishments, for the safety and convenience of navigators; which duties, charges, and fees, shall be the same, and shall be paid on the same footing as in the case of subjects or citizens of the country where they are established.

Art. 9. Au cas que quelque vaisseaux appartenant à l'une des deux parties contractantes auroit fait naufrage, échoué, ou souffert quelque autre dommage sur les côtes ou sous la domination de l'autre, les sujets ou citoyens respectifs recevront, tant pour eux que pour leurs vaisseaux et effets, la même assistance qui auroit été fournie aux habitans du pays où l'accident arrive; et ils payeront seulement les memes charges et droits auxquels les dits habitans auroient été assujettis en cas pareil. Et si la réparation du vaisseau exigeoit que la cargaison fût déchargée, en tout ou en partie, ils ne payeront aucun impôt, charge, ou droit, de ce qui sera rembarqué et emporté. L'ancien et barbare droit de naufrage sera entièrement aboli à l'égard des sujets ou citoyens des deux parties contractantes.

Art. 9. When any vessel of either party shall be wrecked, foundered, or otherwise damaged, on the coasts, or within the dominions of the other, their respective subjects, or citizens, shall receive, as well for themselves, as for their vessels and effects, the same assistance which would be due to the inhabitants of the country where the damage happens, and shall pay the same charges and dues only as the said inhabitants would be subject to pay in a like case: and if the operations of repair shall require that the whole or any part of their cargo be unladed, they shall pay no duties, charges, or fees, on the part which they shall relade and carry away. The ancient and barbarous right to wrecks of the sea shall be entirely abolished with respect to the subjects or citizens of the two contracting parties.

Art. 10. Les citoyens ou sujets de l'une des parties contractantes auront, dans les états de l'autre, la liberté de disposer de leurs biens personnels, soit par testament, donation, ou autrement; et leurs héritiers, étant sujets ou citoyens de l'autre partie contractante, succéderont à

Art. 10. The citizens or subjects of each party shall have power to dispose of their personal goods within the jurisdiction of the other, by testament, donation, or otherwise; and their representatives, being subjects or citizens of the other party, shall succeed to their said personal leurs biens, soit en vertu d'un testament, ou ab intestato, et ils pourront en prendre possession, soit en personne, soit par d'autres agissant en leur place, et en disposeront à leur volonté, en ne payant d'autres droits que ceux auxquels les habitants du pays où la succession est devenue vacante, sont assujettis en pareille occurrence. Et en cas d'absence des héritiers, on prendra provisoirement des biens qui leur sont échus, les memes soins qu'on auroit pris en pareille occasion des biens des natifs du pays, jusqu'à ce que le propriétaire légitime ait agrée des arrangemens pour recueillir l'héritage. S'il s'éleve des contestations entre différens prétendans ayant droit à la succession, elles seront décidées en dernier ressort selon les loix et par les juges du pays où la succession est vacante. Et si par la mort de quelque personne possédant des biens-fonds sur le territoire de l'une des parties contractantes, ces biens-fonds venoient à passer, selon les loix du pays, à un citoyen ou sujet de l'autre partie, celui-ci, si, par sa qualité d'étranger il est inhabile de les posséder, obtiendra un délai convenable pour les vendre et pour en retirer le provenu, sans obstacle, et exempt de tout droit de retenue, de la parte du Gouvernement des états respectifs. Mais cet article ne derogera en aucune maniere à la force des lois qui ont déjà été publiées ou qui le seront dans la suite, par Sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse, pour prévenir l'émigration de ses sujets.

goods, whether by testament, or ab intestato, and may take possession thereof, either by themselves or by others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their will, paying such dues only as the inhabitants of the country wherein the said goods are shall be subject to pay in like cases. And in case of the absence of the representative, such care shall be taken of the said goods, as would be taken of the goods of a native in like case, until the lawful owner may take measures for receiving them. And if question should arise among several claimants to which of them the said goods belong, the same shall be decided finally by the laws and judges of the land wherein the said goods are. And where, on the death of any person holding real estate within the territories of the one party, such real estate would, by the laws of the land, descend on a citizen or subject of the other, were he not disqualified by alienage, such subject shall be allowed a reasonable time to sell the same, and to withdraw the proceeds without molestation, and exempt from all rights of detraction on the part of the Government of the respective States. But this article shall not derogate in any manner from the force of the laws already published, or hereafter to be published, by His Majesty the King of Prussia, to prevent the emigration of his subjects.

Art. 11. Il sera accordé la plus parfaite liberté de conscience et de culte aux citoyens et sujets de chaque partie contractante dans les états de l'autre, et personne ne sera molesté à cet égard pour quelque cause que ce soit, si ce n'est pour insulte faite à la religion de l'autre. De plus, si des sujets et citoyens de l'une des parties contractantes venoient à mourir dans la jurisdiction de l'autre, leurs corps seront enterrés dans les endroits où l'on a la coutume de faire les enterremens, ou dans tel autre lieu décent et convenable, et ils seront protégés contre toute violence et trouble.

Art. 11. The most perfect freedom of conscience and of worship is granted to the citizens or subjects of either party, within the jurisdiction of the other, and no person shall be molested in that respect, for any cause other than an insult on the religion of others. Moreover, when the subjects or citizens of the one party shall die within the jurisdiction of the other, their bodies shall be buried in the usual burying grounds, or other decent and suitable places, and shall be protected from violation or disturbance.

Art. 12. L'éxpérience ayant demontré que le principe adopté dans l'article 12 du traité de 1785, selon lequel les vaisseaux libres rendent aussi les marchandises libres, n'a pas été suffisamment respecté dans les deux dernières guerres, et nommément dans celle qui dure encore, les deux parties contractantes se reservent de s'entendre après le retour de la paix générale, soit séparément entr' elles, soit conjointement avec d'autres Puissances cointeressés, pour concerter avec les grandes Puissances maritimes de l'Europe tels arrangements et tels principes permanens qui puissent servir à consolider la liberté et la sureté de la navigation et du commerce neutres dans les guerres futures. Et si, pendant cet intervalle, l'une des parties contractantes se trouve engagée dans une guerre à laquelle l'autre reste neutre, les vaisseaux de guerre et les armateurs de la Puissance belligérante se comporteront à l'égard de batimens marchands de la Puissance neutre, aussi favorablement que la raison de guerre pour lors existante pourra le permettre, en observant les principes et les regles du droit des gens généralement reconnus.

Art. 12. Experience having proved, that the principle adopted in the 12th article of the treaty of 1785, according to which free ships make free goods, has not been sufficiently respected during the two last wars, and especially in that which still continues, the two contracting parties propose, after the return of a general peace, to agree, either separately between themselves, or jointly with other Powers alike interested, to concert with the great maritime Powers of Europe such arrangements and such permanent principles as may serve to consolidate the liberty and the safety of the neutral navigation and commerce in future wars. And if, in the interval, either of the contracting parties should be engaged in war, to which the other should remain neutral, the ships of war and privateers of the belligerent Power shall conduct themselves towards the merchant vessels of the neutral Power as favorably as the course of the war then existing may permit, observing the principles and rules of the law of nations, generally acknowledged.

Art. 13. Dans le cas où l'une des parties contractantes se trouveroit en guerre avec une autre Puissance, il a été convenu, que pour prévenir les difficultés et les discussions qui surviennent ordinairement par rapport au marchandises de contrebande, telles que armes et munitions de toute espèce, aucun de ces articles chargés à bord des vaisseaux des sujets ou citoyens de l'une des parties, et destinés pour l'ennemi de l'autre, ne sera censé contrebande, au point d'impliquer confiscation ou condamnation, et d'entrainer la perte de la propriété des individus. Néanmoins, il sera permis d'arrêter ces sortes de vaisseaux et effets, et de les retenir pendant tout les temps que le preneur croira nécessaire, pour prévenir les inconveniens et les dommages qui pourraient en résulter autrement; mais dans ce cas, on accordera une compensation raisonnable pour les pertes qui auront été occasionnées par la saisie. Et il sera permis en outre aux preneurs d'employer à leur service, en tout ou en partie, les munitions militaires détenues, en payant aux propriétaires la pleine valeur, à déterminer sur le prix qui aura cours à l'endroit de leur destination; mais si dans le cas énoncé d'un vaisseau arreté pour des articles de contrebande, le maitre du navire consent à délivrer les marchandises suspectés, il aura la liberté de la faire, et le navire ne sera plus amené dans le port, ni détenu plus longtemps, mais aura toute liberté de poursuivre sa route.

Seront censés objets de contrebande, les canons, mortiers, armes à feu, pistolets, bombes, grenades, boulets, bales, fusils, pierres à feu, meches, poudre, salpetre, souffre, cuirasses, piques, epées, ceinturons, pôches à cartouches, selles et brides, au delà de la quantité nécessaire pour l'usage du vaisseau, et au delà de celle que doit avoir chaque homme servant sur le vaisseau, ou passager, et en général tout ce qui est compris sous la dénomination

Art. 13. And in the same case of one of the contracting parties being engaged in war with any other Power, to prevent all the difficulties and misunderstandings that usually arise respecting the merchandise of contraband, such as arms, ammunition, and military stores of every kind, no such articles carried in the vessels, or by the subjects or citizens of either party, to the enemies of the other, shall be deemed contraband, so as to induce confiscation or condemnation, and a loss of property to individuals. Nevertheless, it shall be lawful to stop such vessels and articles, and to detain them for such length of time as the captors may think necessary to prevent the inconvenience or damage that might ensue from their proceeding; paying, however, a reasonable compensation for the loss such arrest shall occasion to the proprietors: and it shall further be allowed to use, in the service of the captors, the whole or any part of the military stores so detained, paying the owners the full value of the same, to be ascertained by the current price at the place of its destination. But in the case supposed, of a vessel stopped for articles of contraband, if the master of the vessel stopped will deliver out the goods supposed to be of contraband nature, he shall be permitted to do it, and the vessel shall not in that case be carried into any port, nor further detained, but shall be allowed to proceed on her voyage.

All cannons, mortars, fire arms, pistols, bombs, grenades, bullets, balls, muskets, flints, matches, powder, saltpetre, sulphur, cuirasses, pikes, swords, belts, cartouch-boxes, saddles, and bridles, beyond the quantity necessary for the use of the ship, or beyond that which every man serving on board the vessel, or passenger, ought to have; and, in general, whatever is comprised under the denomination of arms and military stores, of d'armes et de munitions de guerre, de quelque espèce qu'elles puissent être.

Art. 14. Pour assurer aux vaisseaux des deux parties contractantes l'avantages d'être promptement and sûrement reconnus en temps de guerre, on est convenu qu'ils devront être munis des lettres de mer et documens spécifiés ci-après:

1. D'un passeport exprimant le nom, le propriétaire, et le port du navire, ainsi que le nom et le domicile du maitre. Ces passeports, qui seront expediés en bonne et due forme, devront être renouvellés toutes les fois que le vaisseau retournera dans son port, et seront exhibés à chaque requisition, tant en pleine mer que dans le port. Mais si le navire se trouve sous le convoi d'un ou de plusieurs vaisseaux de guerre appartenants à la partie neutre, il suffira que l'officier commandant le convoi déclare que le navire est de son parti, moyennant quoi cette simple déclaration sera censée établir le fait, et dispensera les deux parties de toute visite ultérieure.

2. De la certe-parte; c'est à dire, du contrât passé pour le frêt de tout le navire, ou des connoissemens donnés pour la cargaison en général. Et

3. Du rôle d'équipage, contenant l'indication nominale et detaillée des personnes qui composent l'équipage du navire. Ces documens seront toujours expediés dans la forme etablie à l'endroit d'où le navire aura mis à la voile.

Comme leur production ne doit être exigée que dans le cas où l'une des parties contractantes seroit en guerre, et que leur exhibition ne doit avoir d'autre but que de prouver la neutralité des vaisseaux, de leurs équipages, et de leurs cargaisons, ils ne seront pas censés absolument nécessaires à bord des navires de la partie neutre, qui seront sortis de ses ports, avant, ou trois mois après, que le Gouvernement aura en connoissance de l'état de guerre où se trouve la partie belligérante. Pendant cet intervalle, le navire pourra, au défaut des documens ci-dessus spécifiés, prouver sa neutralité par tel autre témoignage que les tribunaux appellés a juger du cas trouveront suffisans.

Art. 15. Pour prévenir entièrement tout désordre et tout violence en pareil cas, il a été stipulé que lorsque les navires de la partie neutre, navigeant sans convoi, rencontreront quelque vaisseau de guerre, public ou particulier, de l'autre partie, le vaisseau de guerre n'enverra pas plus de deux ou trois hommes dans sa chaloupe à bord du navire neutre, pour examiner les passeports et documens. Et toutes les personnes appartenantes à quelque vaisseau de guerre public ou particulier qui molesteront ou insulteront en quelque manière que ce soit l'équipage, les vaisseaux, ou effets de l'autre partie, seront responsables en leurs personnes et en leurs biens, de tous dommages et intérêts, pour lesquels il sera donné caution suffisante par tous les commandans de vaisseaux armés en course, avant qu'ils reçoivent leurs commissions.

Art. 16. Dans les tems de guerre, et le cas de nécessité urgente, où l'une des parties contractantes se verroit obligée d'établir un embargo général, soit dans tous les ports de sa domination, soit dans certains ports particuliers, les vaisseaux de l'autre partie resteront assujettis à cette mésure, sur le même pied que le seront les navires des nations les plus avantagées, sans pouvoir reclamer l'exemption, qui avoit été stipulée en leur faveur dans l'article 16 de l'ancien traité de 1785. Mais, d'un autre côté, les propriétaires des vaisseaux, qui auront été retenus, soit pour quelque expédition militaire, soit pour tel autre usage que ce soit, obtiendront du Gouvernement qui les aura employés, une indemnité équitable, tant pour le frêt que pour les pertes occasionnées par le retard. De plus, et dans tous les cas de saisie, de détention, ou d'arrêt, soit pour dettes contractées, ou offenses commises par quelque citoyen ou sujet de l'une des parties contractantes, dans la jurisdiction de l'autre, on procédera uniquement par ordre et par autorité de la justice, et suivant les voyes ordinaires en pareil cas usitées.

Art. 17. S'il arrivoit que les bâtimens ou effets de la Puissance neutre fussent pris par l'ennemi de l'autre, ou par un pirate, et ensuite repris par la puissance en guerre, ils seront restitués au premier propriétaire, aux conditions qui seront stipulés, ci-après dans l'article vingt-un, pour les cas de reprise.

Art. 18. Lorsque les citoyens ou sujets de l'une des deux parties contractantes seront forcés par des tempêtes, ou par la poursuite des corsaires, ou vaisseaux ennemis, ou par quelque autre accident, a se réfugier avec leurs vaisseaux ou effets dans les havres, ou dans la jurisdiction de l'autre, ils seront reçus, protégés et traités avec humanité et honnêteté. Il leur sera permis de se pourvoir, à un prix raisonnable, de refraichissemens, de provisions, et de toutes choses nécessaires pour leur subsistance, santé, et commodité, et pour la réparation de leurs vaisseaux.

what description soever, shall be deemed objects of contraband.

Art. 14. To ensure to the vessels of the two contracting parties the advantage of being readily and certainly known in time of war, it is agreed that they shall be provided with the sea letters and documents hereafter specified.

1. A passport, expressing the name, the property, and the burthen of the vessel, as also the name and dwelling of the master, which passport shall be made out in good and due form, shall be renewed as often as the vessel shall return into port, and shall be exhibited whensoever required, as well in the open sea as in port. But if the vessel be under convoy of one or more vessels of war belonging to the neutral party, the simple declaration of the officer commanding the convoy that the said vessel belongs to the party of which he is, shall be considered as establishing the fact, and shall relieve both parties from the trouble of further examination.

2. A charter-party; that is to say, the contract passed for the freight of the whole vessel, or the bills of lading given for the cargo in detail.

3. The list of the ship's company; containing an indication by name, and in detail, of the persons composing the crew of the vessel. These documents shall always be authenticated, according to the forms established at the place from which the vessel shall have sailed.

As their production ought to be exacted only when one of the contracting parties shall be at war, and as their exhibition ought to have no other object than to prove the neutrality of the vessel, its cargo, and company, they shall not be deemed absolutely necessary on board such vessels belonging to the neutral party as shall have sailed from its ports before or within three months after the Government shall have been informed of the state of war in which the belligerent party shall be engaged. In the interval, in default of these specific documents, the neutrality of the vessel may be established by such other evidence as the tribunals authorized to judge of the case may deem sufficient.

Art. 15. And to prevent entirely all disorder and violence in such cases, it is stipulated, that, when the vessels of the neutral party, sailing without convoy, shall be met by any vessel of war, public or private, of the other party, such vessel of war shall not send more than two or three men in their boat on board the said neutral vessel, to examine her passports and documents. And all persons belonging to any vessel of war, public or private, who shall molest or insult in any manner whatever the people, vessels, or effects of the other party, shall be responsible in their persons and property for damages and interest; sufficient security for which shall be given by all commanders of private armed vessels before they are commissioned

Art. 16. In times of war, or in cases of urgent necessity, when either of the contracting parties shall be obliged to lay a general embargo, either in all its ports, or in certain particular places, the vessels of the other party shall be subject to this measure, upon the same footing as those of the most favored nations, but without having the right to claim the exemption in their favor stipulated in the 16th article of the former treaty of 1785. But, on the other hand, the proprietors of the vessels which shall have been detained, whether for some military expedition, or for what other use soever, shall obtain from the Government that shall have employed them an equitable indemnity, as well for the freight as for the loss occasioned by the delay. And furthermore, in all cases of seizure, detention, or arrest, for debts contracted, or offences committed by any citizen or subject of the one party, within the jurisdiction of the other, the same shall be made and prosecuted by order and authority of law only, and according to the regular course of proceedings usual in such cases.

Art. 17. If any vessel or effects of the neutral Power be taken by an enemy of the other, or by a pirate, and retaken by the Power at war, they shall be restored to the first proprietor, upon the conditions hereafter stipulated, in the twenty-first article, for cases of recapture.

Art. 18. If the citizens or subjects of either party, in danger from tempests, pirates, enemies, or other accident, shall take refuge, with their vessels or effects, within the harbors or jurisdiction of the other, they shall be received, protected, and treated with humanity and kindness, and shall be permitted to furnish themselves, at reasonable prices, with all refreshments, provisions, and other things necessary for their sustenance, health, and accommodation, and for the repair of their vessels.

Art. 19. Les vaisseaux de guerre, publics et particuliers, des deux parties contractantes, pourront conduire en toute liberté, partout où il leur plaira, les vaisseaux et effets qu'ils auront pris sur leurs ennemis, sans être obligés de payer aucunes impôts, charges, ou droits aux officiers de l'amirauté, des douanes, ou autres. Ces prises ne pourront être non plus ni arrêtées, ni visitées, ni soumises à des procédures légales, en entrant dans le port de l'autre partie, mais elles pourront en sortir librement, et être conduites en tout temps par le vaisseau preneur aux endroits portés par les commissions; dont l'officier commandant le dit vaisseau sera obligé de faire montre. Mais conformément aux traités subsistans entre les Etats Unis et le Grand Brétagne, tout vaisseau qui aura fait une prise sur des sujets de cette dernière puissance, ne sauroit obtenir un droit d'asile dans les ports des Etats Unis, et s'il est forcé d'y relâcher par des tempêtes ou quelque autre danger ou accident de mer, il sera obligé d'en repartir le plutôt possible.

Art. 20. Aucun citoyen ou sujet de l'une des deux parties contractantes n'acceptera d'une puissance avec laquelle l'autre pourroit être en guerre, ni commission, ni lettre de marque, pour armer en course contre cette dernière, sous peine d'être puni comme pirate. Et ni l'un ni l'autre des deux états ne louera, prêtera, ou donnera une partie de ses forces navales ou militaires à l'ennemi de l'autre, pour l'aider à agir offensivement ou défensivement contre l'état qui est en guerre.

Art. 21. S'il arrivoit que les deux parties contractantes fussent en mêmes tems en guerre contre un ennemi commun, on observera de part et d'autre les points suivans:

1. Lorsqu'un navire de l'une des deux nations sera repris par les vaisseaux de guerre ou armateurs de l'autre avant d'avoir été conduit dans un port ennemi ou neutre, il sera restitué avec sa cargaison au premier propriétaire, moyennant une rétribution d'un huitième de la valeur du navire et de la cargaison, si la reprise a été faite par un vaisseau de guerre, et d'un sixième, si elle a été faite par un armateur.

2. Dans ces cas, la restitution n'aura lieu qu'après les preuves faites de la propriété, sous caution de la quote-part qui en revient à ceux qui ont repris le navire.

3. Les vaisseaux de guerre, publics et particuliers, des deux parties contractantes, seront admis réciproquement avec leurs prises dans les ports respectifs, cependant ces prises ne pourront y être déchargées, ni vendues, qu'après que la légitimité de la prise aura été décidée suivante les loix et réglemens de l'état dont le preneur est sujet, mais par la justice du lieu où la prise aura été conduite.

4. Il sera libre à chacune des parties contractantes de faire tels réglemens qu'elles jugeront nécessaires, relativement à la conduite que devront tenir respectivement leurs vaisseaux de guerre publics et particuliers à l'égard des bâtimens qu'ils auront pris et amenés dans les ports des deux Puissances.

Art. 22. Lorsque les parties contractantes seront engagées en guerre contre un ennemi commun, ou qu'elles seront neutres toutes deux, les vaisseaux de guerre de l'une prendront, en toute occasion, sous leur protection, les navires de l'autre, qui font avec eux la même route, et ils defendront aussi longtemps qu'ils feront voile ensemble, contre toute force et violence, et de la même manière qu'ils protégeroient et défendroient les navires de leur propre nation.

Art. 23. S'il survient une guerre entre les parties contractantes, les marchands de l'un des deux états qui resideront dans l'autre, auront la permission d'y rester encore neuf mois, pour recueillir leurs dettes actives, et arranger leurs affaires, après quoi ils pourront partir en toute liberté, et emporter tous leurs biens, sans être molestés ni empêchés. Les femmes et les enfans, les gens de lettres de toutes les facultés, les cultivateurs, artisans, manufacturiers, et pêcheurs, qui ne sont point armés, et qui habitant des villes, villages, ou places non fortifiées, et en général tous ceux dont la vocation tend à la subsistance et à l'avantage commun du genre humain, auront la liberté de continuer leurs professions respectives, et ne seront point molestés en leur personnes, ni leurs maisons, ou leurs biens incendiés, ou autrement detruits, ni leurs champs ravagés par les armées de l'ennemi au pouvoir duquel ils pourroient tomber par les événemens de la guerre; mais si l'on se trouve dans la necessité de prendre quelque chose de leurs propriétés pour l'usage de l'armée ennemie, la valeur en sera payée à un prix raisonnable.

Art. 24. Afin d'adoucir le sort des prisonniers de guerre, et de ne les point exposer à être envoyés dans des climats éloignés et rigoureux, ou resserrés dans des habitations étroites et malsaines, les deux parties contractantes s'engagent solemnellement l'une envers l'autre, et à la face de l'univers, qu'elles n'adopteront aucun de ces usages; que les prisonniers qu'elles pourroient

Art. 19. The vessels of war, public and private, of both parties, shall carry freely, wheresoever they please, the vessels and effects taken from their enemies, without being obliged to pay any duties, charges, or fees, to officers of admiralty, of the customs, or any others; nor shall such prizes be arrested, searched, or put under legal process, when they come to and enter the ports of the other party, but may freely be carried out again at any time by their captors, to the places expressed in their commissions, which the commanding officer of such vessel shall be obliged to show. But, conformably to the treaties existing between the United States and Great Britain, no vessel that shall have made a prize upon British subjects shall have a right to shelter in the ports of the United States; but, if forced therein by tempests, or any other danger, or accident of the sea, they shall be obliged to depart as soon as possible.

Art. 20. No citizen or subject of either of the contracting parties shall take from any Power with which the other may be at war, any commission or letter of marque for arming any vessel to act as a privateer against the other, on pain of being punished as a pirate: nor shall either party hire, lend, or give any part of its naval or military force, to the enemy of the other, to aid them offensively or defensively against the other.

Art. 21. If the two contracting parties should be engaged in a war against a common enemy, the following points shall be observed between them:

1. If a vessel of one of the parties, taken by the enemy, shall, before being carried into a neutral or enemy's port, be retaken by a ship of war, or privateer of the other, it shall, with the cargo, be restored to the first owners, for a compensation of one-eighth part of the value of the said vessel and cargo, if the recapture be made by a public ship of war; and one-sixth part, if made by a privateer.

2. The restitution in such cases shall be after due proof of property, and surety given for the part to which the recaptors are entitled.

3. The vessels of war, public and private, of the two parties, shall reciprocally be admitted with their prizes into the respective ports of each; but the said prizes shall not be discharged or sold there, until their legality shall have been decided, according to the laws and regulations of the state to which the captor belongs, but by the judicatories of the place into which the prize shall have been conducted.

4. It shall be free to each party to make such regulations as they shall judge necessary for the conduct of their respective vessels of war, public and private, relative to the vessels which they shall take and carry into the ports of the two parties.

Art. 22. Where the contracting parties shall have a common enemy, or shall both be neutral, the vessels of war of each shall, upon all occasions, take under their protection the vessels of the other going the same course, and shall defend such vessels, as long as they hold the same course, against all force and violence, in the same manner as they ought to protect and defend vessels belonging to the party of which they are.

Art. 23. If war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other, shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs, and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects, without molestation or hindrance; and all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artizans, manufacturers, and fishermen, unarmed, and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, or places, and, in general, all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind, shall be allowed to continue their respective employments, and shall not be molested in their persons, nor shall their houses or goods be burnt, or otherwise destroyed, nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy, into whose power, by the events of war, they may happen to fall; but if any thing is necessary to be taken from them for the use of such armed force, the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price.

Art. 24. And to prevent the destruction of prisoners of war, by sending them into distant and inclement countries, or by crowding them into close and noxious places, the two contracting parties solemnly pledge themselves to the world, and to each other, that they will not adopt any such practice: that neither will send the prisoners whom they may take from the other into the East Indies, faire l'une sur l'autre ne seront transportés ni aux Indes Orientales, ni dans aucune contrée de l'Asie ou de l'Afrique, mais qu'on leur assignera en Europe ou en Amérique, dans les territoires respectifs des parties contractantes, un séjour situé dans un air sain; qu'ils ne seront point confinés dans des cachôts, ni dans des prisons, ni dans des vaisseaux de prison, qu'ils ne seront pas mis aux fers, ni garrotés, ni autrement privés de l'usage de leurs membres; que les officiers seront relâchés sur leur parole d'honneur, dans l'enceinte de certains districts qui leur seront fixés, et qu'on leur accordera des logemens commodes; que les simples soldats seront distribués dans des cantonnemens ouverts, assez vastes pour prendre l'air et l'exercice, et qu'ils seront logés dans des barraques aussi spacieuses et aussi commodes que le sont celles des troupes de la Puissance au pouvoir de laquelle se trouvent les prisonniers; que cette Puissance fera pourvoir journellement les officiers d'autant de rations composées des mêmes articles et de la même qualité, dont jouissent en nature, ou en équivalent, les officiers du même rang qui sont à son propre service; qu'elle fournira également à tous les autres prisonniers une ration pareille à celle qui est accordée au soldat de sa propre armée. Le montant de ces dépenses sera payé par l'autre Puissance, d'après une liquidation de compte à arrêter reciproquement pour l'entretien des prisonniers à la fin de la guerre; et ces comptes ne seront point confondus ou balancés avec d'autres comptes, ni la solde qui en est due, retenue comme compensation ou représailles, pour tel autre article ou telle autre prétention réelle ou supposée. Il sera permis à chacune des deux Puissances d'entretenir un commissaire de leur choix, dans chaque cantonnement des prisonniers qui sont au pouvoir de l'autre. Ces commissaires auront la liberté de visiter prisonniers aussi souvent qu'ils le desireront, ils pourront également recevoir et distribuer les douceurs que les parens ou amis des prisonniers leur feront parvenir; enfin, il leur sera libre encore de faire leurs rapports, par lettres ouvertes, à ceux qui les employent; mais si un officier manquoit à sa parole d'honneur, ou qu'un autre prisonnier sortit des limites qui auront été fixées à son cantonnement, un tel officier ou autre prisonnier sera frustré individuellement des avantages stipulés dans cet article pour sa relaxation sur parole d'honneur ou pour son cantonnement. Les deux Puissances contractantes ont declaré en outre, que, ni le prétexte que la guerre rompt les traités, ni tel autre motif quelconque, ne seront censé annuller ou suspendre cet article et le précédent: mais. qu'au contraire, le tems de la guerre est précisément celui pour lequel ils ont été stipulés, et durant lequel ils seront observés aussi saintement que les articles les plus universellement reconnus par le droit de la nature et des gens.

Art. 25. Les deux parties contractantes se sont accordé mutuellement la faculté de tenir dans leurs ports respectifs, des consuls, vice consuls, agens, et commissaires de leur choix, et dont ils y jouiront des mêmes priviléges et pouvoirs dont jouissent ceux des nations les plus favorisés. Mais dans le cas où tel ou autre de ces consuls veuille faire le commerce, il sera soumis au mêmes loix et usages auxquels sont soumis les particuliers de sa nation à l'endroit où il réside.

Art. 26. Lorsque l'une des deux parties contractantes accordera dans la suite quelque faveur particulière en fait de navigation ou de commerce à d'autres nations, elle deviendra aussitôt commune à l'autre partie contractante, et celle-ci jouira de cette faveur, gratuitement, si la concession est gratuite, ou en accordant la même compensation, si la concession est conditionnelle.

Art. 27. Sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse et les Etats Unis de l'Amérique sont convenus que le présent traité aura son plein effet pendant l'espace de dix années, à compter du jour de l'échange des ratifications; et que si l'expiration de ce terme arrivoit dans le cours d'une guerre entr'eux, les articles ci-dessus stipulés pour régler leur conduite en temps de guerre, conserveront toute leur force jusqu'à la conclusion du traité qui retablira la paix.

Le présent traité sera ratifié de part et d'autre, et les ratifications seront échangées, dans l'espace d'une année, à compter du jour de la signature; ou plutôt, si faire se peut.

En foi de quoi, les plénipotentiaires susnommés ont signé le présent traité, et y ont apposé le cachet de leurs armes.

or any other parts of Asia or Africa; but they shall be placed in some part of their dominions in Europe or America, in wholesome situations; that they shall not be confined in dungeons, prison ships, nor prisons, nor be put into irons, nor bound, nor otherwise restrained in the use of their limbs; that the officers shall be enlarged on their paroles within convenient districts, and have comfortable quarters, and the common men be disposed in cantonments open and extensive enough for air and exercise, and lodged in barracks as roomy and good as are provided by the party in whose power they are for their own troops; that the officers shall also be daily furnished by the party in whose power they are with as many rations, and of the same articles and quality, as are allowed by them, either in kind or by commutation, to officers of equal rank in their own army; and all others shall be daily furnished by them with such rations as they allow to a common soldier in their own service; the value whereof shall be paid by the other party on a mutual adjustment of accounts for the subsistence of prisoners at the close of the war; and the said accounts shall not be mingled with, or set off against any others, nor the balances due on them be withheld as a satisfaction or reprisal for any other article, or for any other cause, real or pretended, whatever; that each party shall be allowed to keep a commissary of prisoners, of their own appointment, with every separate cantonment, of prisoners in possession of the other, which commissary shall see the prisoners as often as he pleases, shall be allowed to receive and distribute whatever comforts may be sent to them by their friends, and shall be free to make his reports in open letters to those who employ him; but if any officer shall break his parole, or any other prisoner shall escape from the limits of his cantonment, after they shall have been designated to him, such individual officer, or other prisoner, shall forfeit so much of the benefit of this article as provides for his enlargement on parole or cantonment. And it is declared, that neither the pretence that war dissolves all treaties, nor any other whatever, shall be considered as annulling or suspending this and the next preceding article; but, on the contrary, that the state of war is precisely that for which they are provided, and during which they are to be as sacredly observed as the most acknowledged articles in the law of nature or nations.

Art. 25. The two contracting parties have granted to each other the liberty of having each, in the ports of the other, consuls, vice consuls, agents, and commissaries, of their own appointment, who shall enjoy the same privileges and powers as those of the most favored nations. But if any such consul shall exercise commerce, he shall be submitted to the same laws and usages to which the private individuals of their nation are submitted in the same place.

Art. 26. If either party shall hereafter grant to any other nation any particular favor in navigation or commerce, it shall immediately become common to the other party, freely, where it is freely granted to such other nation, or on yielding the same compensation, when the grant is conditional.

Art. 27. His Majesty the King of Prussia, and the United States of America, agree that this treaty shall be in force during the term of ten years from the exchange of the ratifications; and if the expiration of that term should happen during the course of a war between them, then the articles before provided for the regulation of their conduct during such a war shall continue in force until the conclusion of the treaty which shall restore peace.

This treaty shall be ratified on both sides, and the ratifications exchanged, within one year from the day of its signature, or sooner, if possible.

In testimony whereof, the plenipotentiaries before mentioned have hereto subscribed their names, and affixed their seals.

[The following instructions and correspondence were communicated to the Senate, by the message of 17th February, 1799.]

Instructions from the Secretary of State to John Quincy Adams, Minister Plenipotentiary to Prussia.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 15, 1797.

SIR:

By inspecting the treaty of amity and commerce, concluded in the year 1785, between the United States and the late Frederick the Second, King of Prussia, you will observe that it was to be in force during the term of ten years from the exchange of ratifications. This exchange took place about the month of September in the year 1786, and, of course, the treaty has expired.

You will receive herewith a commission containing full powers to renew this treaty in its present form, for another term of ten years, but with the following exceptions, if the same shall be assented to on the part of the King.

1. It will be expedient to omit that part of the sixteenth article which exempts the vessels of each party from embargo; and to render them liable to a general embargo. There is a like clause of exemption in our treaty with Sweden, which occasioned disgreeable comparisons and real inconveniences, when, by a general embargo in 1794, the vessels of all other nations, and of our own citizens, were detained in port.

2. The twenty-third article of our treaty with Prussia forbids the commissioning of privateers, to take or destroy the trading vessels, or to interrupt the commerce of the contracting parties, in case a war should arise between them. And, considering the abuses too often committed by privateers, and the spirit in which privateering is commenced and prosecuted, it has sometimes appeared desirable to abolish the practice altogether. But the policy of this principle, as it respects the United States, may well be doubted; we are weak, at present, in public vessels of war, and our actual revenues are not adequate to the equipping of powerful fleets; but we are strong in the number of our seamen, in private wealth, and in the uncommon enterprize of our citizens. Our chief means, therefore, of annoying and distressing a maritime enemy would be our privateers. For these reasons, you will propose, and endeavour to effect, an alteration in this 23d article; and to leave commerce, in case of a war between us and Prussia, to the attacks of privateers.

The principle that free ships make free goods, is also found in the treaty with Prussia (article 12.) It is a principle that the United States have adopted in all their treaties (except that with Great Britain) and which they sincerely desire might become universal: but treaties, formed for this object, they find to be of little or no avail; because the principle is not universally admitted among the maritime nations. It has not been regarded in respect to the United States, when it would operate to their benefit; and may be insisted on only when it will prove injurious to their interest. You will, therefore, propose to abandon it in the new treaty which you are empowered to renew and negotiate with Prussia.

On the like ground, you are to propose to admit of articles contraband of war; and, among them, to enumerate timber for ship building, tar, pitch, turpentine, and rosin, copper in sheets, sails, hemp, and cordage, and, generally, whatever may serve directly to the equipment of vessels, unwrought iron and fir-planks only excepted.

But, although these alterations appear desirable, yet if the state of things shall, in your judgment, render it expedient not to propose them, or, if proposed, not to insist on them, you will act accordingly. In another period of ten years, it will probably not occasion any material embarrassment between the United States and Prussia, to renew the treaty precisely in its present form. And, at this time, it is peculiarly interesting to us to conciliate the good will of that and other European nations.

Another, and the principal, design of the President, in this appointment, was to place, at Berlin, a minister of your abilities and knowledge in diplomatic affairs, from whom, in the existing situation of Europe, correct intelligence and information highly interesting to the United States might be derived; and who, by his vigilance and sagacity, might find and embrace opportunities to promote their security and welfare.

A third object will be, to renew the treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and Sweden; for which, also, full powers are herewith transmitted. By the Swedish minister at Berlin, or otherwise, you will make known to the court of Sweden that you are invested with such powers.

The ratifications of the Swedish treaty, it is supposed, were exchanged in the beginning of the year 1784; as, on the 9th of March of that year, Dr. Franklin wrote from Paris to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs that he had made the exchange. In like manner, Mr. Adams wrote from London, on the 27th of October, 1786, that he had been in Holland, and exchanged the ratifications of the Prussian treaty. No documents are found to show the day when the exchange took place.

For the reasons above assigned, in respect to the Prussian treaty, that with Sweden should be altered, in the 17th article, so as to subject the vessels of Sweden, as well as those of other nations, to the effects of a general embargo: enemies' property found on board them to capture and confiscation, as good prize; and ship timber and naval stores (as before enumerated) to be deemed contraband of war. The right of privateering is to remain as already fixed in the treaty with Sweden.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, Secretary of State.

From the Secretary of State to John Quincy Adams.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, July 17, 1797.

SIR:

In the instructions, dated the 15th instant, relative to your renewing our treaties with Prussia and Sweden, you see expressed the earnest wishes of the United States that the principle that free ships should make free goods should become universal. This principle is peculiarly interesting to us, because our naval concerns are mercantile, and not warlike: and you will readily perceive that the abandonment of that principle was suggested by the measures of the belligerent powers, during the present war, in which we have found that neither its obligations by the pretended modern law of nations, nor the solemn stipulations of treaties, secured its observation: on the contrary, it has been made the sport of events. Under such circumstances, it appeared to the President desirable to avoid renewing an obligation which would probably be enforced when our interest should require its dissolution; and be contemned when we could derive some advantage from its observance.

But it is possible that, in the pending negotiations for peace, this principle of free ships making free goods may be adopted by all the great maritime Powers; in which case, the United States will be among the first of the other Powers to accede to it, and to observe it as a universal rule.

In like manner, if the rigid rule of the law of nations, respecting contraband, should be relaxed, and ship timber and naval stores be declared free, we shall eagerly embrace this liberal rule.

The issue of the negotiations for peace, which we suppose to be now pending, will probably be known to you, before it will be necessary to finish the renewal of the treaties between us and Prussia and Sweden: and you will conform our stipulations with those two Powers, on the points above mentioned, to the result of those negotiations.

But if the negotiations for peace should be broken up, and the war continue, and more especially if, as you have conjectured, the United States should be forced to become a party in it, then it would be extremely impolitic to confine the enterprises and exertions of our armed vessels within narrower limits than the law of nations prescribes. If, for instance, France should proceed from her predatory attacks on our commerce to open war, the mischievous consequences of any other limitations will be apparent. All her commerce would be sheltered under neutral flags; while ours would remain exposed, as at present, to the havoc of her numerous cruisers.

These remarks, added to your instructions, will possess you fully of the principles by which the President desires you may be influenced, in renewing the treaties with Prussia and Sweden.

I am, sir, with perfect esteem, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

From the Secretary of State to John Quincy Adams.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Philadelphia, March 17th, 1798.

SIR:

As the war continues, and as it now seems scarcely possible for the United States to avoid becoming a party in it, you will doubtless be determined, by your instructions of the 15th and 17th July last, in renewing our treaties with Prussia and Sweden, and to reject the article in each which stipulates that free ships shall make free goods. With this prospect before us, no considerations occur which should induce its admission. But the reasons suggested in those instructions are now strongly enforced, by the law of the French republic before cited,* if, as Mr. Fenwick supposes, though general in its expressions, it is really and exclusively intended to operate against the Americans. In this case, a renewal of that stipulation is positively to be refused. The Swedish and Prussian commerce will then be only on the footing of the commerce of Denmark, with whom we have no treaty; and if we must be involved in the war, it will be desirable that the commerce of those three Powers, in relation to the United States, should rest on one and the same principle. But if this iniquitous French law exists (and we have no room to doubt it) will all the Northern Powers submit to it? We hope not. We hope that the inordinate ambition of France, and avowed design to subjugate all Europe (of which she already calls herself "the great nation" and "the conqueror,") will excite the resistance of all the Powers whom her arms have not reached, and rouse anew those whom the course of events have induced to submit. At present, Britain appears to be the only bulwark against the universal domination of France, by sea as well as by land. It is plain that those Powers who have avoided becoming parties in the present war, and have congratulated themselves on their superior policy and good fortune, will finally have no reason to rejoice: they were only reserved for future plunder and oppression. This is now strikingly verified in respect to the United States. Her exactions are as unexpected as her victories have been unexampled. Instead of stipulating for even future compensation for the many millions of which she has authorized her cruisers to rob us, she demands immediate contributions to the enormous amount of her depredations; making them the measure, not of rendering justice, but of increasing her oppression! A full knowledge of her treatment of our envoys, and of the propositions made to them, would confound her partisans among us, convince our citizens in general of the impossibility of preserving their property and independence but by resistance, and produce general unanimity in the measures requisite for that end: or, if I am mistaken in this opinion, we are already under the yoke of foreign domination.

I have the honor to be, &c.

TIMOTHY PICKERING.

Extract of a letter from John Quincy Adams, Minister, &c. to Berlin, to the Secretary of State, dated OCTOBER 31*st*, 1797.

"A few days after I had the honor of writing to you last from London, I received a duplicate of your instructions, dated July 15th, together with a copy of those bearing date the 17th. I shall pay all the attention to them which their importance requires, and the circumstances will admit. It is, however, to my mind very questionable whether it will be expedient to propose the alterations suggested in your letters, except that relative to the embargo. The principle of making free ships protect enemy's property has always been cherished by the maritime Powers who have not had large navies, though stipulations to that effect have been in all wars more or less violated. In the present war, indeed, they have been less respected than usual, because Great Britain has held more uncontrolled the command of the sea, and has been less disposed than ever to concede the principle; and because France has disclaimed most of the received and established ideas upon the laws of nations, and considered herself as liberated from all the obligations towards other States which interfered with her present objects, or the interests of the moment. Yet even during this war, several decrees of the French Convention, passed at times when the force of solemn national engagements was felt, have recognized the promise in the treaty of 1778; and at times it has been in a great degree observed. France is still attached to the principles of the armed neutrality, and yet more attached to the idea of compelling Great Britain to assent to them. Indeed, every naval State is interested in the maintenance of liberal maxims in maritime affairs, against the domineering policy of Britain. Every instance, therefore, in which these principles are abandoned by neutral powers, which favor the rights of neutrality, is to be regretted, as furnishing argument, or at least example, to support the British doctrines. These observations apply with more weight with regard to the Swedish treaty than to the other, as I believe Sweden is peculiarly attached to the liberal system, and entertains hopes that it may finally prevail by the concurrence of all the maritime Powers, excepting only Britain."

* The following is the law referred to:

[TRANSLATION.]

1. The character of a vessel, as neuter or enemy, is determined by her cargo. Therefore, all vessels laden with merchandise which has come from England, or her colonies, shall be declared good prize, whoever may be the owner.

2. Every vessel which, in the course of her voyage, shall have entered an English port, shall not enter the ports of the French republic, except in case of distress; and when that cause shall have ceased, she shall immediately depart.

No. 121.

Extract of a letter from John Quincy Adams to the Secretary of State, dated

BERLIN, May 17, 1798.

"I deem it highly inexpedient to propose any alteration in the principle agreed upon in our present treaty neutralizing enemy's property on board of neutral vessels. It is indeed true that this stipulation has not, in the course of the present war, been observed by France. But she has uniformly professed her attachment to the principle, and attributed her violation of it to the example and previous practice of her enemy. There is certainly a great inconvenience, when two maritime States are at war, for a neutral nation to be bound by one principle to one of the parties, and by its opposite to the other; and in such cases it is never to be expected that an engagement favorable to the rights of neutrality will be scrupulously observed by either of the warring States. It appears to me, therefore, that the stipulation ought properly to be made contingent, and the contracting parties to a commercial treaty should agree that, in all cases when one of the parties should be at war, and the other neutral, the bottom should cover the property, provided the enemy of the warring Power admitted the same principle, and practised upon it in their Courts of Admiralty; but, if not, that the rigorous rule of the ordinary law of nations should be observed.

"In truth, I am fully convinced that there is only one Power in Europe averse to the general establishment of the principle favorable to neutrality; a Power which does not even disguise the pretension of domineering upon the ocean, and whose naval force is almost equal to that of all the world besides. It must be admitted, that, so long as she rejects the liberal principle, every agreement of other nations, between themselves, admitting it, excepting contingently, as above stated, must, if it have any operation, operate altogether in her favor, and to her advantage; for while it gives her the benefit of a safe and protected neutral conveyance of her goods, it refuses the same to her enemy."

No. 122.

Extracts from a letter of John Quincy Adams to the Secretary of State, dated

BERLIN, May 25, 1798.

"I shall be guided by your instructions relative to the stipulations upon the subject of neutral commerce, though I have very recently written that, in my own opinion, the proposal of an alteration would be inexpedient. The reasons for my opinion are given in my last letter. Sweden and Prussia are both strongly attached to the principle of making the ship protect the cargo. They have more than once contended that such is the rule even by the ordinary laws of nations. A Danish author of some reputation, in a treatise upon the commerce of neutrals in time of war, lays it down as a rule, and argues formally, that, by the law of nature, free ships make free goods. Lampredi, a recent Florentine author, upon the same topic, has discussed the question at length, and contends that, by the natural law in this case, there is a collision of two rights equally valid; that the belligerent has a right to detain, but the neutral an equal right to refuse to be detained. This reduces the thing to a mere question of force, in which, the belligerent, being ready armed, naturally enjoys the best advantage. I confess the reasoning of Lampredi has, in my mind, great weight, and he appears to have stated the question in its true light."

"I intend to propose a conditional article, putting the principle upon a footing of reciprocity, and agreeing that the principle, with regard to bottom and cargo, shall depend upon the principle guiding the admiralty courts of the enemy. This will at once discover our own inclination and attachment to the liberal rule, and yet not make us the victims of our adherence to it, while violated by our adversaries. Whether the other party will, in either instance, accede to this, I cannot undertake to say; but you may be assured that, after your last instructions, I shall not accede to the renewal of the articles under their form in the previous treaties."

No. 128.

To their Excellencies the Ministers of State and of the Cabinet of the King.

The subscriber, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, upon his arrival at Berlin, had the honor to deliver to their excellencies a copy of the full power with which he is charged, on the part of the United States, to renew the treaty of amity and commerce between His Majesty and the United States, with such alterations as may be agreeable to both parties mutually.

He has now that of communicating to their excellencies the alterations which he is ordered to propose, on the part of his Government, and to add some observations upon the motives which gave occasion to those propositions.

The twelfth article of the former treaty declares, that, in case either of the high contracting parties should be at war with another Power, enemy's property, on board of the neutral vessel, shall not be subject to be made prize. It is proposed to substitute, instead of this rule, that of the ordinary law of nations, which subjects to seizure enemy's property on board of neutral vessels.

The Government of the United States is not unaware, that the principle which communicates to the cargo, the character of the vessel would be conformable to the interests of the United States, as they are persuaded it would be to those of Prussia, and all the Powers preserving neutrality in maritime wars, if it could be universally acknowledged and respected by the belligerent Powers. But it is known that the Powers most frequently engaged in naval wars do not recognize, or do not respect, the principle. The United States have had, during the present war, the experience that, even the most formal treaty did not suffice to secure to them the advantage of this principle; but, on the contrary, only contributed to accumulate the losses of their citizens, by encouraging them to load their vessels with merchandise declared free; which they have, notwithstanding, seen taken and confiscated, as if no engagement had promised them all security.

At the present moment neither of the Powers at war admits the freedom of enemy's property on board of neutral vessels. If, in the course of events, either of the contracting parties should be involved in war with one or the other of those Powers, she would be obliged to behold her enemy possess the advantage of a free conveyance for her goods, without possessing the advantage herself, or to violate her own engagements, by treating the neutral party as the enemy should treat her.

It is for the same reason proposed, instead of the thirteenth article of the former treaty, to admit a list of contraband of war, and to comprise in it ship-timber, tar, pitch, turpentine and rosin, copper, (in sheets) sails, hemp, cordage, and generally every thing serving for the equipment of vessels, unwrought iron and fir planks excepted. These two changes indicate several additional articles, naturally proceeding from them: as, for instance, a designation of the papers which shall be necessary to ascertain the neutrality of vessels and their cargo; and, likewise, the restrictions proper to prevent the armed vessels of the belligerent Power from abusing the privilege of arresting neutral vessels, and seizing the enemy's property found on board.

By the sixteenth article of the former treaty, the vessels of the subjects or citizens of each of the high contracting parties, in the ports of the other, are declared exempt from all embargo. It is proposed, in the treaty, to subject them to every general embargo, which the respective Governments may judge necessary. This proposal is founded upon the necessity under which both Governments are supposed alike liable to find themselves, of imposing, from time to time, a general embargo upon all the vessels either in all its ports, or in certain particular ports; exceptions, then, might defeat the advantages which might be expected from this measure, and may, besides, give occasion to comparisons, which one would wish to avoid, on the part of other nations, whose vessels would be detained with those belonging to the nation itself where the embargo should be laid.

The nineteenth article will require some alteration. By the present engagements of the United States, no vessel that shall have made either English or French prizes can obtain an asylum in the ports or harbors of the United States.

A modification of the twentieth article may declare that it shall not be understood to invalidate the guaranty of the French possessions in America, stipulated by the United States in their treaty of alliance with France, bearing date 6th February, 1778.

It is proposed to omit the last clauses of the twenty-third article, which declare, that, in case of war between the high contracting parties, the merchant and trading vessels shall not be subject to capture. This stipulation, being of little importance as to the high contracting parties, between whom no probability of war, no opposing interests which might lead to it, appear to exist; it is, therefore, in regard of other nations, who may require similar conditions when they might import very different consequences, that this engagement is desired to be omitted.

The twenty-fifth article of the former treaty grants mutually the faculty of keeping consuls and vice consuls, agents, and commissaries, in the respective ports: it adds, that their functions shall be determined by a particular agreement, when either of the parties shall appoint to such office. It would, perhaps, be well to stipulate that they shall enjoy the same privileges and powers as those of the most favored nations.

The duration of the new treaty may, like that of the old one, be limited to ten years, reckoning from the day of exchanging the ratifications, with the same faculty of renewing it again at the expiration of that period.

In submitting these observations and propositions to their excellencies, the subscriber requests them to accept the assurance of his respect and high consideration.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

BERLIN, July 11, 1798.*

No. 128.

Extracts of a letter from John Quincy Adams, Esq. dated Berlin, 16th July, 1798, to the Secretary of State.

"On the 11th I delivered to Count Finckenstein, first minister in the Department of Foreign Affairs, a memorial of which I herewith enclose a translation. I would send, at the same time, a copy of the original French, but I do not think it would be prudent to send it unciphered, and I have no French cipher with you: I presume you will not judge it material. I hope you will find it exactly conformable to your instructions and intentions. The proposal for abandoning the principle of making free ships cover enemy's property, I have repeatedly informed you will not be acceptable: still less will that of a large list of contraband, especially comprehending many of the most material articles of Prussian exports. I have said, however, all that occurred to me as calculated to show that these would be but equitable alterations. If these proposals should be accepted, I have mentioned the necessity of some additional articles designating the papers that shall be deemed necessary to prove the neutrality of vessels and their cargoes, and to abuses by the armed vessels of the warring Power. The former treaty mentions the necessity of passports, but leaves their forms unsettled."

"I proposed an alteration of the nineteenth article, which appeared to me necessary to render it conformable to the twenty-fifth article of our treaty with Great Britain; and a modification of the twentieth, which might otherwise be liable to a collision with the guaranty in our treaty with France; although this treaty has, in numberless instances, been violated by the French Government, as it has not been declared by our Government formally dissolved, but as they have, on the contrary, invariably respected it, I thought the stipulation deserved attention."

"The twenty-fifth article referred to a future arrangement at the time when consuls should be named. As this nomination had taken place, and no arrangement was made, an alteration of the article became necessary. I found, in our treaty with Spain, a precedent for what I proposed; and I believe it is what on our part is conceded alike to all foreign consuls by law."

No. 136.

Extracts of a letter from John Quincy Adams, Esq. to the Secretary of State, dated Berlin, 1st October, 1798.

"I have the honor to enclose herewith a copy of a note from the Department of Foreign Affairs here, in answer to mine of 11th July, with the proposals for the renewal of the treaty, which has heretofore been forwarded to you."

"The objections to the changes which, conformably to your instructions, I proposed, are those which I have constantly expected, and repeatedly announced."

"I shall reply to this note as soon as possible; but if you do not think it advisable to renew the stipulation for making the bottom cover the property, and for excepting at least ship timber from the list of contraband, I have no sort of expectation that either treaty will be renewed. At present, I consider myself as expressly forbidden from acceding to their proposal for renewing the twelfth article as it is, and have no idea that they will consent to leave it out."

[Referred to in Mr. Adams's despatch of October 1, 1798.]

BERLIN, le 25ème Septembre, 1798.

Nous avons pris en mûre délibération la note officielle que Monsieur Adams, ministre plénipotentiaire des Etats Unis de l'Amérique, nous a remise, en date du 11ème Juillet, de l'année courante, et après avoir discuté les objets qu'elle renferme, avec les départemens dont ils ressortissent, nous sommes présentement à même de répondre en détail à son contenu.

Le Roi n'a pu qu'être sensible au désir que lui témoignent les Etats Unis, de cultiver avec lui les relations d'amitié et de bonne intelligence, qui ont subsisté jusqu'ici entre la Prusse et leur république; et sa Majesté est très disposée à renouveller, pour cet effet, le traité de commerce, conclu à la Haye, le 10eme Septembre, 1785, en y apportant les changemens et les modifications, que les circonstances actuelles et les intérêts respectifs des deux Puissances contractantes peuvent rendre nécessaires.

Nous avons examiné, sous ce point de vue, les propositions que Monsieur le ministre plénipotentiaire vient de nous faire, et nous aurons l'honneur de lui communiquer les observations qu'elles ont amenées.

Le premier changement, dont il est question dans sa note, doit porter sur l'article XII de l'ancien traité, où il est dit, "que dans le cas, où l'une des parties contractantes serait en guerre avec une autre Puissance, les vaisseaux de la partie neutre pourront naviguer en toute sûreté dans les ports et sur les côtes des Puissances belligérantes, les vaisseaux libres rendant les marchandises libres."

A cette règle les Etats Unis voudroient substituer celle: que toute propriété ennemie à bord des vaisseaux neutres doit rester sujette à saisie, et que toute propriété neutre à bord des vaisseaux ennemis doit rester libre.

On ne sauroit disconvenir que l'ancien principe de la liberté des navigations neutres a été bien peu respecté dans les deux dernières guerres, et nommément dans celle qui dure encore; mais il n'en est pas moins vrai qu'il a servi jusqu'ici de base et de boussole au commerce de toutes les nations neutres, qu'il a été suivi et soutenu en conséquence, et qu'il l'est encore. Si l'on s'avisoit de l'abandonner, et de le renverser subitement au milieu de la guerre actuelle, il en resulteroit:

1. Une confusion inévitable dans toutes les spéculations du commerce des nations neutres, et ce seroit porter le coup-de-grace à toutes les réclamations et procédures que les sujets des Puissances neutres poursuivent encore en si grand nombre, soit en Angleterre, soit en France, pour des prises illégales:

2. On tomberoit en contradiction avec les Puissances du nord, qui protégent encore à l'heure qu'il est l'ancien principe par des convois armés:

3. Il ny auroit rien à gagner en établissant, dans le moment présent, le principe que les propriétés neutres doivent rester libres à bord des vaisseaux ennemis. Les Puissances belligérantes l'admettroient tout aussi peu que le précédent; et ce seroit une raison, de plus, pour leurs tribunaux de légitimer les prises qui ont été faites en contravention de l'ancienne règle:

4. Enfin, et supposé pour un instant que les grandes Puissances maritimes de l'Europe voulussent reconnoître dans la suite le principe substitué par les Etats Unis, il ne ferait qu'augmenter et multiplier les embarras dans les procédures contre les armateurs; car tandis qu'autrefois la qualification du vaisseau décidoit en même temps de celle de la cargaison, il faudroit à l'avenir distinguer l'une de l'autre, et en faire séparément les preuves. Toutes ces difficultés réunies nous empêchent de souscrire au changement proposé par Monsieur Adams, et nous lui donnons à considérer, s'il ne conviendroit point à l'intérêt réciproque des deux hautes parties contractantes, et à ceux de leurs sujets commerçans, de laisser subsister provisoirement l'article XII, tel qu'il est, en conformité du système qu'elles ont soutenu jusqu'ici, et d'ajouter la stipulation éventuelle, "que l'expérience ayant malheureusement demontré, dans le cours de la guerre actuelle, que l'ancien principe de la libre navigation neutre n'a pas été suffisamment respecté par les Puissances belligérantes, les deux hautes parties contractantes se reservent de s'entendre, après le retour de la paix générale, soit séparément entr'elles, soit conjointement avec les autres Puissances co-interessées, pour concerter avec les grandes Puissances maritimes de l'Europe tel arrangement, qui puisse servir à établir sur des règles fixes et permanentes la liberté et la sûreté de la navigation neutre dans les guerres futures." Monsieur Adams propose ensuite de faire entrer dans l'article XIII, une liste spécifique des objets qui seront censés de contrebande en temps de guerre, et d'y comprendre le bois de construction, le goudron, la poix, la térebenthine, et la résine, le cuivre en feuille, les voiles, le chanvre, les cordages, et généralement tout ce qui sert à l'équipement des vaisseaux, excepté le fer brut et les planches de sapin.

* This note was enclosed in despatch, (No. 128) dated July 16, 1798, which it should have followed.

S'il doit être question de spécifier en détail, dans le nouveau traité, les articles de contrebande, nous sommes obligés de nous en tenir à ceux qui ont été réputés et adoptés comme tels dans la convention maritime conclue entre la Prusse et la Russie, le 8ème Mai, 1781, à l'instar du traité de commerce et de navigation arrêté entre la Russie et la Grande Bretagne, le 20ème Juin, 1766. L'article XI de ce dernier traité déclare contrebande, "Les canons, mortiers, armes à feu, pistolets, bombes, grenades, boulets, bales, fusils, pierres à feu, meches, poudre, salpêtre, souffre, cuirasses, piques, épées, ceinturons, poches à cartouches, selles et brides, au delà de celle que doit avoir chaque homme servant sur le vaisseau, et passager, &c.

C'est cette liste qui a fait la base de nos réglemens de commerce maritime; nous l'avons toujours suivie, soit dans les guerres précédentes, soit dans la guerre actuelle, et elle nous paroit épuiser tous les articles qui appartiennent de fait à la contrebande proprement dite. Si elle pouvoit être susceptible d'une nouvelle extension, nous n'y comprendrions jamais du moins le bois de construction, qui est une des principales productions du royaume de Prusse, et qui a toujours été regardé comme un objet de libre commerce dans toutes les guerres maritimes.

D'un autre côté, nous convenons volontiers avec Monsieur Adams, qu'il sera utile et nécessaire de désigner, avec précision, dans l'article XIV, les papiers et documens dont chaque propriétaire de navire doit être muni, pour constater la neutralité du vaisseau et de la cargaison. Il lui faut selon les usages reçus dans nos tribunaux maritimes.

1. Le document de la construction du navire; (beil-brief, building letter) ou, à son défaut, le contrat d'achat; l'un ou l'autre, en original, ou en copie vidimée:

2. Le passeport de mer; qui, dans les états du Roi est ordinairement expédié pour le terme d'un an, par les dicastères provinciaux préposés aux affaires du commerce maritime. Il pourroit être statué en outre, que les passeports doivent être renouvellés chaque fois que le vaisseau retournera dans le port d'où il est parti:

3. Le rôle d'équipage:

4. La certe-partie, c'est à dire, le contrat passé en bloc pour le fret de tout le navire, ou, à son défaut, les connoissemens donnés pour la cargaison en détail. Le changement proposé pour l'article XVI porte sur la suppression de la clause, qui, dans le cas d'un embargo général, établissoit l'exemption en faveur des vaisseaux appartenans aux sujets ou citoyens de chacune des deux parties contractantes. Si l'intérêt des Etats Unis et des considérations particulières exigent en effet une pareille modification, le Roi y accedera de son côté. Seulement il sera juste d'ajouter la stipulation, que dans ces sortes de cas, les navires de l'une et de l'autre nation seront traités à l'égal de ceux des nations les plus favorisées, et qu'on leur accordera une indemnité équitable tant pour le fret que pour les pertes occasionnées par le retard.

Rien n'empêchera non plus d'agréer les changemens indiqués par les articles XIX et XX, et de les adapter aux relations actuellement subsistantes entre les Etats Unis et la France. On pourroit exprimer aussi pour plus de clarté et de sûreté dans l'article XIX. que parmi les prises qui seront conduites dans les ports ou havres des Etats Unis, il ne doit se trouver ni vaisseau ni cargaison neutres, et bien moins encore des propriétés Prussiennes. L'article XXIII, qui mettoit les navires marchands à l'abri de toute capture, a été dicté, sans doute, par les vues d'humanité et de bienfaisance les plus pures, et ce n'est pas sans regrets qu'on l'efface; mais cette douce théorie etant si difficile à mettre en pratique, il ne reste qu'à y rénoncer du moment, surtout que l'intérêt politique des Etats Unis en peut être affecté.

Nous acquiesçons à l'addition de l'article XXV, que les consuls des deux Puissances jouiront des mêmes privileges et pouvoirs que ceux des nations les plus favorisées; et nous adopterons de nouveau pour la durée du traité à conclure un terme de dix années, à compter du jour de l'échange des ratifications, sauf à le renouveller encore à l'expiration.

Nous croyons avoir repondu en plein, par la présente note, à toutes les ouvertures que Monsieur Adams a été chargé de nous faire, et nous lui laissons le soin de transmettre aux Etats Unis les contre-propositions et observations que nous lui addressons de nôtre côté. Il nous trouvera prêt ensuite à reprendre le fil de la negotiation, et à y mettre la dernière main avec lui aussitôt qu'il le désirera.

A Monsieur ADAMS, Ministre Plenipotentiaire des Etats Unis de l'Amérique à la Cour du Roi.

[TRANSLATION.]

Messrs. Finckenstein, Alvansleven, and Haugwitz, to Mr. Adams.

BERLIN, 25th September, 1798.

We have considered with great attention the official note which Mr. Adams, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has transmitted to us the 11th of July of the present year; and, after having discussed the objects of that note with the departments to which they relate, we now reply to it in detail.

The King could not but receive with due sensibility the desire manifested by the United States to cultivate with him the relations of friendship and good will, which have, until this time, subsisted between Prussia and the American republic, and His Majesty is therefore well disposed to renew the treaty of commerce concluded at the Hague, the 10th of September, 1785; and to adopt in it the changes and modifications which the actual circumstances and the respective interests of the two contracting Powers may render necessary.

With this view, we have examined the propositions just made by the minister plenipotentiary of the United States, and we have thehonor to communicate the observations to which they have given rise.

The first alteration proposed in his note relates to the 12th article of the ancient treaty, where it is said, "that, in case one or the other of the contracting parties shall be at war with any other Power, the vessels of the neutral Power may navigate in perfect safety in the ports and upon the coasts of the belligerent Powers; free ships making the merchandise free."

For this rule, the United States desire to substitute the following: "That all the property of enemies on board neutral vessels ought to be subject to seizure; and that neutral property on board enemies vessels should remain free."

It cannot be denied that the ancient principle of the freedom of neutral navigation has been little regarded in the two last wars, and especially in that now carried on; but it is not the less true, that it served until the present time as a foundation and guide to the commerce of all neutral nations; and that, in consequence, it has been, and still is, followed and maintained. If, in the midst of the war now waging, its sudden abandonment and destruction should be advised, the following results might be expected:

1. Inevitable confusion would arise in all the commercial speculations of neutral nations, and the finishing blow would be given to the remonstrances and proceedings which are still urged, in numerous instances, both in England and France, for illegal captures.

2. We should directly oppose the northern Powers, who maintain, to this very time, the ancient principle of armed convoys.

3. Nothing would be gained by establishing, at the present period, the principle that neutral property on board enemies' vessels should be free. Neutral Powers would admit this principle with as much reluctance as the belligerent; and this would constitute an additional reason to authorize the judicial condemnation of the prizes made in contravention of the ancient rule.

4. Finally, supposing for an instant that the great maritime Powers of Europe should wish to acknowledge hereafter the principle substituted by the United States, it would only multiply the embarrassments in the proceedings against the privateers; for while, formerly, the character of the vessel decided at the same time that of the cargo, it would be necessary, in future, to distinguish the one from the other, and provide separately the proofs of each.

All these difficulties combined prevent us from acceding to the alteration proposed by Mr. Adams; and we submit to his consideration, whether it would not suit the reciprocal interests of the two high contracting parties, as well as the interests of their commercial citizens and subjects, to suffer the twelfth article to remain provisionally as it is, in conformity with the system which they have maintained to the present time; and to add the eventual stipulation, "that, experience having unfortunately shown, in the course of the existing war, that the ancient principle of free neutral navigation has not been sufficiently respected by the belligerent Powers, the two high contracting parties, upon the return of a general peace, reserve the right of deciding definitively on this subject, either separately between themselves, or conjointly with other interested Powers, in order to concert, with the great maritime Powers of Europe such arrangements as might serve to establish, in subsequent wars, upon fixed and permanent rules, the liberty and safety of neutral navigation." Mr. Adams proposes, also, to insert, in the thirteenth article, a specific list of the objects which shall be considered contraband in time of war, and to comprehend in it "ship timber, tar, pitch, turpentine, and rosin, copper in sheets, sails, hemp, cordage, and generally all that serves to the equipment of vessels, unwrought iron and fir planks excepted."

If an attempt should be made to specify, in the new treaty, the articles of contraband, we are obliged to adhere to those which have been considered and adopted as such in the maritime convention concluded with Prussia and Russia, the 8th of May, 1781, after the example of the treaty of commerce and navigation formed between Russia and Great Britain, the 20th of June, 1766. The eleventh article of this last mentioned treaty declares contraband, "cannon, mortars, fire-arms, pistols, bombs, grenades, bullets, balls, fusils, flints, matches, saltpetre, sulphur, hauberks, pikes, swords, sword belts, cartridge boxes, saddles and bridles, or whatever each man, serving on board a vessel, should be furnished," &c.

This list has been the foundation of those rules of maritime commerce which we have always followed, as well in former wars as in the war now carried on; and it appears to us to embrace all the articles which appertain in reality to contraband property, so called. If this list is susceptible of additional extension at all, we can never consent to its comprehending ship timber, one of the principal productions of the kingdom of Prussia, and always regarded, in all maritime wars, as an object of unrestricted commerce.

On the other hand, we willingly agree with Mr. Adams, that it will be useful and necessary to designate with precision, in the fourteenth article, the papers and documents with which the master of every vessel should be furnished, in order to establish the neutrality of the vessel and cargo. This should be done according to the usages admitted in our maritime tribunals.

1. The document, showing the construction of the vessel, (building letter) or, in its absence, the contract of purchase. The original, or a certificate copy of either the one or the other.

2. The sea-letter, which, within the dominions of the King, is generally issued, for the term of one year, by the provincial officers appointed to inspect the affairs of the maritime commerce. It may be ordered, also, that the sea-letter ought to be renewed every time the vessel shall return to the port from whence she sailed.

3. The register of the crew.

4. The charter-party, or the contract, passed in bulk, for the freight of every vessel; or, where this is deficient, the proof in detail of what the cargo contains.

The change proposed in the fourteenth article is predicated on the suppression of the clause which, in case of a general embargo, would establish an exemption in favor of vessels belonging to the subjects or citizens of each of the two contracting parties. If the interests of the United States, and particular considerations, require, in reality, a similar modification, the King will, on his part, accede to it. It will be just, however, to add a stipulation that, in these cases, the ships of the two nations, respectively, shall be treated equally with those of the most favored nation; and that an equitable indemnity should be granted to them as well for the freight as for the losses occasioned by detention.

Nor do we perceive any objection to the alterations proposed by articles XIX and XX, in order to adapt them to the relations subsisting between France and the United States. It may be declared, also, in article XIX, for the greater clearness and safety, that, among the prizes that may be carried into the ports and harbors of the United States, no neutral vessel or cargo shall be found among them, and still less when the property of Prussian subjects. The twenty-third article, which protected the merchant vessels from every species of capture, has, no doubt, been dictated solely by considerations of humanity and benevolence, and it will not be expunged without regret; but, inasmuch as this pleasing theory can with difficulty be enforced, it only remains to renounce it, whenever it can be done consistently with the political interests of the United States.

We acquiesce in the proposed addition to the twenty-fifth article, by which the consuls of the two Powers, respectively, shall enjoy the same rights and privileges with those of the most favored nation; and we adopt again, for the duration of the treaty, the term of ten years, reckoning from the exchange of ratifications, and providing for its renewal at the expiration of that time.

We believe that, in the present note, we have replied fully to all the propositions which Mr. Adams has been charged to make; and we leave to him the care of transmitting to the United States the counter propositions and observations herein contained. We shall be ready, at any time thereafter, to resume the negotiation, and also to conclude the treaty whenever he may desire it.

No. 138.

BERLIN, October 30, 1798.

SIR:

I have the honor to enclose a copy of the note which I this day delivered to Count Finckenstein, in reply to the answer of the cabinet ministry to my former note of 11th July. Before I delivered it, I had two conferences with Count Haugwitz, concerning the subject matter of it. He professed himself highly satisfied with the within note, and assured me that there would not be the least objection made to expediting the business, without waiting for further instructions to me from America. The proposal, to say nothing in the treaty relative to the property of enemies on board of neutral vessels appeared to have his assent altogether. I hope the answer to this note will not be delayed quite so long as that of the last; but as to what its tenor will be, I beg leave to refer you to my former letters, (No. 136, and those preceding it,) relative to this business. I have had no reason to alter my opinions therein expressed.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your very humble and obedient servant.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

The SECRETARY OF STATE.

[Enclosed in despatch 138, Oct. 30, 1798.]

BERLIN, le 29 Octobre, 1798.

Le soussigné, ministre plénipotentiaire des Etats Unis d'Amérique, croit devoir soumettre à la considération de leurs excellences les observations suivantes au sujet des objections que présente la reponse de leurs excellences à la note qu'il eut l'honneur de leur remettre, en date du 11ème Juillet de l'année courante, à quelques unes des propositions de changemens à faire en renouvellant le traité d'amitié et de commerce entre S. M. et les Etats Unis que contenoit cette note.

Le principe sur lequel on s'est fondé en proposant le changement rélatif à la sûreté des propriétés ennemies à bord des batimens neutres, est, que par le droit ordinaire des gens, en tems de guerre maritime, les propriétés ennemies à bord des vaisseaux neutres sont sujettes à capture, et les propriétés neutres à bord des vaisseaux ennemis libres. Que cette règle ne peut être changée que par un consentement général de toutes les Puissances maritimes, ou par des traités particuliers, dont les engagemens ne peuvent s'étendre qu'aux parties contractantes. Que le principe contraire, dont l'établissement devoit être un des principaux objets de la neutralité armée, pendant la guerre Americaine n'avoit pas été réconnu universellement, même à cette époque, et n'a pendant la guerre actuelle été maintenue par aucune des Puissances qui accéderent dans le tems à ce système. Que la Prusse même, tant qu'elle a été partie belligérante dans sa derniere guerre, ne l'admettoit pas; et qu'au moment actuel l'ancien principe du droit des gens subsiste dans toute sa force entre toutes les Puissances, excepté dans les cas où la règle contraire est stipulée par les engagemens d'un traité positif.

En proposant donc de reconnoitre la liberté des propriétés neutres à bord des vaisseaux ennemis, et de reconnoitre comme sujettes à capture les propriétés ennemies à bord des vaisseaux neutres, on n'a voulu que confirmer par le traité les principes qui existent au moment même, independamment de tout traité; on a voulu, non faire, mais éviter un changement à l'ordre actuel des choses.

Loin de vouloir prescrire sur ce point aux Puissances belligérantes, on n'a pas supposé qu'un accord entre la Prusse et les Etats Unis pût en aucune manière servir de règle à d'autres Puissances n'ayant pas de part au traité pour légitimer des prises; et comme l'effet de cette convention, même entre les hautes parties contractantes, ne sauroit regarder que l'avenir sans être retroactif, on s'est bien moins imaginé que les réclamations et procédures des sujets des Puissances neutres, soit en Angleterre soit en France, pour des prises illégales, en pussent etre de manière quelconque affectées.

On a tout aussi peu crû tomber en contradiction avec les Puissances du nord, qui ne peuvent être liées par un traité auquel elles ne seroient pas parties contractantes; d'ailleurs cette contradiction ne sauroit régarder la Russie puisque loin de soutenir le principe que le pavillon doit protéger les propriétés: elle s'est engagée, par sa convention avec la Grande Bretagne, en date du 25ème Mars, 1793, à employer tous ses efforts pour l'empêcher pendant la guerre actuelle.

La Suède et le Danemarc, par leur convention du 27ème Mars, 1794, s'engagent réciproquement, et vis-à-vis de l'Europe entière, de ne vouloir prétendre, dans les cas qui ne sont point exprimés dans les traités, à aucun avantage qui ne soit fondé dans le droit des gens universel, "reconnu et respecté jusqu'à présent par toutes les Puissances, et par tous les Souverains de l'Europe." On ne conçoit pas qu'il soit possible de comprendre sous cette description le principe que les propriétés doivent suivre le sort du pavillon sous lequel ils voguent; et l'on pourroit ajouter qu'une expérience constante a demontré l'insuffisance des convois armés pour proteger ce principe, puisqu'on les voit régulièrement suivre sans résistance leurs convois dans les ports des Puissances belligérantes pour y être jugés d'après les principes établis dans leurs tribunaux, qui sont entièrement contraires a celui de neutraliser la cargaison par le navire.

D'après l'usage dans les tribunaux de toutes les Puissances maritimes, les preuves du caractère de la cargaison doivent être distinctes de celles qui concernent le navire: dans les traités mêmes qui adoptent le principe de couvrir les propriétés par le pavillon, il est ordinaire de stipuler pour des papiers qui désignent la cargaison, afin de prouver qu'il n'y a pas de contrebande. La certe-partie ou les connoissemens sont parmi les papiers que leurs excellences citent comme requis dans les tribunaux maritimes Prussiens, et qu'elles proposent de désigner comme nécessaires dans le nouveau traité. Il semble, donc, que l'adoption du principe en question n'exigeroit pas un papier de plus, et par conséquence n'ajouteroit rien aux embarras des procédures contre les armateurs; ou tout au plus, si peu de chose qu'on peut le regarder comme un foible inconvénient, en comparaison des pertes et des souffrances que causent la reconnoissance d'un principe abandonné déjà par presque toutes les Puissances maritimes, et qu'aucune d'elles ne soutient efficacement d'un principe auquel celle des hautes parties contractantes qui seroit en guerre se trouveroit liée par un engagement désavantageux, tandis que son ennemi ne le respecteroit pas, et celle qui seroit neutre n'y présenteroit à ses sujects ou citoyens l'appât d'un commerce libre que pour le voir interrompre, intercepter, et détruire.

Mais comme la façon de penser de ce Gouvernement paroit en quelque sorte différer de celle du Gouvernement des Etats Unis au sujet du principe prescrit par le droit des gens, et comme plusieurs inconvéniens paroissent à leurs excellences pouvoir résulter de la substitution d'un principe contraire à celui que contenoit l'ancien traité, le soussigné a l'honneur de leur proposer d'omettre entièrement cette partie de l'article, et de ne rien stipuler sur ce point, ce qui le laissera absolument dans la situation où il se trouve maintenant, sans engager l'une ou l'autre des hautes parties contractantes à une stipulation quelconque à cet égard. Et comme l'établissement d'un principe stable et permanent, avec l'espoir de le voir soutenu et respecté dans les guerres futures, est un objet important au commerce en général, et à celui des hautes parties contractantes en particulier, le soussigné consentera volontiers à une stipulation eventuelle pareille à celle que leurs excellences proposent; mais qui, sans impliquer de part ou d'autre l'admission d'un principe contesté, en remettra la décision à l'époque qui suivra la paix générale, soit par un accord ultérieur entre les hautes parties contractantes, soit par un concert avec les autres Puissances interressées. Et les Etats Unis seront toujours disposés à adopter les principes les plus étendus qu'on puisse désirer en faveur de la liberté du commerce neutre en tems de guerre, du moment où l'on pourra se flatter de les voir adopter et reconnoitre d'une manière qui puisse en assurer l'éxécution.

Quant à la liste de contrebande, le soussigné se persuade que son Gouvernement n'a voulu spécifier les articles cités dans sa dernière note, que parcequ'il les considéroit comme également compris dans la classe des articles de contrebande par le droit des gens, independamment des traités; cependant, comme le bois de construction forme un objet si important au commerce Prussien, en consentant à l'omettre de la liste proposée, il ne doute pas que ce témoignage d'une disposition à se conformer aux désirs du Gouvernement de S. M. ne soit entièrement approuvé de celui des Etats Unis.

Par les loix et l'usage des Etats Unis, leurs navires doivent être pourvus de papiers et documens correspondants à ceux designés par leurs excellences comme requis dans les tribunaux maritimes Prussiens, tels que le passeport de mer, la certe-partie, ou les connoissemens, et au lieu du beil-brief, un certificat d'enrégistrement signé par un officier public, et qui constate la propriété du navire, ainsi que le tems et lieu de sa construction. Aucun des traités de commerce auxquels les Etats Unis sont parties, jusqu'ici, n'a exigé le rôle d'équipage. Une partie importante des réclamations que les citoyens des Etats Unis poursuivent en France contre les armateurs François sont pour des navires avec leurs cargaisons saisis pour ne pas avoir eu de rôle d'équipage que le traité n'éxigeoit pas. S'il etoit possible que des tribunaux étrangers pussent prendre une convention expresse entre la Prusse et les Etats Unis, pour prétexte de leurs décisions sur des prises faites antérieurement, et dont un autre traité prescrivoit le jugement, ce seroit une raison pour hésiter à admettre le rôle d'équipage parmi les papiers à spécifier dans le traité qu'on propose. Cependant, il n'y aura nulle difficulté sur ce point; mais, pour éviter la multiplication des papiers, il présente à la considération de leurs excellences, s'il ne suffiroit pas de désigner outre la certe-partie ou les connoissemens, et le rôle d'équipage, le passeport de mer, en y ajoutant que le nom, la propriété, et le port du navire, avec le nom et la demeure du capitaine y seroient contenus, sans en même tems réquérir le document de la construction qui paroit ne pouvoir servir qu'à la répétition des mêmes preuves.

La condition que dans les cas d'embargo les navires des hautes parties contractantes seront traités à l'égal des nations les plus favorisées, (à l'exception de celles qui par un engagement réciproque sont exemptés de tout embargo,) et recevront une indemnité équitable pour le fret et les pertes occasionnées par le rétard, est en elle-même trop juste pour pouvoir souffrir de difficulté.

Une stipulation réciproque, de ne pas admettre dans les ports d'une des hautes parties contractantes des prises faites sur l'autre, trouvera la même facilité, en autant qu'elle est compatible avec les engagemens antérieurs des Etats Unis, qui par plusieurs traités sont convenus avec d'autres Puissances pour l'admission réciproque des prises dans les ports l'une de l'autre.

En soumettant ce qu'il vient de dire au jugement de leurs excellences, le soussigné ne peut se dispenser de leur témoigner sa réconnoissance, et la satisfaction qu'il est assuré que son Gouvernement éprouvera, pour la facilité, avec laquelle elles se sont pretées aux autres changemens qu'il etoit chargé de proposer. Les Etats Unis y verront une preuve non équivoque de la bienveillance et de l'amitié de S. M. qui ne peuvent que leur être très précieuse. Si les observations et les propositions présentes ont le bonheur de trouver l'assentiment de leurs excellences, il espère qu'elles voudront bien poursuivre cet objet, et mettre la dernière main à l'ouvrage, sans attendre le rétour d'une correspondence aussi éloignée que celle des Etats Unis. Sans vouloir précipiter leur décision, ou manifester d'impatience sur un sujet important aux yeux de son Gouvernement, il a déjà du regretter les délais nécessaires causés par les évènemens au cour de la négociation dont il a l'honneur d'être chargé. Il croit donc devoir à son Gouvernement et à sa patrie de solliciter le consentement de leurs excellences à ne permettre à la terminaison de cette affaire aucun rétard ultérieur qui ne soit necessité par des considérations urgentes et indispensables.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

A leurs excellences les MINISTRES D'ETAT, &c.

[TRANSLATION.]

From Mr. Adams to Messrs. Finckenstein, Alvensleben, and Haugwitz.

BERLIN, October 29, 1798.

The undersigned, minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, considers it his duty to submit to the consideration of their excellencies, the following observations on the subject of the objections presented, in the reply of their excellencies to the note which he had the honor to transmit to them, dated the 11th of July of the present year, proposing certain alterations in the treaty about to be renewed between His Majesty the King of Prussia and the United States.

The principle, on which is founded the proposed change respecting the security of enemy's property on board of neutral vessels, is, that, by the law of nations, in times of maritime war, the property of enemies on board of neutral vessels is subject to capture, and that the property of neutrals on board of enemies' vessels is free: that this rule cannot be changed, except by the general consent of all the maritime Powers, or by separate treaties, the stipulations of which cannot extend beyond the contracting parties: that the opposite principle, the establishment of which ought to be one of the principal objects of the armed neutrality, was not universally acknowledged even during the period of the American war; and, during the existing war, has not been maintained by any of those Powers which, at that time, acceded to this system: that Prussia, herself, while one of the belligerents in the last war, did not admit it; and that, to the present moment, the ancient principle of the law of nations subsists in all its force among all the Powers, except in the case where the opposite rule is stipulated by the engagements of positive treaty.

In proposing, then, to acknowledge the freedom of neutral property on board the vessels of enemies, and to acknowledge as subject to capture the property of enemies on board neutral vessels, it is only desired to confirm, by treaty, the principles which exist, even at the present moment, independently of all treaties: it is intended, not to make a change in the existing state of things, but to avoid one.

Far from wishing to prescribe on this point to the belligerent Powers, it is not supposed that an agreement between Prussia and the United States could, in any manner, serve as a rule for other Powers, not being parties to the treaty, in order to legalize prizes; and, as the effect of this convention, even between the high contracting parties, could only extend to the future, without being retroactive, it is still less imagined that the reclamations and proceedings of the subjects of neutral Powers, whether in England or in France, would be at all regarded.

Nor has the idea ever occurred that this measure could come in conflict with the Powers of the North, who could not be bound by a treaty to which they would not be the contracting parties: besides, this opposition could not extend to Russia, since, far from sustaining the principle that the flag ought to protect the property, she has engaged, by her convention with Great Britain, dated the 25th of March, 1793, to employ all her efforts to prevent its being carried into effect during the existing war.

Sweden and Denmark reciprocally engaged, in the view of all Europe, by their convention dated the 27th of March, 1794, to lay no claim, in cases not provided for in treaties, to any advantage which shall not be supported by the universal law of nations, "recognized and respected to the present time, by all the Powers and all the sovereigns of Europe." It is not conceived possible to comprehend, under this description, the principle that the property should follow the destiny of the flag under which it sails; and, it may be added, that constant experience has demonstrated the insufficiency of the protection afforded by armed convoys to this principle, since we have seen them follow their convoys regularly, without resistance, into the ports of the belligerent Powers, there to be adjudged according to principles established in their tribunals entirely opposed to the one which makes the vessel neutralize the cargo.

According to the settled usage of the tribunals of all the maritime Powers, the proofs of the character of the cargo ought to be distinct from those which concern the vessel. Even in the treaties which adopt the principle that the flag protects the property, it is common to stipulate for papers which designate the cargo, for the purpose of proving that it is not contraband. The charter-party, or the bill of lading, is among the papers required by the Prussian maritime tribunals, and which it is proposed to designate as necessary in the new treaty. It seems, then, that the adoption of the principle in question would not exact a single additional paper, and, consequently, would add nothing to the embarrassment of the proceedings against the armed vessels; or, at least, so little as to be considered a slight inconvenience in comparison with the losses and sufferings occasioned by the recognition of a principle which has been abandoned by all the maritime Powers, and which not one of them has effectually maintained; of a principle by which the high contracting party who might be at war would be disadvantageously bound, whilst her enemy would disregard it altogether, and the neutral would present to her citizens or subjects the allurement of a free commerce, only to see it interrupted, intercepted, and destroyed.

But, as the opinions entertained by this Government appear to differ from those of the Government of the United States on the subject of the principles prescribed by the law of nations, and, as it appears to their excellencies that many inconveniences may result from the substitution of a principle opposed to the one contained in the ancient treaty, the undersigned has the honor to propose to omit entirely this part of the article, and on this point to enter into no engagement whatever: this will leave it in the state in which it formerly stood, without requiring of either of the high contracting parties any stipulation on the subject. And as the establishment of a stable and permanent principle, with the hope of seeing it respected and maintained in future wars, is an object important to commerce in general, and especially to that of the high contracting parties, the undersigned will readily consent to an eventual stipulation similar to that which their excellencies propose, which, without implying, on the one part or the other, the admission of a contested principle, will defer a decision upon the subject to the period which will follow a general peace, either by an agreement between the high contracting parties, or in concert with the Powers who are interested in its adjustment. At the same time, the United States will be always disposed to adopt the most extended principles which can be desired in favor of the freedom of neutral commerce in time of war, from the moment that they can flatter themselves with seeing it adopted and recognized in a manner to ensure its execution.

As to the list of contraband, the undersigned is persuaded that his Government has only been desirous to specify the articles enumerated in his last note, because they have been considered as comprised in the class of contraband articles by the laws of nations, independently of treaties. But, inasmuch as ship timber constitutes an object so important to the commerce of Prussia, he is persuaded that in consenting to exclude it from the proposed list, and thus furnishing the evidence of a desire to conform to the wishes of His Majesty's Government, he will not fail to receive the entire approval of his own.

By the laws and usage of the United States, their vessels ought to be provided with the papers and documents designated by their excellencies as required by the maritime tribunals of Prussia, such as the sea-letter, the charter-party, or the bill of lading; and, instead of the beil-brief, a certificate of the registration, signed by a public officer, and which proves the ownership of the vessel, as well as the time of her construction. Not one of the commercial treaties which have been formed by the United States, to the present time, requires the muster roll. A great proportion of the remonstrances now made in France, by citizens of the United States, against the depredations of French privateers, are founded on the seizure of their vessels, with their cargoes, for not having been furnished with the muster roll, a document not required by the treaty with France. If it were possible that foreign tribunals could avail themselves of a convention between Prussia and the United States only, as the pretext of their decisions upon prizes previously made, and concerning which another treaty prescribed the rule, some reason would exist for hesitation in admitting the muster roll among the papers which it is proposed to specify in the treaty. No difficulty, however, will arise on this point. But, in order to avoid the multiplication of papers, he submits to the consideration of their excellencies, whether it will not suffice to designate, in addition to the charter-party, or the bill of lading, and the muster-roll, the sea-letter, adding to it the name, the ownership, and the port of the vessel, with the name and residence of the captain, without at the same time requiring the "document of construction," which could only serve to repeat the same proofs.

The condition, that, in the event of an embargo, the ships of the high contracting parties shall receive the same treatment with those of the most favored nation, (with the exception of those exempted by a reciprocal engagement from all embargoes,) and shall receive an equitable indemnity on account of the freight, and for the losses occasioned by detention, is in itself too just to occasion any difficulty.

A reciprocal stipulation not to admit in the ports of one of the high contracting parties the prizes taken from the other, will be equally acquiesced in, as far as is compatible with the prior engagements of the United States, who, by several treaties, have agreed with other Powers for the reciprocal admission of prizes in the ports of each other.

In submitting these observations to the judgment of their excellencies, the undersigned cannot refrain from tendering his own acknowledgments, as well as the satisfaction which he has no doubt will be felt by his Government, for the readiness with which they have acceded to the other alterations it became his duty to propose. The United States will see in this an unequivocal proof of the good will and friendship of His Majesty, which they cannot estimate too highly. If the present observations and propositions shall have the good fortune to receive the assent of their excellencies, he hopes that they will be willing to pursue this object, and to put their last hand to the work, without waiting the return of a correspondence so remote as that with the United States. Without wishing to hasten their decision, or to manifest impatience upon a subject which appears to his Government important, he has to regret the delays which have already been caused by events in the course of the negotiation with which he has the honor to be charged. He considers it, therefore, a duty which he owes to his Government and country, to solicit the consent of their excellencies to permit no further delay to the termination of this business, which may not be required by urgent and indispensable considerations.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

To their excellencies the MINISTERS OF STATE, &c.

No. 141.

BERLIN, December 31, 1799.

SIR:

I have now the honor to enclose copies of the answer of the cabinet ministry to my note of 29th October, concerning the renewal of the commercial treaty between the United States and Prussia, and of my reply, which I presented to Count Finckenstein on the 25th instant. During the interval from the time when I received the answer, I had repeated conversations with Count Haugwitz upon the subject, and the substance of my reply was founded upon the result of those conversations.

You will observe, by these papers, how tenaciously this Government adheres to the principle of making neutral bottoms cover enemy's property in time of war, and to the very limited list of contraband contained in the treaty of 1766 between Russia and Great Britain. At the time when Frederic II. acceded to the armed neutrality, having no commercial treaty with any of the then belligerent Powers, he adopted this list as that which was most favorable to the neutral interests, and it has ever since been considered here as the criterion of contraband. After having given up, in my last note, the article of timber for ship building, I should most probably have abandoned the other naval stores in the present, had not your letter of September 24, expressed so much indifference whether the treaty should be renewed at all. I shall yet abandon them if this Government should persist in rejecting them.

Upon the other point, the stipulation proposed instead of the twelfth article of the old treaty, expressly holds out the question concerning neutral bottoms and goods as a contested point, and it is preceded by a labored argument to prove that, by the present law of nations, the principle of the old treaty is prescribed. But, in conformity to your instructions, I did not think myself authorized even to admit, by any implication, that the principle prescribed by the law of nations can be a subject of controversy, and hence, in objecting to the words which present it as such, it was necessary to answer the arguments in maintenance of the position.

I have, in my reply, offered two alternatives for avoiding, in the new treaty, any mention of the point; and, if a positive inference could be drawn from what Count Haugwitz assured me was his opinion, I might conclude that one or the other of them might be accepted. I shall not be surprised, however, if the difficulty in this case should still recur; for I judge, from what has hitherto passed, that they are apprehensive an alteration of the express agreement in the treaty of 1785 might be construed into an abandonment of the principle, unless the substituted article should contain some expression which should evidently reserve it; and it is perfectly clear that they are extremely averse to abandon the principle. Their own convention with Great Britain, in 1793, is, to be sure, an argument against them, so strong in itself, that I have not thought it necessary to dwell much upon it, and therefore barely alluded to it in my second note. You will see how they explain it in the enclosed answer, and consider it as compatible with the system which, at other times, Prussia has maintained, and now again wishes to support.

In the discussion concerning the papers to be specified for the purpose of ascertaining the neutrality of merchant vessels and their cargoes, in time of war, as I had not the benefit of your instructions, I was obliged to proceed upon such principles as occurred to my mind as best calculated to answer the object proposed by those papers. The sea-letter, the muster-roll, and the invoices appeared indispensable in a treaty which does not adopt the principle of allowing the bottom to protect both persons and goods; but the other paper, for which they so strenuously contend, seemed to me unnecessary, as tending to prove nothing but what the sea-letter alone suffices to show, and as binding the parties to certain forms of documents which their internal commercial regulations might require to be altered. In my last conversation with Count Haugwitz, he concurred with me fully in the opinion; and I hope, therefore, that the additional paper will not be insisted upon. I have felt more embarrassment upon this subject, because I have not with me the latest laws of the United States prescribing the papers with which vessels of the United States must be provided.

The case of the Wilmington packet, upon which so many fruitless applications were made to the Government in Holland for indemnity, suggested to me the idea of allowing time, after the breaking out of war, for the neutral nation to furnish its vessels with the proper papers.

Since receiving your letter of the 24th September, I have felt much less anxious about the speedy conclusion of the treaty than I was before. In one of my last conversations with Count Haugwitz, I told him that, if the Prussian
